and you have a reliable remedy, proved by thousands of sufferers to be unequalled for Dispelling Disorders of the Stomach and Liver. It is not necessary to bring BEECHAM'S PILLS before your notice surreptitiously, as they are openly recommended by those who have found that BEECHAM'S PILLS will do all that is claimed for them; hence they have the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes.

Price 1s. 1½d. (56 Pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

No. 724.] Week ending November 15, 1902. [Price One Penny.

"The Lady Honoria was in the arms of an Egyptian."

(See our Fascinating New Series. "HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA," first page).

Digitized by Google

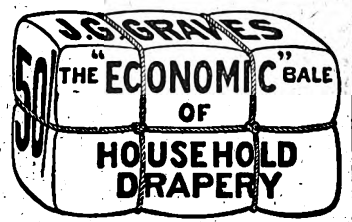
'Let's Talk of Graves' Drapery

.. THE .. 'ECONOMIC' BALE OF HOUSEHOLD DRAPERY, £2 10s.

CONTAINS: Pair very Best Quality Twilled Sheets, Pair Heavy Blankets with white whipped edges (full size), Superior Quality Red and White or Blue and White Alhambra Quilt (large size), Pair Fine Quality Pillow Slips, 1 Bolster Case, Set of 5 Handsomely Embroidered Toilet Mats, 2 Turkish Towels, Best Quality Glass Cloth, Scouring Cloth, 6 Netted Dusters, Pair Special Design Lace Curtains, 1 Woven Turkey Table Cloth, 1 Embroidered Table Cover 80 in. square, and 1 Full Size White Table Cloth of Fine Quality.

TERMS.

Send only 2/-, the Bale will then be sent to your address (carriage paid), and, if you are satisfied, complete the purchase in six more monthly payments of 7s. each. If not satisfied, return the parcel, and your deposit will be refunded in full.



Send for No. 5 Catalogue of Drapery, Costumes, etc., etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms. No Risk. Good Commission.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable CHEMISETTES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 59 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

NOSE RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (B T), Specialist South Castle Road, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

Don't Suffer from Eczema

"ANTEXEMA" cures the worst cases—You may try it FREE

Let no one endure any longer the itching, burning, and smarting of Eczema, or any form of skin trouble, great or small. Send to-day for a free trial sample of "ANTEXEMA," together with copyright treatise on "Skin Troubles," and £20 testimonials from grateful sufferers who have been cured. Sent in plain wrapper, post-paid, by the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, N.W. "ANTEXEMA" is sold by all Chemists at 1/1½ (post-free from us for 1/3). Refuse injurious substitutes.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 13½d. tins everywhere.

Order E. & T. PINK'S JAM

Undoubtedly the Best.

PURE.

No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Short Stories.

No. 724. For the Week Ending November 15th, 1902. One Penny.

FASCINATING NEW SERIES. BEGIN TO-DAY.

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. The comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

LADY HONORIA. The Duke's sister.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

HOW LADY PEGGY FINDS BELINDA.

Lady Peggy undertakes, for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, to chaperon Belinda, and to marry her to a son of some old and titled family. Staying at the same hotel in Cairo are the Duke of Eastacres and his mother, the Duchess. Lady Peggy and the Duchess agree that nothing could be better than a union of the Duke's title and Belinda's millions; everything is therefore done to bring this about. One evening, under the guidance of a fine looking Bedouin, they all go to witness a religious festival. Some dervishes are dancing when suddenly Belinda, excited beyond all self-restraint, throws herself into the midst of the fanatics and tries to imitate their weird dance. Her enthusiasm is misinterpreted. Instantly all is confusion. The guide, however, snatches Belinda from danger, and hurries them away. Belinda is profuse in her thanks, then suddenly with a cry of: "It is you, you! Lady Peggy, he's not a dragoman at all. He's David Carr," throws herself into his arms.

The Duke Begins to Score.

Conceive, if you can, my feelings!

The situation was one words cannot adequately express. Here was a young girl, who, before the Duchess of Eastacres and the Duke of Eastacres had publicly embraced a dragoman! For a dragoman to all intents and purposes he was. The fact that under his disguise would be found one David Carr, a civil engineer, didn't affect the case at all. He had appeared before us as a native guide, as a native guide he should be treated.

"Belinda!" I cried in horrified accents, "are you mad? Come away from that person immediately. He may have cholera or small-pox, or some other dreadful disease. You never can tell what these natives suffer from."

All rights reserved.]

"Why Lady Peggy, how absurd!" replied Belinda. 'David's an Englishman, he——"

I sternly interrupted her.

"That man," I said, "was hired by us this evening as a dragoman. I refuse to look upon him as anything else."

"Mousma" accepted the situation in a moment. He whispered something to Belinda—the nature of the communication I regret to say, I could not distinguish—then, with an exaggerated salaam, signified his readiness to conduct us to the hotel.

"Certainly not," said the Duchess, "I refuse to go another step in that person's company." She pointed the remark with a shake of her head—her bonnet, poor dear, was a little on one side, or I'm sure she would have looked dignified as ever, despite the distressing circumstances.

"Nonsense, mother," interposed Eastacres. "The streets are impassable to-night without a guide. The man will serve as well as any other." As he spoke the Duke took some silver from his pocket, and handed it to Mousma—nothing shall make me call the man David Carr!

That person, however, affected not to see his Grace's generous gift, but started off at a good round pace in the direction of the hotel. I followed close behind, with a firm hold of Belinda.

When we arrived at "The Continental," our dragoman had disappeared; Belinda seemed disappointed, but made no remark. She went upstairs at once to her room. I was about to follow, when the Duchess, in somewhat imperative fashion, demanded an interview.

"We'd better go to your sitting-room," she said stiffly; the dear creature had not a reception-room of her own, her jointure or her meanness would not permit of the extravagance.

Digitized by Google

"Lady Carstairs," she commenced, seating herself in a capacious lounge chair, "I think you are behaving badly."

"Really, Duchess——"

"Please hear me out. I am not accustomed to be interrupted. You gave me to understand that this girl, Belinda North, though of no birth and worse family, was not altogether impossible. In that belief, and having regard to Eastacres' inadequate income, I agreed if not to sanction, at any rate not to oppose your wish for a marriage between him and your—your charge. In view of what occurred to-night, in view of the indelicacy of the whole proceeding, I am bound to say you have behaved badly. You have, in fact, deceived me. The girl is atrocious, her conduct unspeakable."

Now this was more than I could stand. The Duchess had sent for her son by her own wish, not at my suggestion, and beyond mentioning the fact that North was a millionaire, and Belinda his sole heiress, I had given her Grace no information whatever. Besides, I wasn't going to allow anyone to call the girl I chaperoned "atrocious." Such an assertion threw discredit upon me. Other people besides Belinda had embraced a native—a real one, as the Duchess should learn.

"Very well, Duchess," I said stiffly, "if that is your opinion I have nothing more to say. We will consider all negotiations in regard to Eastacres at an end."

I rose as I spoke, and bowed in the direction of the door. The Duchess, who had expected penitence and pleadings on my part, was considerably astonished.

"I don't say that, Lady Peggy. Perhaps Belinda may improve. Still——"

"As to that, I can't tell," I answered. "Belinda met this David Carr on board the steamer. Her father warned me that she was smitten in that direction, but did not consider it more than a passing attraction. I saw Carr two days ago, and gave him to understand I would not tolerate his further acquaintance with Belinda. I told him also that the girl had passed her word not to communicate with or see him without my knowledge. That I suppose suggested the idea of a disguise. He appeared, as you know, as a dragoman, and we engaged him, and a very fortunate engagement it turned out for some of us. Those dervishes might have torn us in piecemeal, at any rate you seemed to think so."

The Duchess groaned at the remembrance.

"What do you propose doing in regard to this young man?" she asked.

I shrugged my shoulders. "It will not need much tact to get rid of him," I answered. "Things will evolve themselves. Belinda is young, and, like all girls, fond of admiration. She will soon forget him in the society of men his superiors in every way. But you must remember, Duchess, that a girl like Belinda, of great beauty and immense wealth, will be a prize desired by every fortune hunter in Europe."

I emphasised "fortune-hunter" purposely. It was well known that the Duke had proposed to two American heiresses.

"Belinda will be the centre of attraction wherever we go," I continued. "I am not unwilling to further your aims in procuring her fortune for Eastacres, but I cannot consent to criticism such as you have directed against me, because events turn out less favourably than you desire. There are others with a title as old as your own who would be genuinely desirous of winning Belinda. Eastacres is the first in the field, but I do not anticipate he will be the last."

"My dear Peggy"—the Duchess is wonderfully effusive on occasion—"you quite misunderstand me. I intended no criticism of you, your methods have always commanded my admiration. I merely expressed the horror I felt at witnessing Belinda's demonstrations of affection. One is compelled to swallow much to keep up a position nowadays. But," the Duchess shook her head, "I cannot swallow a dragoman! Besides, consider the example, the terrible example to Honoria."

"I don't think Honoria stands in need of an example," I returned drily. "It's only a week ago, the very evening that we paid a visit to Ilderim's bazaar, that I found your daughter in the arms of an Egyptian."

"What!" The Duchess bounded to her feet. "My daughter! Impossible!"

"It's very sad," I answered, "and I feel for you, dear Duchess, from the bottom of my heart. But, it is as I say. Mr. North and I, as you will remember, went to look for Honoria when she 'lost her way.' We found her in the garden of the old Moorish palace close to the Citadel. She was hugging an Egyptian—a real one, Duchess, not a white man in disguise."

The Duchess almost choked with rage. She was long past controlling her emotions, and begged me to ring the bell and summon Honoria forthwith.

That unfortunate young woman speedily appeared. She was dressed in a lank, green gown, and looked more than usually unattractive. The sight of her seemed to goad the Duchess into frenzy. In our set we do not trouble to conceal our feelings, or to veil our language when amongst ourselves. It is only to outsiders we are politely insolent.

"Come here," said the Duchess, "here," and she dragged Honoria under the electric light. "I am told that not content with disgracing me with your looks, your manners and your total inability to make a decent marriage, you are carrying on a disgraceful intrigue with a native—a vile, brown-skinned Egyptian!"

"He's not an Egyptian, mother. He's the son of a sheik, a pure-blooded Arab——"

"Good Heavens!" shrieked the Duchess, "do you dare to argue? What a pure-blooded Arab may mean, unless it refers to a horse, I don't know or care. But understand this—see this creature again, dare to degrade your name and family by such disgraceful conduct, and I shut you up. I mean it; your brother said you should have been put in a mad-house long ago. What!" as the wretched girl tried to defend herself, "do you defy me? You——" the Duchess bent towards her daughter, and with considerable violence slapped her face.

With a low cry Honoria stepped back, an ugly red mark on her sallow cheek. I half think the Duchess was tempted to slap her again, when the door flew open and Belinda, like an avenging goddess, swooped down on her Grace.

"You wicked old woman," she said. "How dare you! I heard you slap Honoria. Don't deny it"—the Duchess had no intention of so doing—"you ought to be ashamed of yourself. Don't cry, Honor, dear"—she turned to the weeping Honoria—"she sha'n't ill-treat you while I'm here. What's it all about? El Hamed, I suppose. Never mind, you shall see him all the same. I'll look after that. Only you mustn't promise not to or I can't help you."

She mopped up Honoria's tears as she spoke, and drew the limp figure close to her side. The Duchess, utterly aghast at this unexpected attack, glanced helplessly at me. I realised that the emergency required nice handling.

"Belinda," I said severely, "you have used most improper language to the Duchess. You must apologise at once. Rudeness at all times is vulgar, and when directed against a lady of her Grace's station it becomes unpardonable."

Belinda heard me with heightened colour, but her lips tightened into a straight line, and a mutinous look settled in the big, blue eyes. I realised I must deal with her in different fashion.

"Do you think your father would approve of your conduct?" I whispered. "Is it fitting that a young girl should speak in such a way to a woman old enough to be her mother?"—for that matter the dear Duchess might easily have been Belinda's grandmother.

Digitized by Google

At the mention of her father the girl frowned. Then in a most unlooked-for fashion she capitulated.

"I ought not to have called you 'wicked,'" she said to the Duchess. "I apologise for that, but you shouldn't have slapped Honoria." She held out a slim brown hand, and her Grace reluctantly accepted the apology.

"I'm going to take Honor to my room for a bit," Belinda continued. "You don't mind?" She smiled at the Duchess, nodded to me, and whisked Honoria out of the door before there was time for anyone to protest.

The Duchess gasped and sank into a chair.

"Mark my words, Peggy," she said, "that girl will be a handful. I doubt if even you can manage her."

I smiled but did not discuss the question. I was quite sure of my capacity for managing Belinda, or any other young woman. Millicent had been difficult but I had broken her in at last. Diplomacy is the main thing required in dealing with young people. Give way to them in small things, never actively oppose them in big ones. Steady pressure tactfully applied will do all that is required. After a while I felt confident Belinda would respond to my will as easily as a thoroughbred obeys his rider.

I thought it better to supervise the interview between Belinda and Honoria, so leaving the Duchess to recover composure and to plan fresh ignominies for her daughter, I slipped away.

I found the two girls in the corridor. Belinda was engaged in parrying the Duke's inquiries as to what had happened to his sister. She—Belinda, I mean—was looking mischievous to a degree. Her eyes sparkled and her cheeks were tinted with a wild-rose flush. With short skirts and long hair—she only consented to put it up on state occasions—she was the picture of a wilful but a lovely seventeen.

As I hastened down the corridor a voice pursued me.

"Lady Peggy, Lady Peggy! just an instant."

I turned, and to my astonishment faced Lord Reginald Davenant—"Reg," as he was familiarly called.

"I thought you'd gone to Heidelberg?" I cried.

"Beastly cold place Heidelberg!" he replied with a shiver. "Had to come here—bad chest and things, you know. Who's that, Lady Peggy?" he glanced towards Belinda. "I must be introduced."

He advanced towards her as he spoke, and with a little thrill of gratification I introduced him. Reg gazed with undisguised admiration at the girl. He was renowned for his numerous flirtations and entanglements; indeed, an intrigue with Davenant carried with it a certain distinction; it was, so to speak, a certificate of smartness. I had my suspicions as to the reason that brought him to Cairo. The presence of Mrs. Murchison Lee—Midge, as the little American was called—had, I thought, as much to do with his coming as his chest! If Belinda should prove a successful rival to the dainty little Yankee, the girl's social reputation would be made at once.

Reg's demeanour had its effect on the Duke. Hitherto that nobleman, to use a racing phrase, had looked on Belinda as a sure thing. Her beauty and her millions were, he thought, his own when it should please him to claim them. Now, for the first time, he realised that the girl might have other suitors as distinguished as himself.

From that night he exerted himself to fascinate the girl And if his fascinations lacked freshness, Belinda was too ingenuous to know it.

The next morning the Duke's change of tactics became apparent. He looked us up directly after breakfast. Reg must have divined his intention, for he appeared shortly after nine—quite two hours before his usual time for rising. When he arrived, however, the Duke had already "scored."

Belinda had accepted Eastacres' invitation to join a party to the Pyramids. The Duke had asked her without referring to me, and the young lady had appreciated the compliment.

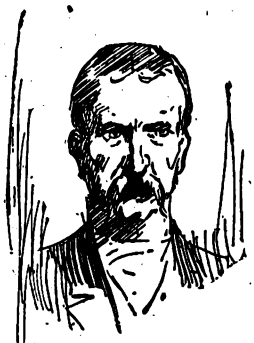
"It will be lovely!" she said, "only let us go on camels, please. It doesn't seem suitable to see the Pyramids in waggonettes. It's like a cheap trip to the seaside. Could we have camels, Duke?"

"My dear Belinda, what an absurd idea!" I exclaimed "No one will have courage to ride the creatures if you get them."

The Duke smiled tolerantly. "The more timorous can go in the waggonettes," said he. "Miss North and I prefer—er—camels."

To ride a camel was an immense sacrifice for him to make. Belinda for once had the grace to appreciate it.

"It's awfully good of you," she said enthusiastically. "Please may we spend a long time in the desert, or must we come back here to lunch?"



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

"I thought we might put up at the Mena Hotel; it's just at the foot of the great Pyramid, you know. If you and Lady Carstairs agree, we might stay there a few days."

"How delightful!" cried Belinda, with pink cheeks. She was only a beautiful child, after all, I reflected.

"It's really very kind of the Duke," she added; "isn't it, Lady Peggy?"

"The Duke's always charming," I said, smiling.

"Always!" remarked Lord Davenant from the doorway. "In what particular manner is his charm working this morning? A trip to the Pyramids—don't let him persuade you, Miss North; they're the biggest frost you can imagine. Three hours drive in a scorching sun to see a heap of stones! Much better come with me for a spin on your bike."

"I can do that as well," said Belinda politely, much to Reg's glee. His triumph, however, was short-lived.

"I am afraid you will have to forego that treat to-day, Miss North," said the Duke. "I shall want your help in choosing our steeds this morning; we ought to start this afternoon about three. I thought it would be a good thing to get to the Mena in time for table d'hote. What do you say, Lady Peggy?"

Belinda agreed with me it was a charming thought, and rushed off to get ready to go with the Duke, Reg pursuing her with offers of assistance.

"A charming girl," said the Duke, and pressed my hand.

I smiled, and gave a sigh of satisfaction. Matters were beginning to go as I wished. It would save me such a lot of time and trouble if Belinda married Eastacres.

My spirits were somewhat damped by the unexpected return of Belinda bearing a note.

"It's from David Carr," she remarked calmly. "I've only just received it. I suppose you'd better see what he says?"

I grasped the letter quickly, and, with much annoyance, read as follows:

"Look out for me to-day, dearest.—DAVID CARR."

"It's not very long, is it?" said Belinda regretfully.

"It's excessively impertinent," I returned.

"You see," she continued, "he doesn't say when, or where——"

"Or how you may expect him," I interrupted angrily. "Possibly he'll appear as a camel driver on this occasion."

Belinda chuckled. "Never mind, Lady Peggy, I won't tell the Duchess," and with an impudent smile she sauntered down the stairs.

I felt extremely vexed. Somehow or other these intrusions of David Carr must be stopped. I made up my mind as to that, though how it was to be done I could not think.

Crawley Drummond unexpectedly came to my assistance.

"That young man is coming here to lunch to-day, Peggy," he observed. "The dragoman, I mean—David Carr, you know. Sir Willoughby Tresham was speaking to me last night about him; says he's a very clever young fellow, bound to get on. Seemed immensely struck with him, in fact; and asked him here to lunch. Tresham's always interested in his own profession, you know; he's helped lots of young and promising engineers" .....

Digitized by Google

I nodded my thanks to Crawley for the information, and with all haste made my way to the Duke's apartments. His mother's suite of rooms might be curtailed, not so his own. He occupied one of the largest and most expensive suites in the hotel, magnificently furnished and beautifully fitted up. My mission was of too delicate a nature to intrust to my maid; I had, perforce, to go myself.

I entered the drawing-room unannounced and apparently disturbed a family conclave.

The Duchess was seated by the window, gazing with ill-concealed dislike at the wretched Honoria. That unfortunate young woman was cowering on the floor, the Duke standing over her with a look on his face I did not like. I always deprecate extreme measures, though I know by experience what mothers have to suffer from recalcitrant daughters. Still, I daresay Honoria was very trying.

"Get up!" said the Duke. "Get up, I say!"

Honoria staggered to her feet. Her face was swollen with weeping, and there was a look of terror, wild, unreasoning terror, in her eyes.

"Now go to your room and stay there. And——" He paused. "Remember you are to be civil to Mark Striven when he comes this evening. You understand?"

The girl made no answer, but with the same wild look in her eyes left the room.

"Honoria was been favouring us with her views of my conduct," explained the Duke, "and intimated her intention of communicating them to Miss North. I don't intend that lady to be worried with my sister's nonsense. Honoria understands that now. By the bye, Lady Peggy, you know my cousin, Mark Striven? I hope to arrange a match between him and my sister. He'll be here to-night. Striven's a very decent chap."

Remembering the tales I had heard of Mark Striven I could not repress a little start. I even felt a touch of compassion for Honoria. However, it was none of my business, and certainly Honoria was aggravating. I decided to nip Belinda's friendship for her in the bud.

"I came to ask you, Duke, if you would arrange to have lunch to-day at the Gheyhizah Palace, or one of the other hotels? I want Belinda to see as much of Cairo as she can. That would bring you back here about half-past three or four—just in time to start for the Pyramids."

"I shall be only too delighted," he replied; "don't expect us, Lady Peggy, earlier than four."

I waited expectantly for luncheon. The Continental being the last place Belinda would expect to meet young Carr, she would be in no hurry to return. I pictured her glancing anxiously among the crowd in the bazaars, and down the Mooski trying to pick out David's tall figure from the throng.

The young man was evidently discomfited to find Belinda was not present. He gave an eager glance round the table, then, failing to find the face he sought, his own grew clouded. He was a very good-looking young man, dark as Belinda was fair, with brilliant eyes of a deep shade of purple and long black lashes.

I welcomed him with a sweet smile to a seat next to mine.

"Belinda was so sorry she could not stay to see you," I said softly.

"Did she know I was coming?"

"Oh, yes, we heard about it from Sir Willoughby. He's full of your praises, besides"—I looked him straight in the eyes—"there was your letter this morning, you know."

"Oh, yes, my letter," he repeated, obviously embarrassed.

"She's gone out to lunch with the Duke," I continued. "A pity you should have missed her." I sighed with sympathy, and turned my attention to my lunch.

David meanwhile discoursed on cataracts and viaducts and irrigation, with considerable fluency and eloquence. Sir Willoughby was evidently impressed with him. I made up my mind to use my influence with the engineering magnate to get a position for young Carr—an influential and well-paid position—somewhere in the wilds of Africa! Tresham would do it for me, I felt sure.

After lunch I suggested that David Carr might like a chat with me.

He acquiesced a trifle unwillingly, and it was with an obstinate, not to say a sullen look, that he opened the conversation.

"Lady Carstairs," he said, "it is only fair for me to say that I am just as resolved about Belinda as when I last saw you on the matter. Is it worth while, therefore, to enter on a discussion which can only end in one way?"

"Mr. Carr," I answered, "the discussion will end in an unexpected, not to say unpleasant, fashion, if you are not wise. I am Belinda's guardian; as such I have the right to choose her associates, and the power to enforce my choice. If you persist in persecuting my charge—for your conduct amounts to persecution—you will compel me to an unpleasant course. I shall be forced to appeal to the protection of the law. I mean it," as the young man started to his feet, "I shall apply to the representative of British justice here in Cairo, and ask protection for Belinda. You cannot set the customs and decencies of society at defiance with impunity, Mr. Carr, as you will learn. Have you no thought, no consideration, for Belinda's reputation?"

The young man smiled.

"Society, I know, is scandalous and cruel," he remarked, "but even Society would hesitate to cast a slur upon Belinda She's so young, so sweet, so——"

"Thank you, I am as well aware of Belinda's good qualities as you. I again repeat if scandal circulates concerning her, you will be responsible for it. You must give me your word to abandon all idea of seeing or speaking to her in the future, or I shall appeal to the law. Belinda herself has no wish to see you, she gave her word to her father and to me not to hold communication with you without my consent. And she knew quite well that consent I should never give. Your conduct is unmanly in the extreme. Belinda is beautiful, she is also an heiress——"

"You can spare me that sneer," he interrupted hotly. "If Belinda marries without her father's consent, she will not have a penny. That I know for a fact."

"And knowing that you would endeavour to persuade her into a clandestine marriage?"

"Not for an instant," he said quickly.

I smiled.

"Your marriage could never be anything but clandestine. Mr. North would not hear of it."

The young man became greatly agitated.

"I cannot give her up," he said, "and yet—" he paused. "Lady Carstairs, have a little pity for me, what can I do?"

"What we are all obliged to do some time or other, Mr. Carr, accept the inevitable. Resign yourself to give Belinda up."

The young man hesitated. Another minute and he would have given me his word, would have consented to put Belinda out of his life. But even as he hesitated, the words trembling on his lips, Belinda, most misguided maiden, suddenly appeared.

"David!" With a smile and a flush she flew to him with outstretched hands. He went towards her, and I shudder to think what might have happened had I not quickly interposed.

I stepped between them, laying my hand on Belinda's arm.

"Listen to me," I said firmly. "I'm not going to have a recurrence of what took place the other night. I did not blame you then, it was not altogether your fault. Now it is a different matter. Are you engaged to Mr. Carr?" I asked sneering.

Digitized by Google

"N-no," said Belinda, blushing; "not exactly. But I should like to be."

"My darling!" interposed David.

"Belinda," I said firmly, "you and I must have an understanding. Either you promise, here and now, to obey me in regard to Mr. Carr, or I cable to your father to-night, and resign all care of you. I mean it. I will not be a party to deceiving Mr. North in the least degree. And you are deceiving him in intention, if not in fact. Tell this young man that you must decline to see him in the future, to receive his notes, to accept his messages, or to hold any communication with him whatsoever, or I cable to your father."

"Marry me at once, Belinda," urged David. "Your father will forgive you. Don't send me away, dearest, have courage to give yourself to me. It's our only chance of happiness. Something tells me that if we part now, we shall part for ever. Belinda!"

For a moment she hesitated. Her mouth quivered, her eyes filled with tears. Then—

"I can't, David," she said piteously. "I promised father I would stay with Lady Carstairs for a year at least. I cannot break my word."

"Promise me at least——"

Again I interrupted.

"I will have neither promises nor pledges. If Belinda gives you any, I resign my care of her. I owe it to Mr. North to prevent the least entanglement."

"Belinda, why not let Lady Carstairs cable to your father? If she gives you up he'll have to come and look after you himself. He won't be so hard-hearted, surely."

Belinda shook her head.

"He'd be worse, David," she answered. "Father would pack me off to the North Pole and get you sent to the South. And"—she paused—"I promised I'd stay with Lady Carstairs. It's no good, David, we must wait, that's all. Wait for a year. Then"—her voice shook, I thought she was going to break down. "I'll write to my father, David, and so can you, but I'm afraid it won't do any good."

"I shall stay in Cairo," said David fiercely. "If not at the Continental, then at Shepheard's. And I shall call here every day," and he glared at me defiantly.

"Best not, dear," said Belinda. "You can trust me, David. I must obey my father for a year, but then."

She clasped his hand, and for a moment the two young things gazed in each other's eyes. They made a beautiful couple, and in a play or a book I should have been quite sorry for them. As it was, I played the part of a cruel fate relentlessly, and did not even relax when David said farewell!

"Good-bye," he said hoarsely, "good-bye!" And the door closed behind him.

"For a year—only a year!" cried Belinda. "David, David, come back!"

She rushed towards the door, but I was too quick for her.

"Be quiet at once," I said sternly. "You're behaving very badly."

I left her to recover herself, and went to dress for our expedition with the Duke. A mere accident had been responsible for Belinda's untimely arrival. The Duke's watch had stopped. It might have had disastrous consequences; as it was, however, everything turned out satisfactorily.

Belinda had promised good behaviour for a year. And in a year many things would come to pass!

There were six of us going to the Pyramids. The Duke, Lord Davenant, and myself, Crawley, Midge, and Belinda. Honoria remained behind to give a welcome to Mark Striven.

We all assembled in the hall, all, that is to say, except Belinda.

Suddenly an awful scream rang through the house, a trampling of feet sounded in the corridor above—Belinda's corridor. And then a voice, hoarse with terror, shrieked.

"Help! Help! I tell you, help!"

That voice, that cry, merciful Heaven, was Belinda's!

(What caused Belinda's terrible distress will be related next Tuesday.)

Miss Madge Morris

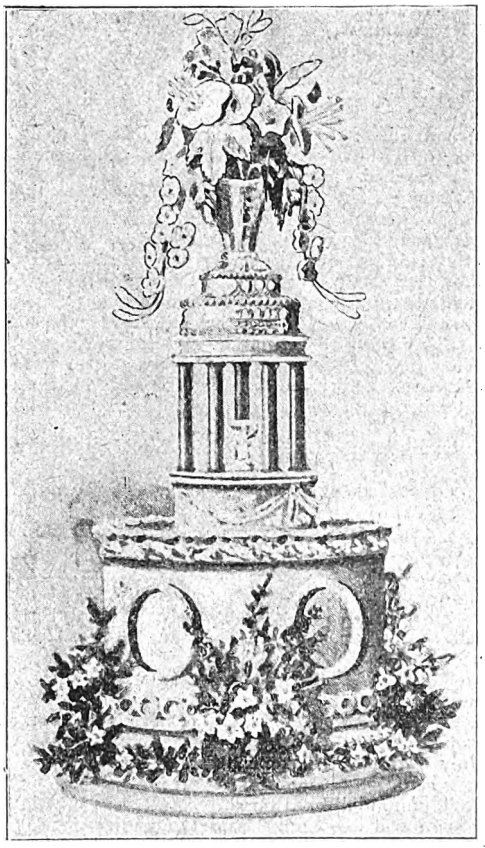
WILL BE MARRIED ON

Tuesday, the 2nd of December.

She chose Tuesday because it is the day on which Short Stories comes before its readers, and she has to thank this little paper mainly for her success.

And now I have a rather startling offer to make.

We shall purchase a big wedding-cake for Miss Morris,



and after the wedding festivities are over it will be cut up, put into boxes, and sent to certain readers of the paper.

Altogether, a hundred delicious pieces of cake will be sent out.

Moreover, the beautiful centre ornament from the top of the cake will also be offered as a prize.

The conditions under which you will be entitled to receive a piece are as follows:

All you have to do is to sit down and write a short congratulatory letter to Miss Morris on the auspicious occasion of her marriage. The reader who sends what Miss Morris considers to be the best letter will receive the beautiful centre ornament from the top, and the senders of each of the next hundred best will receive a piece of the cake.

Send your attempt to Miss Madge Morris, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., marking the envelope "Wedding" in the top left-hand corner, to arrive not later than Monday, December 1st.

Digitized by Google

For Marion's Sake.

An Adventure on a Tandem.

The lonely white road wound up and up endlessly before me, the sun beat on my head mercilessly, and the flies buzzed into my face in a manner only cyclists can appreciate.

The tandem seemed to increase in weight as I plugged slowly forward, until I was almost tempted to think some demon of spite had got astride the vacant back saddle.

Over two miles of ascent still to go and then that little lane, a couple of hundred yards of level way, and Marion's home would be reached—my goal.

How I longed for it; once there, tea and tenderness would soon make amends for my hot ride, we should admire the tandem at our leisure, while planning future delightful excursions to be undertaken when my daily work at the Bank was over, for Marion was a first-class pedaller.

I should explain that the young lady in question was my fiancée, and that we were to be married towards the end of the year. She lived with her father and aunt in a pretty little house just beyond the brow of the hill up which I was toiling; at the foot of it, behind me lay Ellingham, while in the distance could be seen the haze of smoke which hung over busy Birmingham.

"A trying climb this, sir!" said a voice suddenly at my side.

A good-looking, clean-shaven young fellow was breaking into a trot to keep up with me.

"May I suggest, sir," he continued, "if you will excuse a stranger, that if you will allow me to mount, you will lessen your work, you would also do me a great favour, we are going in the same direction."

"By all means," I responded gladly, bringing the tandem to a halt at the side of the path. "I am going as far as Woodview."

"Woodview?" said the young man with a start, looking at me with sudden interest.

"Yes," I answered, growing suspicious in a moment; "do you know it?"

"Only by name," he replied carelessly; "I am almost a stranger here."

"Well, jump up," I answered.

"If you will allow me," said the young man, "I will mount in front, I am heavier than you are; it will make us travel better."

"Very good," I answered, seeing the force of his remark.

How that fellow could go! Onward and upward we flew; at length, in spite of the heat, his energy infected me, and I found myself ankling away eagerly.

He maintained a silence during the ascent. At length we arrived at the top where a cooling breeze greeted us.

Before us the hill dipped at a steeper gradient into the flat country beyond, while, just in front of us to the right, I could see the line of trees which ran along the lane to Marion's home.

"We are nearly at my destination now," I said, as he swung low over the handle bars and began to pedal more rapidly than ever.

"Yes, indeed," he replied.

"Hullo, man, steady!" I cried, "you will go past the lane at this rate."

"Oh, no, I shall slow up soon enough."

"I say," I cried again, "can't you pull up, here's the turn."

For answer he only worked harder. The machine swerved slightly as I endeavoured to guide it round.

"Steady," he roared, "or you will be killed." In another moment we were far down the road in a whirl of dust.

"What do you mean by this conduct," I exclaimed, now thoroughly angry. It dawned upon me that this was some reckless bounder, who wished to get a lift at my expense. "I see your game, but you will find you are dealing with the wrong man."

"Don't try to stop now," he answered doggedly; "we shall both be killed if you do, and that would mar your satisfaction at finishing me. But let me beg of you," he continued earnestly, "not to make a fuss when we get to the bottom. Don't tell anyone about this ride," he glanced over his shoulder for a moment; "for Marion's sake. I can't explain now."

"What on earth do you mean?" I cried in utter astonishment.

"I can't explain now," he repeated; "you shall know all later on."

He relapsed into silence. Indeed, there was little time or power for speech in that breakneck rush; all our energies went in holding on like grim death. The brake was on the front wheel and my companion did not use it.

Now a lumbering load of hay appeared before us, zig-zagging down the steep incline.

He rang the bell madly, but the lethargic countryman could not be aroused.

How the mad rider did it, I do not know; calculating the position to a nicety, he shot through the couple of feet of space allowed us, in safety, the hay sweeping stingingly against our faces as we did so.

We scarcely heard the growling exclamation of the driver, we must have been a quarter of a mile away before he had finished.

Then the descent became less steep as it sloped towards the level country.

Before us, a railway line wound through the fields, while the tall signal posts of a little wayside station rose on our left.

Suddenly my companion sat up, and the hiss of the brake told me that our journey was at an end.

Pulling up by the side of the road we dismounted, covered with dust and streaming with perspiration.

"We part here," said the madman, for that he was one, I was, by this time, firmly convinced.

"I am more grateful to you than I can tell for the assistance you have given me. You have, you will be glad to hear, done a service for one you love. Good-bye, sir"—stretching out his hand—"I am sincerely sorry for the trouble I have given you."

I found myself shaking hands with this strange man in silent amazement.

"But tell me——" I began.

"Nothing now," he interrupted promptly; "it would be neither advisable nor is there time."

A long whistle sounded down the line.

He started, and again wishing me a hurried "Good-bye," he ran towards the station.

The train came slowly to a standstill and I saw him spring lightly into it. He turned slightly as he did so, and I saw that he now wore a light beard.

What did it all mean? At all events here I was, I had to face a mile and a half of stiff hill, puzzled, dust-covered and tired as I was.

There was nothing for it, so I started stiffly to face my task.

In a short time I met the haycart coming slowly towards me. The carter gazed at me stupidly and pulled up his horse.

"Be you one o' they chaps that buzzed past me just now up there?"—he jerked his head backward

Digitized by Google

"Yes I am," I replied.

"Be you mad?" was his next query.

"Well, no, I hope not," I answered half laughing.

"If you bean't, t'other chap wuz," was his ultimatum as he cracked his whip and resumed his journey.

Certainly I did not blame him for his deduction.

At length I arrived at Woodview. Marion was in the garden talking earnestly to her father.

As the gate swung open they turned towards me. What was this? No sign of pleasure on their white faces.

"How are you, my boy" said Mr. Duncan kindly. Then turning to his daughter, he continued: "Do as you think best, Marion, I can trust you to act rightly," and without another word, he entered the house.

"Marion, dear, what is the matter?" I asked anxiously.

"Oh, Jack, I can't tell you," said the girl with a sob; "but we mustn't be engaged any more—we mustn't really—it's for your sake Jack, indeed it is, but I must break it off."

"Marion, what is it?" I cried aghast.

"I can't tell you, dear, you'll know soon enough, to-night perhaps, but you must take this now"—and she drew a flashing circlet from her hand.

"Has it anything to do with the fellow I met on the road," I asked, my head in a whirl from all the strange events of the afternoon.

"What fellow?" said Marion eagerly.

I then told her what had happened and described the man I had met.

"Yes," she said, when I had finished; "that must have been Dick—my step-brother—you know I have often spoken about him—and you helped him"—after a pause—"yes, I do thank you—and now dear, please go; I want to be alone." And I went, sorely stricken and puzzled.

I walked back to the town slowly. The newspaper boys were shouting "Speshul" with more than ordinary eagerness.

"Great robbery in Birmingham. £10,000 stolen. Escape of the criminals!"

Hastily buying a paper I tore it open. I somehow felt that here was a key to the mystery.

There it was, sure enough, in white and black.

"A daring robbery has been perpetrated on the well-known firm of Messrs. Trucott and Willis, of Birmingham, whereby they have lost a sum of about £10,000. It appears that to meet some special calls, gold to the above amount had been placed in the firm's safe, the night before last.

"Besides the partners, but two men; Henry Thomas and Richard Trent"—Heavens! that was Marion's brother—"both trusted employées, had access to the safe. Thomas, the elder of the two, did not return to work after luncheon yesterday, but Trent, who lodged with him, finished his day as usual.

"The robbery was discovered before business hours this morning by Mr. Willis who went early to the office to have some letters typed. Somehow Trent must have got wind of this, for when the police went to arrest him at his lodgings, he had fled. He had, however, the audacity to address a letter to the firm, declaring that he was innocent."

That was all, but it was enough. I had helped a criminal to escape. I had seen his disguise as he entered the train. At all events I could put the police on his track. Stay!—Marion's brother—his words came back to me. "Don't tell anyone about this ride, for Marion's sake."

What was I to do? I hurried to my lodgings and threw myself into a chair. Marion had released me because she believed him guilty. Was it only a dodge on his part to work on my feelings—that mention of Marion's name? How had he known me?

I confess I never felt so perplexed in my life. Liverpool would swallow him up and hide him, as it had many before if I only held my tongue.

At length I resolved to do nothing. Marion, of course, was the chief factor in this decision, but somehow the man struck me as honest, and then there was his letter—perhaps there was more in it than the newspaper reporter supposed.

I rose next morning and set about my business with a heavy heart. I had never for an instant wavered in my feelings towards my fiancée, and, now that I knew all, I was determined to go out to Woodview as soon as possible and set things straight between us.

It was with a sigh of relief that at four o'clock I turned the key in my desk and set out on my mission.

Again I traversed that long white hill but in a very different mood from that of the day before. Then all was well, now a cloud of trouble hung over the house of my beloved.

There she was in the garden; I almost fancied that she was waiting for me.

I need not go into our conversation during the next half hour, it suffices to say that as we sat there together in the evening sunlight something again sparkled on the third finger of her left hand.

The gate swung open.

"A telegraph boy," cried Marion; "what can it be?"

"Miss Duncan, ninepence to pay for delivery," said the stolid youth.

Marion seized the envelope and tore it open with trembling fingers, then, with a glad cry, she handed me the slip of paper.

"Have caught thief—DICK."

"Here, boy, keep the change," I cried joyfully, tossing a half a crown to the youngster, who pocketed it with a grin.

"Father, father, come here, it's all right!"

Mr. Duncan appeared at the door.

"It's all right, father, Dick is innocent and he has caught the thief, see, here is his telegram."

"Thank Heaven," said Mr. Duncan fervently; "I am as glad for your sake my dear girl, as for him, and you, my dear fellow," he said, turning to me; "you did not desert us in our trouble."

For answer Marion shyly held out her left hand. "Ah, I see," said her father, smiling. "Well, Jack is no fair weather friend—now, I suppose, neither of you want me particularly just now."

The short account of his adventures, told us by Dick Trent himself, is the best way in which I can tell his story.

"You know I lodged with Thomas," he began. "A quiet, decent sort of fellow. On the day he bolted I went out before him, but, having forgotten my gloves, I ran back. I found him closing a small, strong leather bag. He seemed greatly put out at my reappearance, but I thought nothing of it at the time.

"When I returned from the office, as you know, he was not there. Although I had not the slightest idea of the truth, I took a look through his papers, to see if he had left any message.

"I found nothing but a scrap of crumpled paper with a Liverpool address on it, and a time table. I went to bed late that night. I could only think that he had been intrusted by the firm with some sudden and important business.

"Just as I was starting for work next morning a boy brought me a note. '£10,000 missing at office. T. and you suspected.—R. S.'"

"Who is 'R. S.'?" I asked.

"R. S. is the young lady typewriter," said Dick with a blush, but that is another story.

"I did not know what to do; if I gave myself up, I thought that the possible delay might let Thomas slip off, besides—I suppose I was a fool—I wanted to do a bit of good 'on my own,' if I could. I can see how it all worked out beautifully against me, now.

"Well, to make a long story short, I ran and walked from Birmingham to Ellingham. I knew that the stations were watched, and by the aid of my future brother-in-law, I managed to catch a train to Liverpool.

"There, at the address I had found—Thomas' only slip—I ran my gentleman to earth in a quiet lodging, with all his cash."

"How did you know I was Marion's fiancé?" I asked.

"By that little locket on your chain," replied Trent smiling. "I ought to know it, for Marion commissioned me to buy it."

That is the whole story. Dick Trent is now in Thomas' position, with excellent prospects. As for R. S., well, there is to be a double wedding some time about Christmas.

C. G. F. Chute.

Digitized by Google

The Coward.

WHOSE BRAVERY WON HIM A WIFE.

A DREADFUL panic passed in an instant down the narrow-crowded street. Women screamed helplessly and fled, clutching at their children as they ran. Men shouted impossible directions while they fought blindly to reach a place of safety. Scarcely half a dozen people retained any semblance of self-possession, and even these were helpless against the surging multitude. The panic was terrible, the confusion became worse every moment.

"Stop! Hold it! Catch the bridle! Pull it back!"

The crowd, acting on blind instinct, divided into two portions scarcely separated from each other. Through the narrow passage thus formed, the runaway horse swept like a whirlwind, his nostrils distended, eyes bloodshot, neck and shoulders flecked with foam. The rider, a girl apparently not much out of her teens, had lost all control over the animal, and only retained her seat with difficulty.

About a hundred yards further, the street turned at right angles into a narrow footpath, and practically ended in a high stone wall.

A terrible cry arose from the crowd as they realised the almost inevitable tragedy. The girl herself seemed to lose her presence of mind, she began to sway helplessly in the saddle, her hands left the reins and grasped the saddle bow with despairing energy.

At that moment a man dashed forward and seized the hanging reins with his right hand and then with both. It was not a time for gentle measures. He pulled ferociously, savagely, as though he would wrench the animal's mouth asunder. He was whirled from the ground and swept forward apparently helpless. If he loosened his grip of the reins for one moment he would assuredly have been under the horse's hoofs the next.

But he hung on with grim determination, a quality quite as useful in mastering animals as men. The runaway fought on a few steps more, then hesitated, and finally stood still, his hide steaming, trembling in every limb. As for the man who had just conquered him, he sank to the ground, apparently seriously injured.

As soon as affairs reached this stage, the supply of heroes became greater than the demand. One assisted the girl to the ground, another attended to her refractory steed, while yet a third enlisted the services of a cabman.

Grace Lauraine accompanied her rescuer, bidding the man drive to the nearest doctor. This by good luck happened to be the medical adviser to the Lauraine family, and an aspirant, indeed, for a still closer connection with at least one member of it.

Doctor Horace Lloyd welcomed his visitors with great pleasure. He was very pleased Miss Lauraine had brought the gentleman who had saved her life to his house instead of to the hospital. Of course, anyone who had been able to do Miss Lauraine a service was a person to be courted—not to say envied, added the gallant doctor. Miss Lauraine had thought of—oh, nonsense! Wouldn't hear of such a thing. Mr. Dean Howard—he hoped he had the name correctly—must stay with him, for a while, at any rate.

He poured out all this and a great deal more at such a rate that Miss Lauraine was scarcely able to say a word, much less refuse his offer. It is probable indeed that in her heart she was grateful for his kindness, and, as this was exactly the reward which he coveted, the arrangement was satisfactory all round.

At this moment the housekeeper entered to say the bed-room was ready for the invalid. Miss Lauraine took her leave, promising to call next day, her rescuer was carefully carried upstairs and put to bed, and the doctor himself, after all these matters were satisfactorily arranged, returned to his study feeling he had at least turned into the unfrequented path—for it is not a highway, with all deference to the phrasemaker—which would lead him to success.

A small leather pocket-case lying upon the floor attracted his attention as he entered the room. He picked it up, guessing immediately that it had fallen from Dean Howard's pocket, as they lifted him from the sofa. A glance inside the pocket-case, while it verified his surmise, only increased his curiosity, a feeling which he had always subordinated to honour. He took a seat by the fire and carefully set himself to learn the visitor's history.

The first half-dozen papers he looked at were unimportant, except for the fact that they proved Dean Howard to be a gentleman both by birth and education, albeit fallen upon somewhat evil days. Presently, however, the doctor came to a letter written by a woman of considerable age, if the long, quavering loops, and the rigid appearance of the smaller strokes, could be relied upon.

The doctor read this letter several times, and each time with increasing astonishment. When he had thoroughly mastered its contents, he replaced it, and put the pocket-case in his desk to be returned to the owner at the first opportunity.

Doctor Horace Lloyd was a man who deceived himself almost as much as he deceived other people, which was saying a great deal. His desire to be the husband of Grace Lauraine sprang from purely mercenary motives, a fact he would be the last to admit, even to himself. He was a man who could play boldly when the stakes were sufficiently high to tempt him. In the present instance he judged that the frequent visits which he anticipated Miss Lauraine would make to his house, coupled with the remembrance of his kindness to her rescuer, could not fail to advance his wooing. In his own mind he tried to convince himself, with considerable success, that his hospitality was merely a proof of his generous heart.

As luck would have it, Mrs. Lauraine took a great liking to Dean Howard, that sort of wistful affection often evinced by ladies who are nearing the meridian, towards young men of their acquaintance.

So far the game was going exactly as the doctor wished, for the good lady developed a habit of making frequent visits to his house, accompanied by her daughter. On these occasions the invalid, who was fast becoming a convalescent, would be assisted downstairs, and the evening pass all too quickly.

This probably applied more to the invalid himself than to any of the others. He had only his own thoughts for company during the greater part of the day. These naturally led him to the occasions when the monotony of solitude was relieved by Mrs. Lauraine and her daughter. He began to anticipate their visits with dangerous longing, but it was only a chance remark by one of the others which revealed to his mind how much the presence of Grace Lauraine added to his happiness.

Digitized by Google

Affairs were drawing to a climax all round. The maternal eye of Mrs. Lauraine soon discovered the direction in which both the doctor and his guest were drifting, and although she appreciated in the state of affairs a compliment to herself (as indeed she did in nearly everything that happened, in which she was at all concerned), the situation was nevertheless perplexing. From the personal point of view she preferred Dean Howard, but then she knew practically nothing of his character or social position. He was curiously reticent on the latter point. On the other hand, the doctor was undoubtedly a rising man in his profession; steady, clever, well connected, but—Mrs. Lauraine had set her heart upon the other man.

Two or three evenings later Dr. Lloyd went far towards solving her difficulties. Under a pretext of showing her a new suite of furniture he had purchased, he led the way to his study. As soon as he had installed his visitor in a cosy armchair by the fire—

"My dear Mrs. Lauraine," he said soothingly, as though he were addressing a patient, "I have a very painful communication to make to you. Please don't move," he added, as she started in some alarm to her feet, "it won't take me long to say what I have to say. Afterwards you can judge for yourself whether I was justified in telling you."

Mrs. Lauraine had not belonged to the feminine sex for fifty years for nothing. She began to simmer in a state of gentle curiosity.

"It concerns our mutual friend, Mr. Howard," continued the smooth, hard voice. "He dropped a pocket-book in the hall the other day. The housemaid brought it to me, and thinking it belonged to a patient, I opened it in order to discover the owner. The first paper I looked at was a letter beginning 'My dear boy,' and signed 'Your disappointed mother, Catherine Howard.'"

"His mother," murmured Mrs. Lauraine.

"Precisely! Of course I only noticed the signature after reading the letter through."

"Yes, of course. And what did she—what was in the letter?"

It was a pity that the smile upon the doctor's face was not visible to Mrs. Lauraine, owing to his having purposely chosen a seat in a dark corner.

"In her letter," continued the smooth voice, into which there crept a faint ring of triumph, "Mrs. Howard disowned her son. She said he had disgraced the family for ever. He had made their name a byword in the county. He had committed an unpardonable crime."

Mrs. Lauraine saw her favourite being pulled to pieces; but she made no sign of protest. Her daughter's happiness was at stake, and, although the doctor's news hurt her more than she would have cared to confess, she steeled herself to endure, though she could not entirely conceal the distress she felt. Surely the feeling which caused her to push her chair back among the shadows was pardonable.

"They had obtained for him a commission in the 175th Hussars, in which he had risen to the rank of captain. When the South African trouble broke out, his regiment was ordered to the front. During the great fight at Glencoe he disappeared. It was thought he had been taken by the enemy, but after the battle he was discovered in his tent, white-faced and trembling. White faced and trembling!" he repeated, with merciless emphasis. "He said he had been taken ill; anyhow, he sent in his papers immediately afterwards and retired, but certainly not 'without a stain on his character' as they say."

Mrs. Lauraine sank still further back amongst the shadows, feeling that her latest ideal was irretrievably shattered. Herself the daughter of a soldier, and a V.C. at that, she had always been taught that cowardice was the one unforgivable sin. She remembered how Dean Howard had told her, only the other day, that he was the nephew of a retired general, whose displeasure, however, he had incurred. But even yet, though sorely assailed, her woman's heart refused to yield its faith without a struggle.

"He showed no signs of cowardice when he saved Grace's life," she said, speaking with the greater warmth because she instinctively felt her cause was unworthy of it.

"No one is either a hero or a coward all his life," said the doctor carelessly. "Human nature, or rather human character, is not unlike a pendulum."

"Did Mrs. Howard's letter tell you all this?" asked Mrs. Lauraine, firing her last shot, "I should scarcely have expected her to go so much into detail."

"She did not do so. The letter merely showed me where to look, and I obtained most of the information from an old newspaper file. But, my dear Mrs. Lauraine," he said earnestly, trying in vain to banish the ring of triumph which ran like an undercurrent through all he said. "I hope you understand how painful this duty has been to me. In these few weeks he has become more to me than many friends I have known all my life."

"It's very creditable to you," stammered Mrs. Lauraine, who was completely upset, "I am sure—it has been a shock—quite a shock—of course it's utterly impossible—now—I must tell—must arrange——"

"I thought it my duty to let you know," continued the doctor, gauging her weak, good-natured face with professional accuracy. "They are alone now," he added, as though speaking to himself.

"Come," said Mrs. Lauraine, speaking with that unnatural energy sometimes displayed by easy-

The girl was swaying helplessly in the saddle, when suddenly a man dashed forward and seized the hanging reins with both his hands going people, "let us return to the drawing-room, they will think we are lost."

Digitized by Google

The inevitable reaction overtook her as she entered the drawing-room, closely followed by the doctor. She felt a vague desire to sit down somewhere by herself and have a good cry. Then a sudden anger possessed her against the man who had so upset her peace of mind and disturbed the harmony of affairs generally.

But all these vague fits of petulance disappeared in a moment before the shock of another surprise, greater if possible than that she had already experienced.

Dean Howard advanced slowly to meet her, leading Grace by the hand. One glance at her daughter's face told its unerring tale to Mrs. Lauraine. She turned towards the doctor with a mute interrogation, in which dismay and triumph were curiously blended.

"With your consent, Mrs. Lauraine, Grace has promised to become my wife." Then he turned his honest eyes towards the doctor. "We have no secrets from you, Horace," he added, "you have been more than a friend to both of us."

The doctor dashed the proffered hand aside. For once in his life he was completely taken by surprise. The inherent brutality of his nature broke away from all restraint.

"I congratulate you," he sneered, "on having surprised me. I did not think it possible. As for the other matter, I will reserve my congratulations until Mrs. Lauraine sanctions them."

Dean Howard and Grace looked from one to the other in utter bewilderment. Mrs. Lauraine made a slight forward movement in answer to the doctor's challenge.

"I think—would you—will you come into the next room, Mr. Howard," she said, "if Dr. Lloyd will kindly allow us?"

The doctor bowed and smiled. But it was not a pleasant smile by any means.

At this moment the door was suddenly opened from the other side. The little housemaid, trembling with a sense of sudden importance, announced the arrival of General Sir Poynter Howard.

The gallant general was in the room almost before she had reluctantly allowed the last syllables of his name to pass from her lips. He bowed vaguely to them all, but it was towards Dean Howard that his glance was mainly directed, and it was Dean Howard's hand he grasped in a decidedly friendly manner.

"My dear boy," he cried presently, when the introductions were complete. "Why on earth didn't you let me know of your illness? I only heard of it accidentally. Always risking his life for other people," he added, turning to the astonished doctor, "ever since he was an Eton boy."

Mrs. Lauraine began to feel more and more mystified. Surely the General would scarcely speak of his nephew in this affectionate, almost admiring way if the latter were indeed a coward. She glanced appealingly towards the doctor, but was met by a stony stare.

As a matter of fact, that worthy was beginning to feel more uncomfortable than Mrs. Lauraine herself. His native shrewdness already suggested the mistake which had been made, and the same useful quality was presently employed in considering how best to extricate himself all round.

With the arrival of the General, the question which had previously caused so much commotion appeared to have been temporarily postponed by general consent. Dean Howard, who was too honest himself to distrust other people easily, had already satisfied himself in his own mind as to the probable reason for his friend's sudden fit of rudeness, and when the doctor presently seated himself beside Grace, he smiled with renewed pleasure. Probably Horace wished to beg her pardon, he thought. Well, he knew she was not hard-hearted, and especially not at that moment. And as for himself, he had won the prize for which they had both striven, and the winner can always afford to be magnanimous.

"Can you ever forgive me for my boorish display just now?" murmured the doctor to Grace.

"I hardly expected it from you of all people," she said reproachfully, "and after all your previous kindness."

"You can surely guess the reason?" he whispered excitedly. "The news was quite unexpected; I had hoped—no matter what; I have no real excuse, and can only throw myself on your forgiveness. I have lost everything else."

Dr. Lloyd excelled in two useful arts. He was a consummate actor, and he understood the ramifications of that wonderful maze—a woman's heart—to perfection. In the present instance he said just enough for his purpose and not one word more. And as he expected, and indeed intended, he was forgiven as thoroughly and heartily as only a woman can forgive.

"I suppose you'll be leaving us all now and setting up house in great state near Dean's uncle," he said presently.

Grace shook her head doubtfully. "I don't know how the General will take the news of our engagement," she said; "he seems friendly enough now, but it seems he practically disowned Dean only three months ago."

"Hard luck," murmured the doctor, trying to restrain his eagerness, "College bills, I suppose?"

"Oh, no, nothing of that sort. Do you remember a few years ago reading in the paper about a young soldier named Howard, who was practically dismissed from the Army for cowardice at Glencoe?"

The doctor bent his head thoughtfully to one side ere he replied with a doubtful affirmative.

"Well, that was the General's only son. After the scandal the son left home. The General gave him five hundred pounds to leave the country, and then asked Dean to take his place as the son of the family and heir to everything. Dean refused, out of a feeling of honour towards the scapegoat. The General was very choleric and—and they parted."

The thought of that misleading letter lingered still in the doctor's mind. "I suppose the mother didn't like her son being sent away, coward though he was?"

"Dean showed me a letter she had written to him—to her son," she added, "saying how disappointed she was. She addressed it to Dean in mistake, being in such terrible trouble, and so upset at the time. It reached him on the same day he saved my life, and he has since returned it."

The doctor had had quite enough of explanation by this time, but one thing more remained to be done. He made his way across the room and explained the mistake to his fellow conspirator, binding her over to secrecy in their joint interest. Mrs. Lauraine was only too pleased to promise anything so long as she could keep her good opinion of Dean Howard.

"By-the-bye," said the General presently, producing a newspaper cutting with great pride and handing it over to his nephew, "Your cousin has turned out all right after all. Joined the ranks of the 14th Hussars and sailed with them to the Cape. And now he's been mentioned in despatches and promised a commission, and will probably get the V.C. as well," added the old soldier, unable to retain his pride. He turned towards his nephew with a sudden remembrance—"It's as well you didn't take me at my word the other day. The old homestead will go down in regular succession now, I suppose, but anyhow, the Grange at Silstead is yours whenever you like to settle down there—find a wife and that sort of thing."

The young man sprang to his feet at this unexpected but delightful offer.

"I have already found a wife, uncle," he said, "if her mother will only consent."

Mrs. Lauraine raised no objections this time. And the General, who had taken a fancy to Grace from the moment he entered the room, smiled approvingly all round.

Frank Wall.

KIND PARTY: "Why are you crying like that, my little boy?" Little Boy: "Cause it's the only way I know how."

"I NEVER give money to beggars in the streets," said the pedestrian. "But, my dear sir," returned the beggar, "I can't afford an office these hard times. You expect too much."

Digitized by Google

HOLD YOUR PEACE.

A Tale of a Modern Enoch Arden.

"Tell us a story, Gentleman Joe—unless we are all to cut each other's throats in this awful heat."

The sun had gone down, a ball of liquid fire in piled up cloudsoforange, tipped with bronze. The sky was like copper. In all the wide plain not a breath of air stirred. The weather was of that quality that works madness in men's blood; slight provocations brought about quarrels to the death.

Gentleman Joe turned slowly round from his contemplation of the camp fire we were bound to keep going because of the beasts that roamed the plain at night. We made it as small as we dared.

"Tell you a story, mates? My best are all told."

Gentleman Joe passed his hand through his scanty, grey locks, and mopped the perspiration from his face. He looked round the group with keen, kindly eyes, and smiled.

"Dig something more out of your memory, old man," Big Dan said eagerly, "give us a yarn to make us forget this blooming plain." Well, his language was not as mild as I have put it, I tone it down for civilised folks.

"Yes, go on, old chap. Who's got a chance of sleeping on a night like this? Give us something to think of besides the heat!"

A great red moon climbed into the copper sky over the edge of the plain. Away to the south, angry voices of beasts disputing over their prey were carried to us on the breathless night. Someone threw a stick on the fire to keep it smouldering. Then we lay still—as still as the heat would let us, whilst Gentleman Joe yarned to us. We had always called him that ever since he joined us. God knows whether he had a real right to the title, but our roughest chaps paid him a sort of deference. We never knew what his antecedents had been—none of us ever knew.

He was silent a moment before he began that yarn. His eyes looked far away over the greyness of the plain under the red moon. Then he said:

"Reminds me of a harvest moon at home."

Some of us stirred uneasily. Queer recollections came to most of us, I expect, but nobody spoke, and he went on:

"I haven't got any of the usual tales in my head to-night. I guess that moon—and—and other things, make me think of old England, and of something that happened to me. 'Twas a queer sort of a business, and I don't say that I was right in what I did. I don't say I was wrong either. I've often thought about it since, and wondered. I did what came into my mind to do at the minute. God knows I acted for the best—but sometimes I wonder whether I did right—or wrong.

"I'm getting on in years now. It all happened many and many a year ago, but it comes back to me to-night as if it was yesterday. I was a young chap—when I last saw a harvest moon rise over a cornfield at home."

He stopped for a minute, and I could have sworn somebody choked and gulped. Men get a bit foolish when the heat takes hold of their brains, and they begin to think of green lanes, and trees, and of grass that isn't as brown as the sand on the sea shore.

None of us said a word, and Gentleman Joe went on. I believe he had forgotten the place where he was, and the still, deadly heat, and everything, except that cornfield somewhere in old England.

"I was courting in harvest time," he said; "we would walk together across the field of wheat in the sunset—she and I—and the wind would sweep down from the heath a quarter of a mile away, and bend the ears of corn, and make the red poppies bow their heads. Beyond the wheatfield was a field of barley—gold and silver she used to call them, when they shone in the sunset light as the sun dropped behind the elms in the lane.

"She was only a slip of a girl, and I was little more than a boy, but we were to be married in October. Her home and mine lay close together; I had known her always, and I—well, I was mad about her. I can see her now—walking over the cornfield, and looking back to laugh at me and call me sentimental. Ah! I was a hot wooer, and an impatient one. Her eyes were blue as the speedwell in the hedges, her face was like a briar rose—I was mad about her," he repeated slowly, "I thought—she cared for me the same as I did for her. Perhaps—she did—then. Perhaps it isn't ever fair to compare a man's love with a girl's.

"I only know I walked in Heaven those days. Sometimes we went over the fields in the evening, after the corn was cut, and it stood in sheaves among the stubble, and a great red moon came up over the elms. The world was fairyland to me—then.

"We were to be married in October, and then I was to go out West to a ranche that was waiting for me. In the Spring I was to come back and fetch Kitty. That was the plan. But plans don't always pan out right, any more than other things do." His usually gentle voice suddenly sounded hard, but it softened again at once.

"Well, we were married in October—Kitty and I—and I was the happiest chap in the British Empire that day. She looked—I can't tell you how she looked on her—wedding day. Her white gown shone as she came up the church to my side, and the sun came in through the coloured glass of the windows, and made great purple splashes over its whiteness.

"An old chum of hers and mine—Dick Lane, I'll call him—was my best man. I never guessed—not then—that he had felt for Kitty something of what I felt for her and that she——

"Never mind about that. She and I were married. We walked down the church path together, man and wife—and the yellow leaves of the chestnut tree made a carpet for us to walk on to the lych gate.

"There was a cottage down the lane. Kitty and I went there, and for a month I was happy as a king. Nothing came to spoil my happiness. Life seemed to stretch before me like a path of gold.

"And then I went away. I left my wife there, in our little home, where she had old friends about her, and my mother just up the road to take care of her till I could fetch her in the Spring. Her own people, too, were close at hand; I felt she would be safe. It gladdened me to leave her as my wife; I had had hard work to persuade her to marry me so quickly, but she had agreed at last, and I thought that she was as happy as I. But the parting was bitter—the parting was bitter.

He was silent again after those words—a long, long silence.

"I went West," he resumed abruptly, "and got started with my ranche. I prospered mightily. Nothing has prospered so well with me since. Perhaps I have never had much heart for it! When I was getting ready Kitty's home, everything went well. I felt myself just the luckiest chap alive. I could have sung all day for gladness. I counted the days till Spring should come, and I panned out just how everything would be when she and I drove up to the ranche together.

"That didn't all pan out the same as I meant either. There's a funny sort of muddle sometimes about this business we call Life.

"I built my house, mostly with my own hands, my mate on the ranche giving me a help now and then. I tell you I made that house a cosy place for my little girl, and the room that was to be her sitting-room was the one I spent most thought and time over. I tried to see it all with her eyes—the eyes of a girl fresh from the old country—and I don't believe she'd have been dissatisfied with it if she'd got there.

"But she never came—she never came."

Another long, long pause whilst the red moon climbed higher in the copper sky, and turned slowly into a golden ball that seemed to hang far down into the plain.

"Life out West was wild in those days—wilder by a long chalk than it is now," he said at last. "You've heard my tales about the times we had with Indians. But you never knew before, that when I was raided there on the ranche, and taken to the Apache camp, I had a wife waiting for me in England. I never told you that, I didn't seem able to talk about it before even though it's half a lifetime and more ago—half a lifetime and more ago," he repeated like one in a dream.

"I haven't got to go into all the story of that raid again, you know about that. You know, because I've told you over and over again how they came upon me when my mate was away in the township and I was alone. They drove off my beasts, and they burnt the house I'd built for Kitty, and they carried me away—and for seven long years I never heard my mother tongue nor saw a white man's face.

"It's no use to tell you about those years. Most of it you know already. What I haven't told, I can't tell now, and that's the awful agony I went through thinking of my girl waiting for me in the old country, and fancying what her anguish must be. It won't bear talking about—even now. Then I got free—you know that tale too—and my first thought was to make tracks for England, and put my poor little wife out of her torture. Mind you, I was certain it must be the same torture for her as it had been for me—only worse, because she had had the burden of suspense to carry.

"Many and many a time my heart grew sick with longing in those weeks before I set foot in England, and started on the last bit of my journey. I had to tramp it. Maybe I was foolish—maybe wise, but something inside me prevented me from sending to let my friends know that I was coming. An awful terror that they might be dead, and Kitty too, made me dread to write to them. I thought I would just tramp home to see for myself.

"It was Spring time when I reached the village.

"The cuckoos were calling across the cornfield, and the larks sprang from under my feet, singing as only English larks can sing. The elms were bursting into leaf, the high hedges in the lane were covered with primroses, in the cottage gardens I saw great clumps of daffodils.

"Round the old church the rooks wheeled and cawed. Everything looked so exactly as it had looked when I went away, that I took heart and began to think I'd been a fool for my fears.

"But something still held me back from going straight to the cottage where I had left Kitty. Maybe I was afraid she wouldn't know me now I was a rough-looking tramp with a beard into the bargain.

"I noticed that the people who passed me in the lane showed no sign of recognition, it brought back my fears again.

"Presently, as I came to the lych gate, I saw a lot of people in the churchyard, folks going and coming, and a kind of look of bustle. The chestnut tree that was yellow when I went away was putting out green fingers now. It made my heart beat to see them!

"A boy slouched up to the gate. It was nobody I knew, so I said to him:

"'What's to do in the church to-day?'

"'Wedding,' he answered, all short, country fashion.

"'And whose wedding might it be?' I asked, wondering whether it was one of my old friends.

"'Widder Craven's wedding,' he said.

"Then I gave a great jump and looked at him.

"Craven was my name—or, rather, the name I'm giving you for mine—and I thought it must be my mother he meant—my mother who had been a widow for years and years.

"'Widow Craven?' I said, after him.

"'Yus, widow Craven, she's going to marry Muster Dick Lane. She lives in the cottage down the lane. Her first husband he went to foreign parts, seven years ago, and he was killed by the Indians—scalped they do say.'

"I caught at the gate and stared hard at the boy. I couldn't say a word, something struck me dumb.

"'What's up, muster,' he said, eyeing me uneasily, 'did you know poor Muster Craven?'

"'Yes—no—at least, I've heard of him,' I said, pulling myself together under the lad's fixed gaze. 'So he's dead, is he?'

"'Yus, he's dead right enough. His widow, she waited to know for sure that he was dead, and his mate brought home some of his things to her, so they say. So she's going to marry Muster Lane. Some say he was her first love. Maybe you'd like to see the wedding, muster? They're coming down the street now.'

"I turned and looked up the village, towards the cottage by the cornfield where I had said good-bye to Kitty, and I could see a party of folks coming along the highway, and I felt something inside me freeze into stone as I looked.

"I could have begun by knocking the lad down when he told me that tale, now I just felt dumb.

"I turned away from him, and walked up the churchyard path and into the church. It was full of people, as it had been for my wedding seven years before, but though many heads were turned as I went in, nobody knew me. I crept into a place beside the door and waited.

"I could see my mother far up the aisle. She looked older, but there was no sign of recent sorrow on her face. She had got used to my loss by that time, I supposed!

"I heard one woman say to another.

"'Poor old Mrs. Craven, this day will call her son to her mind.'

"'Aye, poor old lady,' said the other, 'twas sad too her son dying like that amongst the savages. But Muster Lane he's as good as a son to her, takes care of her rarely well, and he's waited faithful for young mistress Craven, there's no doubt of that.'

"'And 'tis true she cared for him before ever she married the other, so they say for a fact,' whispered the first woman. 'She only married young Craven because she couldn't fight against his wooing, and because her father and mother were so set on the match. This time her heart goes with her vows.'

"The freezing feeling inside me became acute pain.

"'This time her heart goes with her vows.' I tell you those words rang in my ears like a funeral knell. I wondered if they were true. I tried to tell myself that they must be false—but when I saw Kitty's face as she came into the door, I knew that I was wrong and the women were right.

"Kitty's face had never worn that look for me. I sat in the dark corner by the door and watched my wife go up the church, and that freezing feeling in my heart was like the tortures of the lost.

"She looked more of a woman—my girl did—she had grown taller, and it seemed to me that she carried herself with a kind of pride, as if she was going to a triumph. Her eyes shone like two stars; the blue in them called to my mind the blue of the summer sea. There was a smile on her lips—a smile of such love and happiness as made me feel like laying my head down on the seat and sobbing my heart out.

"She didn't wear shining white this time. Her gown was grey, and all soft and flowing. It set off her gracefulness, and made you see more plainly the blue of her eyes, and the pink colour that came and went in her cheeks.

"The sunlight came through the windows in purple splashes and fell across her dress, the same as it had fallen on our wedding day, and one sunbeam struck on her hair, and turned it to gold.

"And I sat there stock still, watching, watching, watching.

"I saw her stop by the step, and Dick Lane moved down beside her, and took her hand. I could have screamed to him to drop it—to give her up to me—but that band of ice round my heart kept me silent—I only looked, and looked, and looked.

Digitized by Google

"Then the parson began to speak, but I never heard a word of what he said, till he came to the words that went into my brain, and seared it like a red-hot iron.

"'Therefore, if any man can show any just cause why they may not be lawfully joined together, let him now speak, or else hereafter for ever hold his peace.'

"He said those words very slowly, and he stopped after he had spoken them, as though he were waiting to see if anybody would speak. And I clutched at the seat, and the thoughts that went through my mind seemed like the thoughts of months instead of only those few seconds.

"'Let him now speak, or else for ever hereafter hold his peace.'

"'Speak now—speak now,' a voice kept saying in my heart, 'speak straight out, and you'll get your wife again, and your home, and everything you care about on this earth. She is yours by every law of God and man.'

"I opened my lips to speak those words, but they would not come. I thought of Kitty, as she had been seven years ago, and I thought of what she would look like if I said those words that must bring her back to me. I tell you I seemed to see the colour fade out of her face and the happiness die out of her eyes, and the words I had heard the woman say flashed before me.

"'This time her heart goes with her vows.' If I spoke out now—I should break my girl's heart!

"'Or else hereafter for ever hold his peace.'

"'Hold thy peace—hold thy peace.' Some voice seemed to take up those words and swing them to and fro in my brain till I could hear nothing else.

"And the band of ice inside me snapped, and a fever of love and longing for Kitty ran through my veins instead, till I felt like rushing from my place, and going up the church to claim her as my own."

His voice had worked up into rapid, excited tones. All at once he became very quiet.

"It's queer how the big crisis of your life slips by, and you hardly know it's gone. I didn't move out of my place—I never uttered a sound. I said to myself, very fast and low, 'Keep still, you blithering fool. Hold your peace, and let your girl find happiness.' I wasn't going to break my darling's heart for anything in this wide earth, but I tell you it took some gripping of that seat to keep me quiet. My hands were torn and bleeding afterwards.

"'Else hereafter for ever hold thy peace.' The echo of those words still rang round my brain, when I heard the parson's voice begin again, and I knew that what I'd done, I'd done for good and all.

"I didn't know then whether I'd acted rightly. I don't know now. I just dropped down into the seat when the parson said very loud and clear:

"'What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder'—and then, because I couldn't bear any more, I got up and stumbled out of the church.

"It was all tramping for me for many a day afterwards. I'd made up my mind that nothing should ever take me back to the village again. They thought I was dead—I would be dead to them. I've not told you their right names—there's no tracing either me or them. I shall never trouble their lives any more—never any more.

"I don't want any one to judge me for what I did. Maybe I was right, maybe I was wrong. God knows. But whether right or wrong, I've kept to those words faithfully. 'Else hereafter for ever hold thy peace.'"

None of us said a word as Gentleman Joe finished. Only somebody gulped and choked again—and Big Dan put out his hand and gripped Gentleman Joe's hand hard.

Then we lay there silent, till the great yellow moon dropped over the rim of the plain, and the grey dawn crept out of the east, and day awoke in the country which is so very far away from the green old land that all of us call—Home.

L. G. Moberly.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

November 11.—The year will be rather quiet for those celebrating their birthdays on this date. Better for those in employ and elderly people. Girls will have some secret enmity working in their love affairs.

The day is good for dealing with landlords, farmers, builders, and those in authority. Don't travel or remove here.

A child born this day will be ambitious, thoughful, and persevering; fond of change, and will do best in the employ of others.

November 12.— A favourable year for business and money.

Be prepared for strong competition in business.

Young girls will need some caution and prudence with opposite sex, especially with married men and those not free to marry.

The day is good for buying and selling; defer asking favours.

A child born here will be fortunate in most things. The mind will be cheerful, active, and capable.

November 13.— The year will bring much anxiety and worry in business and general affairs to those whose birthdays fall to-day. Beware of accident and fire; give extra care to the health.

Girls born between 8 and 9 a.m. meet with disappointment in love matters.

The day is one on which to keep quiet and let others make the first move. Guard against mishap from 2 to 4 p.m.

A child born here will be fond of travel, and always unsettled.

November 14.— An unfavourable birthday. Do not speculate, and be cautious with writing and agreements.

Girls must beware of deceit from opposite sex.

The day is evil for speculation, writing letters, and doing business with young people.

A child born to-day will be careless, and a bit deceitful. Will not be fortunate in life.

November 15.—A mixed year, many ups and downs; sickness and bereavement may be expected in the family circle.

Girls meet with a lot of anxiety in love affairs. If born near 9 a.m. any engagement may be broken.

The day is good for dealing with land and houses; visit doctors, chemists, or military men. Evil for marriage and pleasure.

A child born here will be active, ambitious and daring, but will meet with many obstacles all through life.

November 16.— A good year is promised.

Favourable for new enterprises and changing residence.

Girls will find love affairs rather quiet.

A child born this day will be fortunate in most matters. The mind will be steady, penetrating and ingenious.

November 17.— Go quietly, for misfortune and loss are threatened. Insure against fire and accident.

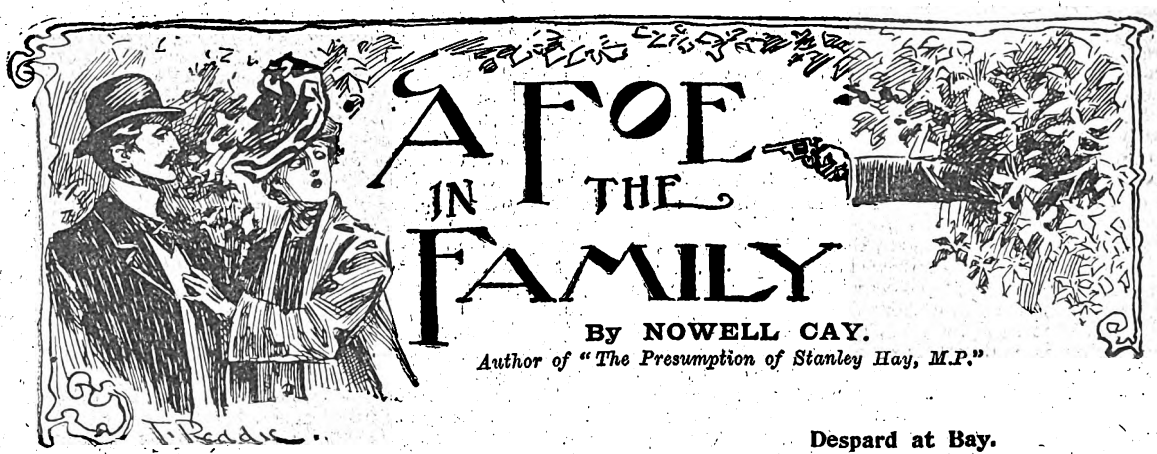
Girls born between 2 and 3 p.m or near 10 a.m. will need much care in love affairs.

The day is evil for buying, selling, signing papers and travelling.

A child born to-day will be unfortunate in life; improvident, irritable, moody, and unsettled.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google



A FOE IN THE FAMILY

By NOWELL CAY.

Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

A Plot to be Frustrated.

GEORGE ILDEN, Baron, of Ilden Castle, while staying with his uncle Jasper, at Pennybrook Hall, suddenly discovers that several suspicious events which have taken place during his stay at the Hall, point to the existence of a plot against his life. He has been shot at, poison has been placed in his pocket-flask, and other attempts, fortunately futile, have been made on his life. He confides in Cathie Hay, his cousin, and they agree that as many members of his own family would materially benefit by his death, the attempts must have their origin in that direction. They suspect Percival, Ilden's cousin. Ilden asks Cathie to marry him, as a means of circumventing his enemies' designs, but she has to refuse.

At about this time he meets Florence Courthorpe, the sister of an old college chum who was drowned while boating. She is very poor, and has taken a situation as governess at Witterby, a village not far from Pennybrook. In seeking to escape his foe, Ilden inadvertently settles down just opposite Florence's temporary home.

Late one night Florence sees a man attempt to enter Ilden's bedroom window with evident criminal designs. She leaves the house clad only in dressing-gown and warns Ilden of his danger. For this exploit her employer dismisses her.

She now has no home, so next day leaves Witterby to stay with some friends at Lallerton. Ilden accompanies her. Arrived at Lallerton, however, they discover that Florence's friends, the Despards, have left suddenly, and no trace of them can be found. Florence, of course, is greatly distressed.

Ilden, however, feeling that he is responsible for her position, and desiring to baulk his enemy, proposes to her, is accepted, and marries her secretly. An announcement in the papers informs his family of the wedding.

Shortly after their marriage Ilden receives a message urging him to return to Pennybrook, his uncle Rupert being dangerously ill. Leaving his wife at the apartments he has taken in London, Ilden leaves for Pennybrook. He is met at the Hall by Cathie, who informs him that his uncle is dead, and that he is again exposing his life to danger.

Cathie informs him of her belief that Guy Despard is in the plot, and insinuates that his own wife, being a friend of the Despards, is possibly implicated.

That night her fears for his safety are shown to be well founded. For in the middle of the night the alarm bell is violently rung, and as Ilden opens his door to ascertain the cause, an attempt is made to stab him. Ilden immediately gives chase to his would-be murderer, and, catching him, throws him down, and is half-strangling him when Grant appears with a light, the rays of which show Ilden's captive to be none other than his cousin Percival.

(The above is a short synopsis of the opening chapters.)

Despard at Bay.

GRANT was gripping his shoulder.

"What the dickens are you doing, Ilden? You are killing him."

George glanced round to where a huge clasp knife still stuck in the woodwork of the door.

"As he deserves to be killed," he said, rising to his feet. "That knife was meant for me, and it makes the sixth try that the scoundrel has had at my life. I have tried to believe that it could not be you," he went on, addressing Percival, who still lay on the floor gasping and breathless. "I knew that you have always been jealous of me, and have never lost an opportunity of doing me a bad turn, but I could not believe in my heart that an Ilden could stoop to murder. But there's no disbelieving it now."

Percival rose sulkily to his feet.

"Don't be a fool, Ilden," he said impatiently, "of course I shouldn't stoop to murder. I thought that it was Despard."

George shrugged his shoulders.

"Despard? And why should you think that Despard was coming out of my room?"

"Because I saw him getting in at your window. How the dickens was I to think that it was you taking five minutes to unlock your door as if you were afraid of making a sound and opening it like a thief—and with the alarm bell ringing all the time. I had not a moment's doubt that it was the thief himself, and that if I did not have the first blow he would."

His voice, even to Ilden's prejudiced ear, had the ring of sincerity, and once more a feeling of physical sickness oppressed him. It was bad enough to believe that his own cousin had tried to murder him. It was almost worse to think that he had suspected and accused him without a cause.

Instinctively he struggled against the idea.

"You say you saw Despard getting in at my window? Why did you not warn me?" he asked, his tone still incredulous.

"I was just going to when I heard him, as I thought, at the door. I was roused by the bell, and looking out of my window saw a ladder raised against your window, and a man whom I took to be Despard going up. I ran down to warn you——"

Grant interrupted him.

"The man must be in the room now, unless he has got away while we're wasting time here. If the ladder is there, Ilden, you can't but believe what Percy says."

George nodded.

"Yes, if the man is there, I will offer you my apologies, cousin Percival."

He was turning to the half-open door as he spoke, but Catherine, who had stood by silent and perturbed, caught at his arm.

Digitized by Google

"Not you," she whispered. "It is you that he wishes to injure."

Grant caught the words, and his handsome face darkened.

"I'll go first," he said—"I do not matter."

Percival was hanging back, evidently nervous.

Cathie flushed.

"Of course you matter. It will be better for me to go."

As a matter of fact the three pushed in together, Percival following them cautiously.

"I left the window closed," said Ilden. It was wide open now. The sash must have been thrown up during the struggle in the corridor, for no sound had been heard from the room as they talked together.

Ilden was striding across. There was no ladder raised to the sill, but as he looked down he could see two or three men struggling with it down below. They were some of the outdoor servants, who, roused by the bell, had caught sight of the ladder raised against the house, and were moving it away to cut off the supposed burglar's retreat.

The head-gardener called up an explanation when he saw heads at the open window.

Ilden turned to the room.

"Then the fellow must be in here. Will you lock the door Percy."

Lady Mary Hay, with one or two frightened servants, was entering as he spoke. They had been wandering over the house, asking each other what had happened and been attracted by the sound of voices.

"I think that you had better stay outside, Aunt Mary, and take Cathie with you," said Ilden. "If there is a man in the house he must be hiding in this room, and we have to hunt him out. I wish that you would go and stop that bell, Wardle. We don't want the whole neighbourhood here to help us with one man. We are three men to one here as it is."

In his own mind he was very doubtful whether they had even the one man to deal with. His suspicion against Percival was strong still. He noticed that his cousin was fully dressed, although he claimed to have been roused from sleep by the bell. It seemed to him as likely as not that he had placed the ladder against the house himself as an excuse for his attack, and when Catherine showed herself reluctant to accompany her mother, he raised no objection. She, Percival and Grant alone remained with him when he had locked the door to commence their search of the room.

Grant was already drawing aside curtains and throwing open wardrobe doors. Ilden was watching Percival who had seemed in two minds whether to retreat with Lady Mary and the servant-women. Percival made no pretence of searching, although his eyes followed Grant's movements with a nervous anticipation which George was inclined to put down to his certainty that the search would leave his story uncorroborated.

He was on the point of accusing him of having placed the ladder in position himself when an excited cry from Catherine made him turn quickly to find the search ended.

Drawing aside a curtain that hung before a recess near the window, Grant had revealed the figure of a man crouched back against the wall, a figure which Ilden recognised instantly.

Guy Despard had evidently been hoping to the last to avoid detection. His white, twitching face and strained eyes gave signs of the ordeal of suspense through which he had passed. He seemed a poor cowed creature as the light fell on his crouching figure.

But as Grant's exclamation and Catherine's cry showed that he was discovered, his face changed, and instead of fear came the fierceness of despair.

He pushed aside the curtain himself to spring out into the room, and Catherine uttered another cry as she realised that he had a revolver in his hand and was levelling it at Ilden. For a moment it was directed straight for his breast, the next Grant had struck it out of his hand, and with another blow which raised the poet not a little in his cousin's esteem, had sent the would-be murderer reeling back against the wall. Before he could recover himself the three were upon him, holding him down.

Not that much force was necessary. Grant's well-aimed blow from the shoulder seemed to have left him dazed and helpless. George ran his hand over his clothes.

"The fellow has no other weapon," he said, picking up the revolver. "There is no need to hold him. I have to thank you, Cousin Grant, for the way you tackled him. A moment more and he would have had a shot at me."

"It was splendid," broke in Catherine. "Grant, I admire you."

The poet flushed.

"It was nothing," he said, "but I think Ilden owes Percy an apology now for what he said outside."

George did not need the reminder. He was realising keenly that the apology was demanded. The discovery of Despard had left him without a single tangible excuse for the accusation he had made. In a sudden revulsion of feeling he had asked himself whether his suspicion itself had not been absurd and unjust.

Percival, it was true, had more than once tried to get out of some scrape or other by saddling him with the responsibility for it, but that was a different thing from plotting against his life, and he made his apology almost sincerely.

The three men were standing now at a little distance from their prisoner, who leant back against the wall glaring at Ilden like an animal at bay. The idea that the man was not wholly sane recurred to the latter's mind as he met his ferocious glance, which could not have been more hostile if he had been his greatest enemy.

"Well, the question is," said Grant, "what are we going to do with our friend now that we have got him? It is not worth while taking him over to Wentworth Gaol to-night. I propose that we lock him up in the cellar or somewhere, and get back to bed. I suppose Uncle Jasper will prosecute."

"Yes, let us get the fellow locked up and Uncle Jasper can decide what to do with him to-morrow," put in Percival, who, after his cousin's apology, still seemed nervous and ill at ease.

Something of eagerness in his manner tended to revive Ilden's suspicion against him, momentarily laid aside.

"It strikes me that it is more my business than Uncle Jasper's," he said. "And I should like to cross-examine the fellow, if he will talk."

"What is the good?" said Percival. "He will only make up some cock-and-bull story to try and hide the fact that he meant to rob you."

"I think that it is Uncle's affair," said Grant, and was surprised when the prisoner, who had stood till now absolutely silent, answered for himself.

"Lord Ilden is aware that it is a matter between himself and me. If he were not a coward he would settle it with me alone, without asking you to protect him."

George smiled.

"Possibly I might, if I had the slightest idea what the matter is; but I am glad you can speak for yourself. If you are sensible enough to tell me what I want to know, it is possible that I shall let you go. You came here with the direct intention of taking my life, I believe."

"Yes, and I will kill you yet, Lord Ilden, if

Digitized by Google

I have to follow you to the end of the earth before I succeed."

"Well, that is straightforward, at any rate," said Ilden. "I may take it, may I not, that you fired a shot at me from behind a hedge at Ilden Castle nearly six weeks ago?"

"Yes."

"And another at Kirby when I was out shooting."

"Yes."

"Well, that is honest. You also had a try at me here in the fir coppice a fortnight ago, and the next morning tried to poison my pocket-flask."

"Yes."

"May I take it that it was you also who waited outside my room at Witterby intending to shoot me, if I had not luckily been warned?"

"Yes; you have an infernal luck."

"You are a poor shot, you mean, and have less pluck than ingenuity. You see, I think, Grant, that this is more my matter than Uncle Jasper's."

Grant was listening to the long list of attempts with evident satisfaction, and it seemed to Ilden, too, that Percival was affected by it.

"But, if the man has been tracking you like this, why on earth have you not had him arrested long ago?" cried Grant.

"Because I did not remotely guess till this evening who my assailant was. Now that I have discovered him, you can understand my curiosity to know what his motive is."

"You know well enough, Lord Ilden, why you have deserved death at my hands," said the prisoner fiercely.

"I am hanged if I do."

"Then you do not know my name?"

"Pardon me. I understand that it is Mr. Guy Despard. Lady Ilden informed me of the fact a fortnight ago after I had seen her travelling with you from Pennybrook to Rickerby. But what your name can have to do with it I can't conceive. To the best of my knowledge I never heard it before my wife told me about you. I have some inquiries from her to make about your sister, her friend. But that can wait. What I want to get at——"

Percival interrupted him.

"What is the use of talking to him? The fellow is evidently mad."

"I am hoping that he is sane enough to make a bargain," said Ilden. "Look here, Mr. Despard. I have no feeling of resentment against you, any more than you can have any real resentment against me. One cannot feel resentment against a person one does not know. But I mean to get at the motive of these attempts on my life. If you are willing to help me, I will overlook what you have done, and let you go. I'll do more. If you will tell me who has employed you to take my life, I will see that you do not lose money by changing sides. If you don't, of course, I shall prosecute you. I am not vindictive, but I have to protect myself, and if you do not choose to give me the names of your accomplices, and disown them, I will take care that you are kept out of the way as long as the law can keep you—twenty years, I should guess. I'd prefer to scotch your principal, but if you prefer to shield him, I'll take good care that he shall lose the services of his agent. Come now, who has paid you to attempt my life?"

MR. DESPARD.

An expression of troubled bewilderment was stealing over the wild, desperate face of the man at bay.

"You know that nobody has paid me," he said sullenly. "You know what there is between you and me, Lord Ilden, and that only your scoundrelly life can satisfy my claim."

"Come, the man is mad," said Percival impatiently again, and reminded his cousin that some slight connection at least existed between the two.

"Does the satisfaction of this claim, whatever it may be, demand that you shall murder my cousin, Mr. Ilden, as well as myself?" he said with a glance at Percival. "He tells me that you have been following him about too."

Percival's eyes shifted uneasily under the prisoner's gaze.

"I have never seen your cousin. I have never heard his name," said Despard.

"Well, he knows yours, and seems more afraid of you than I have ever thought of being," said George, angry with his cousin for not admitting openly what his knowledge of the man really amounted to, and the bewildered look on the prisoner's face became more marked. Percival was ghastly.

"I suppose you think, Ilden, that I have put the man on your track to get into your shoes?" he said sharply. "Why don't you ask him outright? Or I will if you are afraid of putting your hints into honest words. Tell Lord Ilden, Despard, or whatever your name is, whether I have paid you to take his life. You need not be afraid to say it—he will pay you more than I could ever offer you."

George interrupted him.

"I have already apologised for my suspicion, Percy. You are not the only person who would benefit by my death. And if you would only help me by telling me what you really know of Despard, I might discover which of them is employing this fellow. I suspect that it is some money-lender who has risked too much for Uncle Jasper's reversions. Come now, you told me you thought he was a dun—who did you imagine was employing him?"

"I tell you I know nothing at all about him," said Percival angrily.

"But you knew his name. How did you learn that?"

"I asked Potter at the inn what the name of his guest was."

Percival's known partiality for the society of the village inn made the explanation a sufficiently satisfactory one, and George was surprised when the prisoner took the trouble to contradict it.

"That is not true. Nobody here knows my name," he said with an excitement that seemed to Ilden uncalled for, and he noticed that the furtive glances he gave his cousin showed now almost as much animosity as those directed against himself.

Percival had met the contradiction with a shrug of his shoulders and repeated his favourite assertion that the man was mad.

"Well, I don't see what you gain by this talk," Grant broke in. "If the fellow has accomplices, it is evident that he does not mean to give them away, and if you are not cold, Ilden, we are. Catherine will catch her death while you and Percy wrangle. I think myself that Percy is right. The fellow is simply a dangerous maniac, and ought to be dealt with by a magistrate—if you can really think of no possible grudge that he could have against you."

The tone was dubious enough to make Ilden answer emphatically:

"I swear that I never remotely heard of the man till a fortnight ago, after he had begun to follow me. But he does not seem inclined to win his freedom by telling me what I want to know, so there is nothing to do but lock him up. I am sorry I forgot how cold you must be, Cathie. I'll have another try at the fellow to-morrow."

A peremptory knock sounded at the locked door as he spoke, and Grant put an end to the informal examination by throwing it open to admit the Honourable Jasper, followed by practically all the occupants of the house, including the housemaid, who, happening to look out of her window in the night, had first caught sight of the man with the ladder and flown to the alarm bell to rouse the house.

Digitized by Google

Its master had at last with difficulty been awakened and made to understand that a dangerous housebreaker was in the place, and his arrival put an end to the suspense of the wondering crowd, which had waited outside the locked door trying to guess what was passing within.

The Honourable Jasper, himself a magistrate, was for dealing out condign and immediate punishment to the offender, but permitted himself to be persuaded to have him locked up until morning, which would find him in a more magisterial state of mind.

A crowd accompanied the unresisting prisoner to one of the empty wine cellars, which, with only a little grating in place of a window and a strongly-bolted oaken door, made a secure enough prison for the night.

George saw him locked up somewhat regretfully.

"If I could only make him speak out," he said to Catherine.

"You do not think that he is mad?" she asked, and George shook his head. After all his efforts to understand and meet a supposed plot he could not accept the idea that after all he made the object of a maniac's motiveless enmity.

"In the morning I think I shall persuade him to admit that there has been method in his madness," he said confidently.

The Bird has Flown!

THE clocks in the house were striking two as Ilden went back to his room, very well content with the night's work.

His idea that the actual attempts on his life were all the work of one man had been confirmed, and the man himself was safe under lock and key. It was true that a great deal of mystery remained. He had many things left to discover, including the identity of the prime mover of the plot, and the nature of the connection which certainly existed between his cousin Percival and the prisoner. The more he recalled what had passed the more puzzled he became. Despard's denial of all knowledge of his cousin had seemed sincere, and yet it was certain that Percival knew more of the prisoner than he would admit. Given that his explanation of the attack in the corridor was a truthful one, he must surely have been in a strange state of nervous panic to meet even a presumed burglar with a blow at the heart before he discovered whether he was even armed.

Yes, there was plenty of mystery to be cleared up, but Ilden looked forward hopefully to its elucidation.

If Despard were sane he must surely realise that he could gain nothing by silence. He would see him without the disturbing presence of his cousin, and it would be strange if he could not induce him to talk. Morning would probably see him in possession of the whole plot, and he could return to Florence with the news that their danger was at an end and that she could take up her position at Ilden Castle as its mistress. The prospect was not without its charm, although his conscience busied itself again asking whether the charm would last.

If Despard were proved to be an irresponsible madman, well, the plot would trouble them no more, because he would know that it had never existed. He deliberately closed his mind against an explanation that would render all his conjecture and planning ridiculous, and leave his marriage itself unjustified by necessity.

No; Guy Despard knew what he was doing, and had a sufficient motive. In the morning he would discover what it was. All his restless thoughts turned to the coming examination of the prisoner in the wine-cellar.

At the first streak of dawn he rose and dressed. He would get the business over and settled before any of the others were down.

Inside the house all was silent, as he made his way downstairs; but, going round to the stables, he found, as he expected, that some of the men were up and about, and he selected one of them—a young giant of a groom, with the physique of a prize-fighter—to return to the house with him. It was just as well to take every precaution.

"I am going down to have a talk with our friend, the housebreaker," he said. "I should like you to mount guard outside in case he makes any attempt at escape. You can bring a stick with you, although, as I am armed and he is not, I do not suppose there will be any need for your services."

The young man's face brightened at the commission.

"I wanted to follow him up the ladder last night, my lord," he said, "but Sanders would not hear of it. He thought it would be better to take the ladder away, and catch him inside."

"Well, I fancy it was lucky for our friend in the cellar that they did not let you get at him," said Ilden, smiling at the lust for battle that showed itself in the young giant's face. "Step lightly, there is no need for us to disturb anybody."

They were entering the house as he spoke, and made their way down to the cellar in silence. Ilden was busy arranging the arguments with which he would persuade the prisoner to make full confession. He did not speak until they had reached the solid oaken door of the temporary cell, secured by its huge outside bolts.

"You can wait here on guard," he said, as he drew them back. "I will call you if there is the slightest need."

He smiled again at the groom's eager face. Tobbitt was evidently hoping that the prisoner would prove violent.

The wine-cellar, lighted only by its tiny grating, was still in complete darkness, and Ilden struck a match as he entered, regretting that he had not brought a candle or lamp with him.

Then as the little flame flared up he stared round the bare chamber in blank dismay. The place was empty.

He struck another match to make absolutely sure of the fact, and strode out moodily to where Tobbitt, with his cudgel in position, awaited him with questioning eyes.

"The man's gone," he said without emotion. The only emotion of which he was conscious—and after the first moment of realisation it was certainly not surprise—was one which he could not show to a servant.

Tobbitt was dumfounded.

"Gone! But, my lord," he gasped, "he can't have got through that grating, and we found the bolts all right."

"Which looks, doesn't it, as though he has had a friend to assist him," said Ilden with a queer little laugh. "You need not tell anybody what has taken place—or stay, it is bound to be known, so you can say what you like. While you are here we may as well see whether all the doors and windows are secure."

He made a tour of the house perfunctorily, the groom following, to find every means of egress from the house apparently untouched.

"He must be hiding in the house, my lord," said Tobbitt.

"Or he has a friend inside who has taken the trouble to relock the door after him," said Ilden, with his puzzling tone of indifference.

The end of their tour of inspection found the household awaking. Some of the servants were coming down, and Ilden spread consternation among them by sending up a message to his uncle to tell him what had happened.

Then after dispatching Tobbitt to the station to watch the departure of the first train, almost due to start, he strode upstairs to Percival's room with set lips and a dangerous light in his eyes. He was going to find out now or never how much his cousin knew about this man Despard. Percival made a bad pretence of being roused from sleep as Ilden entered his bedroom unceremoniously.

"What's the row?" he asked with a yawn.

"You have let Despard loose. That is all," said George.

Percival raised himself on an elbow.

"What the dickens do you mean?"

"I mean that Despard has gone, and that he has been let out by somebody who is still in the house. That 'somebody' is yourself, and you can't deny it."

His cousin replied with a fine show of indignation.

"Look here, Ilden. I have put up with a good deal from you. But you are going too far. I am not going to quarrel with you, or have a family wrangle, while my father is lying dead in the house. You seem to think that it is a good opportunity to attack me. You know that I can do nothing until the poor Governor is put under the ground. But after that we will have a settlement. You shall see whether you can make any vile charge against me that comes to your lips. The last thing that the Governor asked me was that I would try and be good friends with you and I meant to do my best for his sake. But if you make it impossible, I am not to blame. But I shall respect his wishes while he is above ground. Say what you like. I shall not strike you back."

In spite of his suspicion that the man was protecting himself by an infamous hypocrisy, Ilden felt shamed. In the excitement of the last few hours he had practically forgotten his uncle, and he was touched on his tenderest point. He had shown himself wanting in respect to the dead and to the family honour.

"Very well," he said coldly, "we will postpone our understanding until the day after to-morrow. But I should like you to understand that if Despard attempts my life in the meanwhile, it may go hard with you. There are others beside myself who know that you are better acquainted with him than you are willing to admit, and the man who set him free this morning makes himself an accessory to any crime he may commit."

Percival made no reply. His resigned silence was a reproach, and George turned away with a shrug.

"All right. Our reckoning can wait, but it will be just as well for us not to meet again till we are ready for it. You cannot leave the house, so I shall. You will not see me again till the funeral at Mordenhale."

The escape of Despard had exhausted his patience, and he would have left the house without a good-bye to anybody, if Catherine had not managed to waylay him as he started.

And Catherine only made him feel angry. She could not disguise the fact that the capture of Despard had increased her suspicion against Florence, and it made her anxious to think that George was returning to his wife.

"You need not alarm yourself," he said, "I care too much for my wife's safety to return to her yet, and give our enemies the chance of discovering her whereabouts."

The fact that she found it more difficult now to suspect Percival made her sympathy of less account to him than ever, and although she insisted on accompanying him to the station again in dread that Despard might be lying in wait for him somewhere on the way, they had little to say to one another.

An infinite space of time seemed to divide him from the time when she had been his only confidante, and he told her his plans, such as they were, almost reluctantly. For the present he was going to the Castle where he would stay until his uncle's funeral, at which he was still determined to be present.

His tone prevented her even attempting to dissuade him.

"After the funeral," he went on, "Percival shall tell me plainly what he really knows about Guy Despard, or admit himself his accomplice. In the latter case, I shall put the matter into the hands of a detective while I take my wife abroad. I have kept the matter in my own hands so far for the sake of the family honour. I could not have all my father's relatives suspected and watched without a single tangible piece of evidence against one of them; but we have got something to work on now. I want Despard's antecedents looked up, and, if Percy does not choose to render it unnecessary, his dealings with my cousin. He has put himself out of the pale of consideration by this night's work."

"But supposing that Percival did not let the man out?" suggested Catherine.

But George was in no mood to debate his cousin's guilt. His mind was made up, and he would not let it revert to the old uncertainty.

Ilden was leaving the Hall, as he had come, on foot. It seemed safer than to expose himself in a carriage, if, as was probable, Despard was lurking in the neighbourhood to make another attempt on his life.

Catherine was full of nervous apprehension, and started at every sound.

"It is horrible to think that you are in just as much danger as ever," she said. "Last night I told myself that it was all over; and, after all, we have gained nothing. You are just where you were before."

"Not exactly. It is a great thing to know who my actual assailant is; and Despard cannot follow me openly. He knows that I shall have him arrested if I catch sight of him; and the fact that he is known will make him afraid to attempt my life again. If I am shot now, everybody will know who has done it. Before, he had only to avoid being caught in the act, and nobody would have thought of suspecting him. The game has become too dangerous for him."

"But he did not seem to me a man who cared whether he was caught or not, so long as he killed you," said Cathie. "And he did not seem a bit like a paid assassin. He seemed full of personal hatred against you. Are you quite sure that you have not injured him in some indirect way, perhaps through somebody that he loves. Grant says that if the man is sane, it is the only explanation of his attitude."

Ilden laughed sharply.

"The way in which we dear cousins suspect one another is delightful. I might have guessed that it was my turn, and that the person finally responsible for these attempts on my life would be made out to be myself. And who does dear Grant imagine would take the trouble to set the fellow free."

Cathie coloured.

"Of course he is absurd," she said, "but he thinks you set him free yourself to prevent him making his story public."

They reached the station as she spoke, and George was not sorry to find their tête-à-tête put an end to.

"She half believes it," he said to himself. "Thank goodness my wife has a little faith in me, or I should be left without anybody to believe in me."

Which was no doubt unjust to Catherine, who was in a panic lest Despard should be lying in wait about the station.

But the train came in and started again without any sign of the surreptitious attack which Catherine was half-expecting.

"No such luck," said Ilden to himself. "The fellow will not give us another chance of capturing him."

Digitized by Google

He had given Catherine the impression that he was returning direct to the Castle, but he had other plans of which he had not spoken to her, since it would entail his telling too much about his marriage, and giving details which could only increase his cousin's suspicion of his wife.

At Shipton Gate he left the train, and set out for Lallerton, feeling that at last he had a starting point from which to begin investigations.

The game had changed, he told himself, as he made his way on foot to the pretty village which at every turn brought back some pleasing recollection of his wife.

He went first to the cottage where Clara Wimple, the former servant of the Despards had been living. With the new light which had come to him with the detection of Despard, it had seemed to him probable that he would find in the girl his mysterious friend of the Lallerton country-road. Living as she had done in the Despard's house, she was the most likely person to have heard that his life was in danger from the brother of her mistress, and he was disappointed on calling at the cottage to find nobody there to answer his knock. He waited there until it became quite apparent that the cottage was quite deserted, and then returned to the inn where he had stayed with Florence to make inquiries. If anything had been learnt in the village about the Despards during his absence he would be sure to hear it at the inn, and he made his way across the green, framing questions for the garrulous landlady.

Here there was to be no disappointment for him.

"Now this is strange, sir," she said, "if you had only come in an hour earlier you would have saved me sending a letter."

"A letter? To whom?"

"To yourself, sir—or rather to your wife. I posted it less than an hour ago."

His mind leapt quickly to connect the rather surprising announcement with his quest.

"You have learnt something then about the people for whom I was making inquiries," he said, "Mr. and Miss Despard?"

The landlady looked surprised.

"I have seen Mr. Despard since you were here. But I did not know you would like me to write and tell you about it. He was here early this morning."

Here was more exciting news than George had expected, and his evident interest made the good lady enter well-pleased into details.

It seemed that quite early, before the tavern was actually open, and before any morning train had arrived at Shipton Gate, Mr. Despard had presented himself, looking weary and dishevelled, as if he had been up all night. He had ordered breakfast and eaten it ravenously, after which he had hired the pony-trap to drive to the neighbouring village of Castledale. The landlord himself had driven him, and had not yet returned.

"As likely as not he has driven round by way of Shipton Gate and put the gentleman down at the station there," she said. "But even if he has done that he ought to have been home before this. It is more than three hours since they started."

"And how far is this Castledale?" asked Ilden, debating mentally whether it would be better to start there at once in pursuit, or wait for the arrival of the landlord with news that might make the pursuit to the next village unnecessary.

The distance to Castledale was less than three miles, it appeared.

"Do you know whether Mr. Despard has friends there?" he asked, and the landlady shook her head.

"I have never heard of his having any friends, or Miss Despard either, except Mrs. George."

Ilden started at the name. It was that under which he and his wife had hidden their identity at Sydenham!

(Further developments of the plot are recorded next Tuesday.)

Your Editor Chats.

By the time you have read this number you will no doubt have formed an opinion as to the merits of the new series of articles by Lady Peggy Carstairs, and you will be doing your Editor a great favour if you will drop a post-card and let him know whether you like "How I Chaperoned Belinda" or not.

In reference to the previous series which has just closed H. P. M. writes:

"I have been intensely interested in 'The Confessions of Cynthia,' more especially in that part which dealt with the attempt of the society doctor to blackmail Mrs. Norton, and in the manner in which this woman's crime was hushed up. I have never seen this sort of thing exposed before, and no doubt it will read to a good many people as rather overdrawn. I have been behind the scenes for many years now, and I have come across many a case of almost the same sort in which a wealthy and prominent society person has committed a crime which money has been able to smooth over. There are to-day scores of society doctors who are in possession of secrets that would bring many prominent members of society into the police courts. Many of these doctors are prompted by professional etiquette to say nothing about the matters; others, ess scrupulous, find the knowledge a fine source of income to them by blackmailing the principals. I think it is very courageous of you to expose these things, and I look with interest for further revelations in the new series."

And I don't think that H. P. M. will be disappointed. I know for a fact that many of the statements made in the last series were looked upon by readers as fiction, simply because they were so startling as to be almost impossible to believe. Yet the articles were a clear and true description of the way in which the members of the "smart set" pass their existence, and the new series in equally correct. In the one case, Society was seen through the eyes of a young guileless girl, and in the other, it is seen through the eyes of a middle-aged woman of the world.

I AM delighted to hear from so many hundreds of readers that the new serial story is so much appreciated. I wish to thank most heartily all those who have troubled to write me in the matter.

YOU will find on another page a picture of Miss Madge Morris's wedding cake. It is very beautiful, is it not? And I am sure that it will prove good eating. The dainty ornament on the top is all white and silver, and is fit to grace any parlour window. With it, of course, will be sent a piece of wedding cake. It is not many prizes that are supposed to bring good luck; there are none which can bring greater luck than a piece of wedding cake, and the 101 readers who are fortunate enough to secure a piece of that sent by Miss Madge Morris will be particularly fortunate, and ought to have a happy year.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

His was the Power.

"ARE you a Tsar that you conduct yourself thus autocratically?" demanded the girl as her father tossed her young man into the street. "No," rejoined the old man, "I am simply the power behind the thrown."

He was the Beast.

SHE: "This fur rug is very beautiful; to what beast does it belong?" He (candidly): "To me."

Her Point of View.

TOM: "Have you read 'Two Men and a Girl'? What do you think of it?" Kitty: "No; but I think the girl must have had a good time."

The Candid Friend.

ALICE (looking at her portrait): "Don't you think that Van Brush has managed to make a rather pretty picture of me?" Edith: "Yes, he really has; what a remarkably clever artist he is!"

Gave the Game Away.

TOMMY: "Mr. Yabsley, sister Laura said at the table this morning that she thought you had the prettiest moustache she ever saw." Yabsley: "You oughtn't to tell things you hear at the table, Tommy." Tommy: "But she's going to give me sixpence for telling you."

Cautious Parents.

"WHY did Barlow and his wife go abroad on different steamers? Quarrel?" "No. Mrs. Barlow thought it would be pleasanter for the children. Two steamers were not likely to be lost, and if one of them had gone down the children would have had one parent left."

Unreasonable Man.

"BUT, my dear," protested Mr. Young when Mrs. Young showed him her purchases for the day, "why have you bought four dozen clothes pins when all the washing is done at the laundry?" "Oh, Harry, how can you be so horrid?" began Mrs. Young tearfully. "Why, they were bargains."

Sis was Unimpressed.

A YOUNG man home from college, wishing to inspire his little sister with awe for his learning, pointed to a star, and said: "Sis, do you see that bright little luminary? It's bigger than this whole world." "No, 't'aint," said Sis. "Yes, it is," declared the young collegian. "Then why don't it keep off the rain?" was the triumphant rejoinder.

Kept His Word.

"I USED to think that you were not a man of your word, Jones, but I've changed my mind." "Ah, you understand me now, friend Smith. But what led you to change your mind?" "You remember that £10 you borrowed from me?" "Yes." "You said if I lent it to you you would be indebted to me for ever." "Yes," "Well, you are keeping your word like a man."

What She Thought and What She Did.

SHE said the men were "horrid" with an energy emphatical,
And built upon a very dreadful plan; And when one jarred upon her, with a gesture quite dramatical, She said: "Well, if that isn't like a man!" Until there came a fellow with a proposition practical, That made her cheeks turn very, very red. "You can have me," she said to him, with pout that was attractival, "But—I wish you weren't a horrid man!" she said.

The Religion for Him.

KATE: "No, Hettie does not attend any church; she says she is her own religion." Harry: "That is a religion I should like to embrace."

The Man who Cared.

ETHEL: "Since she has married again, I do not believe that she deplores the death of her first husband at all." Maude: "No, but her second husband does."

The Fall of Man.

MR. STEBBINS: "Statistics go to show that the male proportion of the world is fast falling off." Mrs. Stebbings: "Gracious me! Isn't there some way of tying them on?"

Giving Him Practice.

ASPIRING POET: "I'll set the world ablaze yet." His Wife: "I do hope you will, dear. Would you mind making a fire in the kitchen stove—just as a matter of practice, you know."

Seeing, Yet Not Seeing.

"BUT, Ethel, how do you know that this young man loves you? Has he told you so?" Ethel: "Oh, no, mamma! But if you could only see the way he looks at me when I am not looking at him!"

Found it Economical.

SMITH: "You say you write dunning letters to yourself and sign them with fictitious names. What do you do that for?" Jones: "You see, my wife is always after me for money, and when she reads those letters she becomes discouraged."

A Sweetheart Provided.

LADY OF THE HOUSE (to new girl): "I cannot allow you to keep a follower of your own. There is a corporal who comes to our house every Sunday; he is accustomed to our ways, and all my former servants have had him for a sweetheart; you can have him, too."

Had Caught His Fish.

MRS. NEWLYWED: "You never ask me to go out and have a drive like you did before we were married." Mr. Newlywed: "That's so; but you never see a man running after a 'bus when he has overtaken it, and you never hear of a fisherman giving bait to a fish he has caught."

The Test of Love.

"AND are you sure you love him?" "Am I sure? Do you see this dress?" "Of course I do. What of it?" "Will you kindly tell me if it bears the slightest resemblance to the present styles." "Well, really it—er—it——" "It doesn't," "No." "And I'm wearing it because he likes it."

She Knew Housemaids Too Well.

EDWIN: "What do you think of that artist who painted cobwebs on the ceiling so naturally that his housemaid broke her heart owing to her ceaseless and vain efforts to remove them?" Angelina: "Well, there may have been such an artist, but there surely never was such a housemaid."

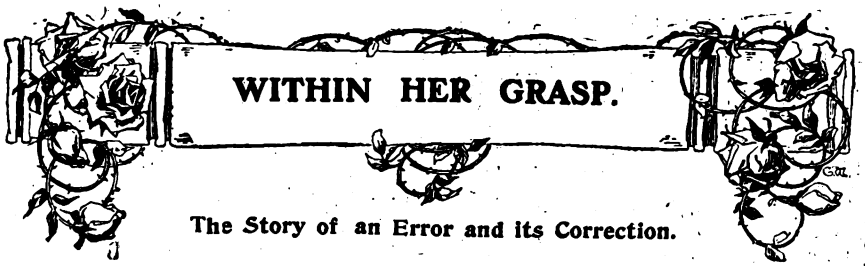
Would Run No Risks.

MR. SIMPEL: "Will you be mine, darling?" Miss Strongmind: "You must first ask papa's consent, Harold." Mr. Simpel: "But—but I dread to do it. I am extremely nervous, and, so to speak, so easily sat upon that——" Miss Strongmind (hurriedly): "I'll be yours, Harold! Never mind about papa!"

Why She Was Disappointed.

MISS MABEL (in tearful burst of confidence): "Mamma, I'm so disappointed in Horace! You can't think!" Mamma: "What's the matter now, dear? Have you quarrelled?" Miss Mabel: "No, but when I told him my birthday came on December 25th, he said, 'Dearest, let us be married on that day!' I do believe he was thinking how much money he would save in making presents if all our anniversaries came at Christmas."

Digitized by Google



WITHIN HER GRASP.

The Story of an Error and its Correction.

It was the race week at Marlahabad, in India, and a motley crowd thronged the course.

Flower-bedecked hats and delicate coloured gowns contrasted picturesquely with the dusky faces and gorgeous raiment of the native spectators.

Stately Helen Lomax was there with Mrs. Mitford, the collector's wife. As usual, she was surrounded by admirers; but of her two most faithful ones, Mr. Burrell, the Commissioner, and Major Wardrop, only Burrell was by her side.

"I have won on every race, so far," said Winnie Maitland, Mrs. Mitford's niece, a bright-eyed girl of seventeen, just out from Scotland.

"I do hope Major Wardrop will win this, don't you, Helen?"

The girl addressed looked up quickly. She was some years older than Winnie. Those who didn't admire her, called her handsome, in a cold, statuesque way; but those who knew her well understood the warm-hearted, impulsive nature, and could perceive the latent fire which lurked in the dark, dreamy eyes.

"Of course I do," she said quietly.

"I don't believe you really like Major Wardrop," persisted Winnie, "and yet he seems to admire you so," said the girl, a little wistfully, looking up at her companion.

She had, all unknowingly, touched upon a tender spot. For though Helen liked and admired Mr. Burrell, and looked upon him as a real friend, she loved Gerard Wardrop with all the strength of a reserved, passionate nature. No love-making had passed between them, but each had known, through that mysterious telepathy that is independent of speech, how strong was their feeling for each other.

Helen had made the acquaintance of both men whilst her father was stationed last year at Marlahabad, but he had been suddenly moved away a few months previously, and until this week they had not met again. How well she remembered her first introduction to Major Wardrop. It was at a gymkana and she was just going to ride in the ladies' bicycle race, when Mr. Burrell brought him up, saying he was a very old friend of his, and was chumming with him.

After that they had met almost daily. But unexpectedly he had been sent away on duty for a few weeks, and had not even seen her to say "Good-bye."

Would she ever forget how she felt on returning from a picnic at which Major Wardrop had not been present when she was handed a little note from him explaining the reason of his hurried departure, and saying how much he should look forward to their meeting on his return.

During his absence her father had been ordered to a distant station, and thus they had not met since. But so far the meeting had been full of disappointment. She had been at Marlahabad now for ten days, and in all that time she had never been alone with Gerard, although he had eagerly sought her society on all possible occasions. Her hostess was a veritable dragon, and she was beginning to suspect her of preventing any private conversation.

Was it possible that she wanted Winnie to marry him? The little girl seemed quite ready to lose her heart to him, and he was evidently attracted by her youthful prettiness. Here her train of thought was interrupted by a cheery voice behind her saying—

"A penny for your thoughts, Miss Lomax."

She looked up and saw young Teddie Gordon, a boyish, but very staunch admirer.

"Oh, they are worth more than that to me, Teddy, so I'll postpone the recital of them till you make me a better offer."

"Well, I came to ask you if you would like to watch this next race from the water jump. I expect we shall see a few spills, for it's such a big field."

"Oh, I hope not, I am sure," said Helen hastily, as she thought of Gerard, "but I will go if you like. It will be a change from the stand," and she rose from her seat.

Looking back, she noticed that Winnie was, for the moment, alone, and called to her to join them. The girl started up eagerly, and they hurried across to the jump.

"There they are, going to the post," said Teddy.

"Doesn't he sit that chestnut splendidly?"

"I think Mr. Carpenter will win myself, for he rides equally well, and has a splendid mount," said Helen perversely. "I'm afraid you'll lose your gloves, after all, Winnie."

"Now they were off—No, it's a false start! Yes, there they really are off this time. I do think Major Wardrop will win," and Winnie clapped her hands, her pretty blue eyes dancing with excitement.

Nearer and nearer came the horses, they seemed to be all together, would they all clear the jump?

An instant's suspense, and Mr. Carpenter was over, quickly followed by Wardrop on the chestnut. Those two were ahead of all the rest, and it was a neck-and-neck race. Only one more hurdle. Which would win? A sickening crash.

"By Jove! He's down!"

Horror stricken silence fell upon the group. They could not see what had happened at the distant hurdle. Only that Wardrop's horse had swerved, then jumping wildly had fallen heavily. After a short struggle he regained his feet, and went cantering riderless away.

"Oh, he has fallen—is he killed?" and Winnie covered her face with her hands.

Helen tried to reassure her, for though she herself was white to the lips, she was more successful in hiding her anxiety than her younger companion.

"Don't distress yourself, Miss Maitland," said Teddy. "I daresay he's not badly hurt. No, see there he is, walking away. Let's go back to the stand; we shall learn more about him there," he added kindly, for the girl's evident distress touched him. He felt sure from her anxiety that she must care very much for Wardrop, though seeing that he must be at least twenty years her senior, the lad wondered a little at it.

Helen, too, was wondering. Was it only natural dread of seeing suffering that had moved her so, or had the handsome Major awakened a tenderer feeling in her innocent heart?

Presently a sympathetic murmur greeted the appearance of the victim of the accident himself upon the stand. He made his way at once to where Winnie was sitting, feeling a little ashamed of her sudden display of feeling.

"I'm awfully sorry to have lost you the bet, Miss Winnie, and I can't even lay claim to a broken limb to excite your compassion."

"You really gave us a dreadful fright; both Helen and I thought you were killed."

Major Wardrop turned to Helen, who was standing a little behind the others. She flushed slightly as she met his eye, but gave no other sign of discomposure.

She felt reassured of his love for her, and for the time being her doubts and fears vanished. Only, however, to return in full force a few days later.

The Race ball was to take place that evening. Helen was feeling tired and languid, and in preparation for it prolonged her afternoon's rest beyond its usual limits.

However, the desire for tea aroused her at last, and leaving her room she stepped into the verandah to look for Winnie, when she stopped short suddenly. Trembling all over, her knees almost gave way under her, for Winnie was there, standing on the step, her hand in Major Wardrop's, a general appearance of happiness in her air.

Digitized by Google

"I'll do my utmost to make you happy, little one," he was saying, "and to-morrow I shall come and have the dreaded interview with Mrs. Mitford. Mind you keep plenty of dances for me to-night, I shall be obliged to be a little late." And, with a wave of his hand, he jumped into his dog-cart and drove off.

Helen moved mechanically back to her room, and sat down dully conscious that she had received a blow, and would awaken presently from the stunned sensation which mercifully follows a blow, whether it be mental or physical.

The ayah came to dress her for dinner in the filmy pink robe, which she had chosen with such care, that she might look well in his eyes. But she motioned her away. Then Mrs. Mitford came to the door. She must exert herself now to think, to make up her mind to hide the blow, and to appear delighted when she received the news of Winnie's engagement. She opened the door a little way, trusting to the fast fading light to hide her face.

"I am going to lie down, Mrs. Mitford. My head aches so that I thought perhaps you would let me have some dinner quietly here. I am so afraid of not being able to go to the ball!"

Her hostess was all sympathy, and promised to send her in some dinner, "and you must drink some champagne, my dear. Perhaps it will cure your headache, for it would never do for you to miss the ball," she said kindly.

The daintly little meal appeared in due time, but Helen ate as if each mouthful would choke her. Only the desire to play her part well enabled her to swallow anything.

The champagne, however, pulled her together, and when she made her appearance in the ball-room she looked a queen indeed.

The deep rose-pink draperies, with their filmy laces, suited her to perfection. Her glorious dark eyes rivalled in brilliancy the diamond star which shone in her hair. Her programme was over-full, but Major Wardrop's name was not there, for contrary to her usual custom Helen had kept none for him.

She appeared to be in the highest spirits; and even those who knew her best, agreed that never had they seen the stately Miss Lomax looking so brilliant.

Helen had been standing on the verandah with one of her partners, and on re-entering the room she saw Major Wardrop. He came quickly towards her, with an eagerly expectant air, and asked her for a dance. Shaking her fan gaily at him—

"Too late, Major Wardrop," she said, "my programme is full, there is no room for 'loiterers by the way,'" and with a smile and a nod she passed on with her partner, leaving Wardrop speechless with astonishment.

What had happened? Why had she kept no dances for him? It was always an understood thing between them that she should do so. Why had she departed from her usual custom?

The rest of the evening passed like a dream to him, he watched her surrounded always by an admiring coterie of men. Dancing gaily through the programme, her most favoured partner was his own friend Burrell.

Opinions were freely expressed as to her probable acceptance of his suit, and it caused but little surprise to the society of Marlahabad when Mrs. Mitford announced at the club next evening that they were engaged. Only on Wardrop did the news fall like a thunderbolt.

"I swear she loved me," he muttered to himself as he paced his verandah unable to sleep through the long hours of the night.

"If it had been any other man than Burrell—mine own familiar friend, I would try even at this late hour to put things right between us. But I can't try to spoil his life. After all she had her choice. She must have known that I loved her, so she deliberately chose between us."

And what of Helen? Was she happy? She had saved herself outward humiliation by accepting Mr. Burrell as her lover, but would she ever forget that she had given her love where it was scorned as she imagined? Ah, well, that sweet dream was over henceforward she must put Gerard, the man she had so dearly loved, out of her life. But she felt that she could not endure to stay longer with the Mitfords when she must see him almost daily. Mr. Burrell was pressing her to name an early date for their marriage so his wishes furnished her with an excuse for returning home.

As Mrs. Mitford wished her an affectionate "Good-bye," she said mysteriously, "I expect you will soon hear some news of Winnie, which will surprise you, but things are not really settled yet."

"Well, wish her joy for me, please, Mrs. Mitford, when the time comes. Ah, we are off!" And as the train moved out of the station Helen waved her hand to the group assembled to bid her farewell.

And so, in the midst of blinding tears, she left the place where she had hoped for so much happiness and where instead she had suffered such misery.

She had only seen Gerard once since her engagement was announced, and he had formally congratulated her, but beyond those few conventional words they had barely spoken to each other. And now the next time she went to Marlahabad it would be as Walter Burrell's wife.

* * * * *

One morning shortly after the Burrells had settled down in Marlahabad, Helen received a "chit" from Winnie, inviting herself to tiffin that day "for," she wrote, "I have some great news to tell you which I think will surprise you. Things were only really settled yesterday."

"I suppose I must say 'yes,' but, oh, how can I bear to hear her talk of her happiness with Gerard? How shall I ever hide my own feelings? Still, it must be done, so here goes," and Helen sat down and wrote a few lines to Winnie saying she would be pleased to see her.

In spite of her trouble Helen looked lovelier than ever in the eyes of her admirers. Sorrow had added a touch of softness which some thought she had lacked before, and there was a gentle dignity about her which was very winning.

She welcomed Winnie warmly when she arrived.

"Well," she said gaily, determined to play her part thoroughly, "and what is the great news, dear? Or can I guess it, is it that you are going to be married?"

"Yes, but what in the world made you guess so quickly?"

"My dear child, hasn't Major Wardrop been your shadow for weeks? It was easy to see what was going to happen!"

"Major Wardrop?" gasped Winnie, "Major Wardrop?" and she burst out laughing. "Why he is a regular dear and only for him I shouldn't be going to get married, but you must know that you are the only woman in the world he cares two straws about—Why, what is the matter, Helen, are you ill?" For Helen had turned white as her dress and for a moment could not speak.

"It is nothing, dear, nothing, I only felt a little faint, go on. Tell me who it is you are going to marry."

"Fred Darell, whom I have known all my life. The funny part of it is that Major Wardrop is his uncle and it is all through him that my people have allowed us to marry."

"Yes," murmured Helen.

"Well, you see, he hasn't much money and so father would not hear of our even being engaged, but when I told Major Wardrop all about everything, he said he would do his best to make me happy."

Alas! Helen remembered these words only too well, hey had been her undoing. But she must not give way to thought, so, with an effort, she said:

"Tell me, Winnie, how has he helped you?"

"Why, Fred had a chance of becoming a partner in the firm he worked for if he could put in a certain sum of money. This he couldn't possibly do, and that dear Major Wardrop wrote and told father that he was perfectly willing to give Fred the necessary amount if he would consent to our marriage. There was a good deal of bother one way and another, but the letters received by this last mail finally settled it all, and now I'm to go home as soon as possible and begin getting my things. Isn't it all too lovely for words?"

and in her joy Winnie hugged her friend enthusiastically. Girl-like, Winnie went on chattering of the joys which awaited her, too absorbed in her own concerns to notice how quiet Helen was, but at last even she noticed her companion's face which was pinched and drawn with pain.

"Helen, I'm sure you're ill; do let me do something for you."

"I don't feel very well—I think if I were to go and lie down quietly for an hour or two, perhaps I shall get better; you won't think me unkind?"

"Of course not, Helen, how could I? I will take myself off and leave you to rest."

Once alone, Helen's forced composure left her and she wept bitterly. "Oh, what must Gerard have thought of her—How could she have had so little faith in him? And how she loved him, why, why, why had she not trusted him?" and so on her thoughts went round and round till she felt giddy and dazed. There was no hope, no light anywhere. Her husband loved her dearly, on her part were respect and liking only. Both good enough things in their way, but they do not take the place of love. For hours Helen lay motionless, conscious only of the pain which overwhelmed her.

Fortunately Mr. Burrell was away for a few days, so she had time to think, before she must make the effort and pull herself together to face life with the added sorrow, caused by the knowledge that Gerard must think badly of her. That he must think her the thing she most despised, a flirt.

Ah, God, it was more than she could bear. To have her happiness within her grasp and to have let it go.

* * * * *

But time, the great healer, softened Helen's sorrow, and as the years went by she grew contented, and almost happy.

So it was with sincere grief that she mourned her husband's death, when it took place, suddenly from cholera.

She felt very lonely, for she had no children, and both her sisters were lately married.

For nearly two years she travelled all over the world, but in time she tired of wandering and made up her mind to return to England, and, taking a house, try to settle down. But first she was to pay a long visit to Winnie Maitland, long since Mrs. Darell. Her husband had prospered in the business to which his uncle had helped him and they were living in a charming house in Berkshire.

"Why, Helen, my dearest, you look younger than you did seven years ago," exclaimed Winnie, as she greeted her friend affectionately. "What have you done to yourself?"

"I have wandered about the world feeling a very lonely woman, if that is a good thing to restore youth," replied Helen laughing.

But in truth the years had left her beauty untouched, and the sad droop of the mouth and a far away expression in her eyes, had not made her less lovely in the eyes of those who cared most for her.

"You will have a very quiet visit, Helen, for I was selfish and wanted you to myself. So we have no visitors excepting Gerard (for he won't let me call him uncle), who is here on ten days' leave.

Helen felt as if her heart had stopped beating.

"Gerard," she said, "Gerard Wardrop?"

"Yes; you recollect him, don't you?"

"Very well indeed—Winnie"—laying her hand on the other's arm—"does he know that I am coming?"

"Yes; of course." Then as their eyes met a light dawned on Winnie.

"Why, Helen, is that what it is? Is that why he has never married?" For once in her life, Helen broke through her reserve, and told Winnie the story of those old days, when her want of faith had parted her from the only man she had ever cared for.

* * * * *

A few weeks later, a quiet wedding took place in London, Gerard having overruled all Helen's objections to the shortness of their engagement.

For he declared he would wait no longer for the happiness so long delayed.

Giles Wheatley.

Have you a Gramophone? No?

Then here is your opportunity to win one!

We are offering this week ten more of our now famous Gramophones for competition among Short Stories readers. All you have to do is to go in and win, and when the prize is delivered at your door, call in your friends and, having placed in position one of the two records with which every instrument is provided, explain to them that you gained the wonderful talking, singing, and playing instrument they are listening to by the fact of your being a reader of Short Stories, adding that they might go and do likewise.

There is really no limit to the attractions of our Gramophones. On a cold, wintry evening you can sit in your armchair by a cosy, warm fire, and listen to the voices of our best singers and to the performances of our finest orchestras to your heart's content.

The competition for these entertaining instruments consists in constructing a sentence from the words contained in the titles of the stories appearing in this number. No sub-titles must be used, and, of course, no word which does not appear in the titles.

The ten competitors who send in sentences which in the Editor's opinion are the best, will each be rewarded with a handsome Gramophone.

Attempts must be made on the backs of postcards only, marked "Title," and addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Postcards must reach us not later than first post on Tuesday, November 18th.

Result of the First "Serial Story" Competition.

In the above competition Gramophones have been awarded to the following successful competitors:

LONDON—

Mrs. Carpenter, 4 Greencroft Gardens, South Hampstead.

Mrs. R. Slater, 7 Seagers Cottages, Lawn Terrace, Blackheath.

UNDER 100 MILES FROM LONDON—

T. E. M. Neale, 65 Sparkenhoe Street, Leicester.

C. Biggleston, 10 William Street, Herne Bay.

OVER 100 MILES FROM LONDON—

Miss F. Rayner, Girton, Sea Road, Boscombe, Hants.

S. W. Lang, 6 Mendip View, Causeway, Fishponds, Bristol.

SCOTLAND—

R. Ure, 6 Dunedin Terrace, Clydebank, Glasgow.

A. Low, 41 Dishland Street, Arbroath.

IRELAND—

Miss Annie Brangan, 4 St. Joseph's Place, Dublin.

D. E. Jones, 69 Beechfield Street, Belfast.

The correct sentence was:—"'Who drove him?' asked Ilden, nervously kicking his heel." Page 454, col. 2, line 56.

Digitized by Google

Ambition's Defeat.

The Story of a Frustrated Scheme.

THE London season was well advanced; in fact, it was the week before Ascot, yet Harry Wainwright had only been in town a few hours when he strolled into his club for dinner. He took his letters from the hall porter with the air of a man to whom all correspondence is a bore, and rapidly glanced through them, till he came to one the contents of which caused him the utmost astonishment.

It ran as follows:

MY DEAR HARRY.—It may surprise you to learn from me that I intend shortly to be again married. As this will make a considerable alteration in my mode of living, I wish to see you as soon as possible. My breakfast hour is half-past ten, as usual. Your affectionate father,

CHARLES WAINWRIGHT.

Such was Sir Charles Wainwright's brief announcement of his engagement to his only son. The only son's answer was equally brief:

MY DEAR FATHER.—I have only come up to town this afternoon, when I found your letter waiting for me. I will call upon you to-morrow morning at half-past ten.—Your affectionate son,

HARRY WAINWRIGHT.

From these two letters it will appear that the relations between father and son were not of a confidential nature. It would be impossible to imagine two more different characters.

Lady Wainwright had died when Harry was hardly more than a child, and since her death, Sir Charles had led an ordinary lazy bachelor's life. Both the house and the shooting on his country estate at Winterford had been let, and Sir Charles spent most of his time at his bijou residence in Mayfair. A few country house parties were quite sufficient to satisfy his taste for field sports, which had never been very ardent. At the present time he had the reputation of being the best-dressed, the most gentlemanly, and the most selfish man in London clubland.

To such a man a son must be an incubus in any case; but when the son is a keen sportsman, and possesses an utter disregard for all the conventionalities of life, the incubus becomes too great to bear. Fortunately for Harry Wainwright he had an income of five hundred a year under his mother's marriage settlement, and his father gave him another two hundred and fifty on the tacit understanding that he did not annoy him. So far the arrangement had proved satisfactory to both parties.

* * * * *

"Well, Wainwright, come to town at last? You don't seem very pleased with it, either."

The speaker was Lord Pelham, eldest son of the Duke of Harness. He was one of Harry Wainwright's greatest friends. They had been at Oxford together, and since then had ridden the same horses, shot the same coverts, and carried on harmless flirtations with the same woman—important factors in concentrating modern friendship.

"Yes, it was a nuisance to have to leave the salmon this weather, but I had to come up to town on business. Seen or heard anything of the governor, Pelham?"

"Do you mean Sir Charles?"

"Yes."

"Not much; except that they say he has been paying a lot of attention to a new beauty."

"Well, he has got engaged to somebody. Read that. The worst of it is that I came up to town to tell him that I am engaged, so I expect there will be a muddle."

"H'm! But tell me about yourself, old man. In the first place, I congratulate you, and in the next, let us order dinner."

Harry Wainwright's story was soon told. He had been staying in a country house in the north for the salmon fishing, and had fallen in love with, proposed to, and been accepted by the daughter of his host, a girl named Maud Blossom. Pelham knew her intimately, having often stayed in the house, and again warmly congratulated his friend.

"Now tell me something about my future step-mother."

"Well, to speak the truth, I don't know very much about her; she is an American widow, with lots of cash, named Mrs. Stanley. As I have already said, she is sufficiently handsome to have become a fashionable beauty. Of course, she must be clever, or Society would not have taken her on credit, so to speak, for nobody seems to know anything of her antecedents. But you will soon be able to judge for yourself. By-the-bye, are not the Blossoms coming up to town?"

"Yes; they are coming up at the end of the week for Ascot, and have got rooms at the Langham."

Even "the pink wine of France" failed to dispel the gloom which the news of his father's engagement had cast on Harry Wainwright's mind. He knew that vanity and selfishness were the two chief traits of Sir Charles' character. It was a hard confession for a son to have to make to himself, but it was the truth, and Harry Wainwright, now that he was engaged to be married, knew that he should have to look the truth sternly in the face.

He left the club soon after dinner, and went back to his hotel. What a difference twenty-four hours can make in a man's life! On the previous night Wainwright had retired to rest with the prospect of enjoying every happiness that love can bring. To-night he had already begun to realise that the path of that love would not be strewn with roses.

He was at his father's house in Mayfair punctually at half-past ten on the following morning, with a spirit which, though depressed, was resolute. If the father should sneer at the son's engagement, it was more than probable that the son should forget his filial duty and sneer at the father's.

There was no cordiality in Sir Charles' greeting. He received his son with the same polished politeness with which he would have received an utter stranger, and during breakfast neither made the slightest allusion to the subjects which filled each other's thoughts. Yet, although they talked on the ordinary topics of the day, a careful listener would have noticed that they resembled two boxers, each of whom was waiting for an opening.

Breakfast being finished, Sir Charles lit a cigarette, pushed his case towards his son, and, sinking into an armchair, said, in an indolent tone of voice:

"You gathered from my note, Harry, I suppose, that I intend to marry again? Of course, my marriage will alter considerably my present mode of living. I shall make Winterford my chief residence, where, my boy, you will always be welcome. Indeed, both Mrs. Stanley—that is my future wife—and myself would be glad if you lived there altogether."

Sir Charles had an idea of making his son his estate agent, with instructions to superintend the stables and the shooting.

"I am sorry, sir, but I am afraid the arrangement would be impossible. I really came up to town yesterday to tell you that I had become engaged to be married myself."

Digitized by Google

Sir Charles was silent with surprise for some seconds. Only those who knew him intimately could have recognised how angry the news had made him.

"H'm!" he answered pettishly. "Then I am afraid that the plans I had made for your happiness are destroyed. As a married man, I could not afford to give you the liberal allowance which I have been giving, while the prospect of a married step-son and his wife in the house would hardly be pleasing to my wife."

"Nor to mine, sir, for that matter."

"And may I ask who is this lady you intend to make your wife?"

"Miss Blossom. I believe you were at school with her father."

The indirect allusion to the baronet's age added fuel to the fire of his irritation, but he only said:

"Ah, John Blossom. A very dense boy. I remember him at Eton."

"And may I ask who my future step-mother may be?"

"Certainly; Mrs. Stanley. I dare say you may have heard of her."

"I must plead ignorance to the name."

Sir Charles stood aghast. The name of Mrs. Stanley as a fashionable beauty had been on everybody's lips during the present season, yet his own son had not even heard of it.

"Mrs. Stanley's attractions are well known in Society circles," he said stiffly, with a strong emphasis on the word Society. "I am generally considered a fortunate man for having won her affections."

"Indeed. Then I congratulate you. Who was the late lamented Mr. Stanley?"

The veins on Sir Charles' forehead were swollen with passion, but he replied calmly:

"I cannot see that it matters in the least to you or to anybody else who he was. I asked you here this morning to tell you of my engagement and to accept your congratulations. You have thought fit to show your annoyance at my engagement, both by words and your manner. There is only one thing now that I have to ask you and that is to keep your annoyance to yourself. It is the worst possible form to let family quarrels become public property. In regard to the private allowance which I have hitherto given you, that will have to cease entirely. You have an independent income of your own, and if you choose to marry with that income, it is your affair, not mine. I only know that I would not risk matrimony on the same terms."

"Is not that a question for Miss Blossom to decide?"

Sir Charles shrugged his shoulders.

"Perhaps so. At all events, it is not for me to decide. Now, in order to prevent any vulgar gossip, I wish you would call upon Mrs. Stanley. I, on my part, will call upon Miss Blossom. It is a matter of mere formal politeness; that is all."

"Certainly, sir; there is no need to tell the outside world if we disagree."

"When will you call?" Sir Charles asked abruptly.

"The sooner the better. This afternoon, if you like."

"Very well. If you will call here about three o'clock, we will go together. Is Miss Blossom in town?"

"No, sir; but she is coming up on Monday for Ascot."

"Very good. Then I shall see you at three."

Such was the meeting between father and son; no affection, no sentiment, no anger had been expressed. Both were glad the interview had been got over without a scene. The son had lost a third of his income; the father had lost a good estate agent. Both knew that the gulf that separated them had been widened.

* * * * *

Mrs. Stanley was certainly the beauty of the London season. She had shot forth like a rocket over the firmament of Society, but from what star she had emanated, and what was the propelling power of the emanation, were secrets which Society had not succeeded in unravelling.

Society did know that she had made her début under the wing of Lady Highclass; that she had a charming house in Grosvenor Place; that she went everywhere, and that everybody worth knowing went to her "At Homes." That was sufficient for Society; it was not sufficient for Lady Highclass.

At the time of the interview between Sir Charles Wainwright and his son, another interview was taking place between Lady Highclass and Mrs. Stanley, in the latter's boudoir. There was one point of resemblance in the two interviews; both were equally unpleasant.

"You remember the compact perfectly well. You were to give me five thousand pounds if you got married."

"Exactly, Lady Highclass, but, then, I am not married."

"As good as married, anyway. I am pressed for money, and am leaving town directly after Ascot. It can make no difference to you whether you pay me now or in a month's time, and it makes every difference to me."

"But it does make a very considerable difference to me. I have my expenses as well as you have. You have already been paid more than sufficient for your services."

"Take care, Clare Stanley. I am not a woman to be insulted with impunity. If I have hitherto exercised my social influence on your behalf, I can also exercise it against you."

"And let Society know that your influence is to be bought by the highest bidder. The British aristocracy will be proud of you."

"Perhaps. One thing is certain; that Society will believe me and won't believe you."

"Might not Society wonder how you, with your income, manage to live at such an expensive rate? No, Lady Highclass, the part of the bully does not suit you. You know perfectly well who would be the sufferer if we were to quarrel."

"I don't want to quarrel," her ladyship retorted. "But I want money, and must have it."

"But suppose that I have not got it to give you!"

Lady Highclass looked astounded.

"It is the truth, I have not five thousand pounds in the bank at the present time. I will give you a cheque for a thousand, and you must wait for the rest till it is due."

Lady Highclass protested. Then she changed her tone to one of intreaty. But in vain. Mrs. Stanley was inflexible, so, as there was nothing more to be got, her ladyship took the cheque for a thousand pounds and left.

Mrs. Stanley leant back in her chair, and a smile of contempt came over her beautiful face.

"Yes, my lady," she muttered to herself; "if I had given you five thousand pounds you would have blackmailed me for more before my marriage. Bah! How I wish the whole farce were over."

Possessing a physical beauty which was as near perfection as possible, and a fascination of manner which was well-nigh irresistible, it was not surprising that, once launched into Society, she should have sailed forth in front of all rivals.

The chief surprise about her career was that she should have accepted a baronet like Sir Charles Wainwright. He was considered two or three rungs too low in the ladder for a girl who had a royal prince dancing attendance on her.

Some few of the old loungers about clubland said that Mrs. Stanley was too clever not to know her own business best, and then Wainwright might not be quite such a lucky dog as people thought.

TURN AT ONCE to first page and read "How I Chaperoned Belinda."

Digitized by Google

Their opinion would have been strengthened if they could have seen her as she muttered: "Bah! How I wish the whole farce were over."

Harry Wainwright called for his father at the appointed time to go with him to Grosvenor Place. He was curious to see this beautiful woman who was about to become his step-mother. He had already made up his mind that she was only marrying his father for his position and determined to watch her narrowly.

Nothing could have been more gracious than Mrs. Stanley's manner of receiving him. She affected to take a great interest in his engagement, and asked him several questions about his fiancée. Sir Charles listened with astonishment. As he said to her afterwards, he had never known a woman draw Harry out so much before.

"My dear Charles, as we are so closely connected, is it not better that we should be firm friends?"

"Of course, Clare! I only said to Harry this morning that there was nothing more odious than a family quarrel. Still, it will not be necessary for us to see a great deal of him and his wife."

"I wonder what she is like, and whether we shall get on together?"

"This Miss Blossom? I suppose she is the ordinary country girl of the milk-maid type. But she is not an interesting subject; let us talk about ourselves."

Although she did not say so, Harry Wainwright was a subject of great interest to Mrs. Stanley. She was resolved to make him fall in love with her, and, in spite of his engagement, had not the slightest doubt that she would succeed. In truth, so far from cementing family friendship, it seemed extremely probable that she would be the cause of a very pretty family quarrel.

* * * * *

Mr. Blossom was a model of a country squire. Nobody in their sane senses could have taken him for anything else. Even when he was sitting in his stall in the theatre he exhaled a scent of the country, which made his neighbours picture him shooting partridges amongst his own turnips. He disliked town life, and if it had not been for his wife and daughter would never have come to London. As it was, he generally spent his days at Lord's or the Oval, unless there was a race meeting within easy distance. But during his present visit he found that he had other duties to perform. He had been obliged to dine with Sir Charles Wainwright, and he had come away with a very poor opinion of his host. He had been taken to a formal dinner-party at Mrs. Stanley's, and had expressed the candid opinion afterwards that there was no fool like an old fool, which was not flattering to the baronet.

"I tell you what, Janet," he said to his wife one evening; "Harry Wainwright is as good a fellow as ever crossed a horse; but how the dickens he came to have such a father is a mystery to me." To which his wife sensibly replied that Maud was going to marry Harry and not his father.

To Maud Blossom, however, this visit was one of continuous pleasure. She was proud of having Harry Wainwright for an escort. Mrs. Stanley had been more than polite to her, and would insist on calling to take her driving in the park, on bringing her home to lunch, and on rendering those thousand and one little civilities which pave the way to friendship between women. Maud was far too innocent to detect the treason which lay hidden in the heart of her new acquaintance.

But it was Ascot week, and the Cup day had arrived, the day which Society has chosen as the meridian of the London season. Sir Charles had dressed himself with more than ordinary care for the great festival, and the result was a triumph of the tailor's art; but he was far from pleased at the arrangement which had been made for the day.

"Clare knows how I hate anything like a family party!" he said to himself, as he slung his field-glasses over his shoulder; "yet she insists on asking the Blossoms to join us. Then she is perpetually telling me to do the agreeable to Maud, while she talks to Harry. Confound it all! I wish I were married! I'll take good care that we have none of this nonsense at Winterford."

The truth was that Mrs. Stanley having determined to make Harry Wainwright fall in love with her, had already commenced a flirtation with him under the guise of friendship. Both to him and to Maud she represented herself as a kind friend, anxious to prevent any family quarrel; and so she got rid of the somewhat tiresome attentions of Sir Charles, won Harry's confidence, and checked any distrust on Maud's part. She knew beforehand that her married life could not possibly be a happy one, and that it was her policy to have her stepson on her side in the future disagreements between herself and her husband, which were certain to take place.

Now, at Ascot many were the field-glasses pointed in the direction of Mrs. Stanley; many critical eyes looked at the beauty of the season. One man evidently took a special interest in her. Although he was backing horses for large amounts in Tattersall's ring, yet when his attention was not taken up with racing, he was always looking at Mrs. Stanley with a puzzled expression on his face. That he was a well-known man in betting circles was apparent from the deference shown to him by the bookmakers, not a few of whom wondered at his present absent-minded manner. At last this leviathan among backers beckoned to a quietly-dressed man, and talked earnestly to him for some two minutes. The quietly-dressed man listened, occasionally nodded his head, but never spoke a word until his companion had finished, when he merely said:

"All right."

"Then I shall see you to-morrow at seven?" inquired the backer.

"Yes," replied the quietly-dressed gentleman; and they parted as mysteriously as they had met.

Meanwhile, Sir Charles Wainwright, as he had predicted, was spending a very unhappy day. Both Mr. and Mrs. Blossom took an unaffected interest in horseflesh, and made constant excursions to the paddock, leaving the rest of the party to amuse themselves.

Now a crowd of friends and acquaintances were always hovering round Mrs. Stanley, and as that lady also took care to keep Harry Wainwright at her side, Sir Charles was obliged to attend to Maud and to suffer the pangs of jealousy at the same time. Maud Blossom belonged to the class of unsophisticated country girls for whom Sir Charles had no admiration; so when he had laid two "ponies" to one on the favourite for the Cup, and seen it beaten by a short head, what little good temper he did possess had taken wings and flown away from him.

"Harry," he said petulantly to his son; "I am afraid I must ask you to take care of Maud for a few minutes, as I have to go into the ring."

It must be remembered that Sir Charles' love for Clare Stanley partook more of the nature of pride than of affection. If she had not been the centre of admiration he would never have given her a moment's thought. But as some men are ambitious to ride the most showy horse in the Row, so others are ambitious to be engaged to the most beautiful woman of the season. Such was the case with Sir Charles; so it was extremely galling to him that Clare should give him the cold shoulder at such a place as Ascot. He thought that Society would notice it, and so it did.

"I say, Mrs. Stanley doesn't seem to be very spoony on her elderly beau, does she? Who is the young fellow with her?"

"Oh, that's young Wainwright, her future stepson."

The first speaker whistled in surprise.

YOU CAN BEGIN "HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA" TO-DAY.

Digitized by Google

"He's all right. He is one of those sporting fellows who would like to spend their lives shooting big game in the Rockies. Besides, he's to be married himself."

"Is he? Then I pity the girl."

This, and much more, said Society.

But Harry Wainwright had no suspicion of the remarks which were being made about him. Mrs. Stanley had told him that she wished to lessen the breach between him and his father! She had been very kind to Maud, to whom she had told the same tale. So if she did not deceive the scandal-loving world, she deceived this innocent pair. Partially, though not altogether, she deceived Sir Charles when they returned home.

"I don't know what I have done, Clare, but you would hardly speak a word to me to-day."

"And I thought I was doing exactly as you wished. If you want to spoon in public like John Thomas and Mary Jane——"

"Don't be absurd. You know what I mean. You would not let me come near you, and, worse still, made me look after that milkmaid."

"Now, Charles, you have lost your money and are cross. At least, you have me all to yourself now."

She kissed him as she spoke and soon coaxed him into a good temper.

"Wait till we are united, love, then we can see as little of our Phyllis and Strephon as we choose. Now, Charles, say you are not angry with me before you go."

* * * * *

Mr. Carte, of Chicago, the leviathan amongst backers on the turf, sat in his private room in a private hotel in Albemarle Street at seven o'clock on the evening following the Cup day, waiting for the quietly-dressed gentleman. It was the first year that Mr. Carte had patronised the English turf, and certain bookmakers hoped it would be his last. He had come over with plenty of dollars and a system; the system had succeeded and the dollars had increased! Socially he had confined himself entirely to racing circles, and had not even evinced any ambition to enter the precincts of clubland. This was the reason why he had not seen Mrs. Stanley before the previous day, but now that he had seen her she occupied a considerable share of his thoughts.

"Well, Dick," said Mr. Carte, as the quietly-dressed gentleman, whom we will introduce as Richard Lee, entered the room, "it has been a glorious week; another regular knock-down blow for the ring, my lad. Pleasure first and business afterwards. Come to dinner—I am as hungry as a cowboy."

Dinner is a lengthy affair amongst racing men who are obliged to be abstemious during the day, and it was after eleven before the two friends returned to Albemarle Street. An hour was spent in going through the betting-book. Then, throwing himself into an arm-chair with an air of relief, Carte said:

"And now, Dick, how about this Mrs. Stanley?"

"She is Nell Robinson, widow of John Robinson, who was shot down Texas way some two years ago."

"I more than suspected that yesterday; but how the thunder has she managed to come over here and raise Cain in Society?"

"Well, she is the 'cutest woman I ever ran across. Her beauty speaks for itself."

"I know all that. But who was Stanley? And where did she get the shekels from? I don't know much about Society, but I do know this, that American widows don't catch on unless they are considerably gilded."

"Then if you want to find out that, you will have to trace her career since Jack Robinson's death. Personally I don't suppose that Stanley ever existed, except in the lady's imagination. All I know is that she came over to England at the beginning of the year, and was run by a certain Lady High-class, who seems to be a bit of a boss. But what is the good of finding out? You don't want to spoil the woman's game, do you?"

"Certainly not; unless there was something to be gained by it."

"What can you gain? You don't want money."

(Continued on next page.)

LIVING SKELETONS.

An Illustration from Life.

WE are all familiar with the living skeleton, or professional lean man of the side show, whose leanness is due partly to bad nutrition, and partly to the fact that by means of purgatives he expels the food from his system before it has time to be fully absorbed.

In his case the emaciation is intentional, but there are scores of cases where it is quite the reverse, and brought about entirely by imperfect digestion and general ill-health. In such cases Charles Forde's bile beans will be found a sure and speedy remedy, as the following plain statement of fact goes to prove. The story comes from Mr. George Blanchard, of Morley Street, Kettering, and was told by him to a "Kettering Guardian" reporter. He said:—"For seventeen years I suffered from acute indigestion, which steadily became worse till at last my doctor gave me up as incurable, and I came to be looked upon as dying. I had violent pains in my sides and stomach, which latter was always distended with wind; and though I belched incessantly I found no relief, for the simple reason that the wind kept forming as fast as I could get rid of it.

"Every morsel of solid food I swallowed seemed to turn to wind, and also brought on severe fits of vomiting, which shook my whole system. I had to leave off taking solid food altogether, and subsist entirely on liquids. As a consequence I became so weak that I could hardly drag one foot after the other, while my limbs wasted away till they were no thicker than those of an infant! To add to my misery, I suffered also from dizziness and profuse sweats.

"As I have said, I had medical advice, but derived no benefit, and after a time was told by my doctor that he could do nothing more for me, and that I should never again be well. At this I abandoned hope and made up my mind for death. I was in this pitiable condition when my wife chanced to read of the marvellous cures effected by Charles Forde's bile beans, and we got a box. I began taking them, and soon realised that I had at last found the right thing. The stomach pains ceased gradually, as did also the vomiting. The flatulence and dizziness disappeared, and I began to regain strength. All this time I had been taking bile beans regularly, and continued to do so, till now I am well and strong again, and feel better than I have done for twenty years. I can strongly recommend Charles Forde's bile beans to anyone suffering as I did from indigestion, dizziness, stomach pains, vomiting, or weakness. Their effect is truly wonderful."

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED); absolutely pure: no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free. supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Digitized by Google

"I don't know, but useful information is always worth something or other. Let me see, you went down into the Argentine for a few years or so, after the Robinson affair, so couldn't know anything about her."

Dick Lee nodded.

"Who is this Sir Charles Wainwright, whom she is going to marry? He is not one of the regular racing fraternity."

"Man about town," the other answered laconically.

"Got any shekels?"

"Yes, and a country seat called Winterford."

"Fancy Nell Robinson as a baronet's wife and the mistress of an old English country house! By Jove, I've hit it! Sir Charles shall go on the turf, and I'll manage his horses."

Carte was so pleased at the idea, that he did not notice the look on Dick Lee's face. If he had, his joy would not have been so boisterous as it was. He talked exultingly for some minutes as he fancied himself an owner of racehorses. He might have fancied himself a member of the Jockey Club if Lee had not suddenly interrupted him.

"You seem to ignore the consent of Sir Charles."

"Bother Sir Charles! He would consent, to prevent the exposure of his wife. Or I might approach the wife first, and she would coax him into consenting, to save herself."

"Both contingencies are extremely improbable."

"What do you mean?"

"Simply that you have nothing to expose. Listen to the case. You happen to know that Lady Wainwright is the widow of an American gambler, and you disclose the fact to her husband, who is probably aware of it already, demanding as a price of your secrecy that you should enter into a racing partnership with you. He would either laugh at you, or have you horse-whipped. So much for the first contingency! The second is worse. The lady would defy you to do your worst, and ring the bell for you to be shown out of the house."

"Then I would let Society know what sort of woman it has made its idol."

"Society would not believe you, in the first place, and you would gain nothing by it, in the second. You might have some influence if you chose to make a complaint to the Jockey Club, but you are powerless to make a complaint against a reigning beauty."

"But how did she get her money? The woman must have some secret."

"Probably she has," replied Dick Lee curtly. "But then you don't happen to know it."

"I must say you don't seem very keen on the matter."

"Because I don't see anything to be got out of it. Sorry to destroy that charming castle you were building in the air, but there is not the slightest chance of its ever having an earthly foundation. Take my advice, and think no more about it. I must be off to bed now; meet you at breakfast. Good-night."

But Dick Lee did not go to bed. He sat up smoking and thinking till the first streaks of dawn lit up his room. In the stillness of the night many plans suggested themselves to his mind, only to be tossed aside as worthless as soon as they were formed. On one point only was he satisfied, namely, that he had put Carte off the scent of Mrs. Stanley's history. He alone of all men in London knew that history, but he was doubtful how to make use of his knowledge, or, indeed, whether to make use of it at all.

"If I were sure she would be happy, her secret should die with me," he said to himself more than once. Strange thought for the hero of over fifty duels. If it had been expressed aloud, nobody who knew the man would have believed in its sincerity. Could this be the same Dick Lee who had beaten the Red Indian in cunning; who was the deadest shot in the Southern States; who had never been known to spare either man or woman? But he had never shown to any living creature the one deep wound in his heart. Until that day he thought himself that it was cured, but now it was bleeding as copiously as ever. The love which he had deemed dead was again full of life; but how different was the nature of that life! What had been passion was now compassion; jealousy had become generosity; the burning ardour of the man was changed into the tenderness of a child.

* * * * *

Mr. and Mrs. Blossom, having enjoyed their annual visit to London in their own peculiar fashion, left town, and also left their daughter behind them. Maud was now the guest of Mrs. Stanley, much to the disgust of Sir Charles, who, with the selfishness of all lovers, whether they be twenty-one or eighty-one, wanted to monopolise the society of his fiancée. Mrs. Stanley, however, thinking that she should have as much of Sir Charles' society after marriage as she wanted, had elevated Harry Wainwright to the position of her "tame cat."

It was a proof of the woman's cleverness that she had done this without exciting the jealousy of Maud. London life, with its dissipations—its Hurlingham, its Sandown, its dances in Mayfair, and its "At Homes," in Belgravia—were such novelties to the country girl, that her mind was in a constant state of bewilderment, and she never paused to consider that her lover's attentions were becom ng daily less ardent. Even if she had had any doubts about Harry Wainwright, Mrs. Stanley would have instantly dispelled them during those curlpaper confidences which women love to indulge in.

"My dear Maud, Harry's devotion is really too tiresome. He sat out two waltzes with me to-night, while you were dancing with Lord Pelham, and his conversation consisted of Maud, Maud, Maud, nothing but Maud."

Then the girl's eyes would brighten. She had thought at the time that Harry might have been more attentive to her, now she blamed herself for thinking him wanting in devotion. Certainly Mrs. Stanley ought to have been satisfied at the success of her deception.

She knew that she was on the verge of a precipice and that at any moment she might be hurled into the chasm of shame beneath. But this she had known when she had started on her adventurous career, and this was the reason why she wished to hasten her marriage with Sir Charles, and to make Harry Wainwright her lover, so that he might protect her in her future troubles. Her social success had been greater than she had ever anticipated. But she had sacrificed her love at the altar of her ambition, and had found out in the quiet moments of her solitude that the artificial veneer had not stifled the woman's heart with which Nature had endowed her.

She was sitting one July afternoon in her boudoir thinking of her old life, and feeling some little remorse that she had ever forsaken it. It was not the life in Texas that she was dreaming of, but of the two years which succeeded it—two years spent with the husband whom she loved, amongst the most luxurious scenery of South America—two years of unbroken bliss.

Where was that husband now? Was he alive or dead?

She was alone. Maud had gone with some new friends to a matinée, and Sir Charles was in the City on business. Suddenly Harry Wainwright was announced.

She received him with her usual fascinating manner—a manner which was charming him on to destruction as it had charmed many before.

The man sat down beside her on the sofa, and yielded himself up to her influence. Occasionally his conscience had smitten him about Maud, and then he would drown conscience in wine. Now the voice of conscience was dumb; he drank in every word which came from her lips; he gazed upon her beauty and was intoxicated by it.

"Clare, my friendship, my love is yours," he said as he bent over her. "My darling——"

A knock at the door arrested his words, and a servant entered with a note. Mrs. Stanley looked at the handwriting and turned as pale as death.

(Continued on page 638.)

DON'T MISS
THE COMPETITION
ON PAGE 613.

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REGD

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Patterns Post Free.

ALFOSCO REGD

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 1261. 10/6

Design No. 434. 14/9. Stylishly and handsomely trimmed Costume in ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s Serge and Venetian Cloth, all colours. The Bodice is cut in the Russian style, lined throughout, and stylishly trimmed rows of cording and bands of stitched silk. Full flounced Skirt, trimmed silk and cording. Extraordinary value for 14/9; carriage 6d. extra. When ordering Costumes, please give Bust measurement (under arms), size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

Design No. 1261. 10/6. Chesterfield Three-quarter Sacque Jacket. This Jacket is produced in Black, Fawn, and Brown Beaver Cloth; also in pretty Grey Tweeds, and in Light and Dark Grey and Black Coating. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d. extra. This Jacket can also be ordered 33in. long, 11/6; 36in., 12/6; 39in., 13/6 and 42in., 14/6; carriage, 6d. extra.

This Jacket can be had double breasted, same price. All sizes in stock. Patterns post free.

WRITE FOR OUR

NEW SKETCH BOOK & CATALOGUE OF BARGAINS,

Containing Hundreds of Illustrations of Latest Novelties in Costumes and Jackets for the Winter Season.

Sent with Patterns, Post Free.

CALL OR WRITE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

KSR . KSR . KSR .

"There is a man waiting for an answer, madam."

She tore open the note and quickly read the contents. Then she went to her writing desk.

"I will be with you at the time you mention," was all she wrote, and, addressing the envelope, handed it to the servant.

"Clare, darling what has made you worried?"

She rose angrily.

"What right have you to call me darling? You, who are engaged to another woman. No, Harry," she added, more softly, "forgive me, for it has been my fault. Leave me now; forget me and all that you have said to me. It is not too late. Go to Maud. She loves you and believes in you. Your place is by her side. This infatuation for me will be past in a day, and your love for Maud will be stronger. Go now, I wish to be alone."

He went out without a word. The dream was over. The veil was lifted from his eyes.

And the note which had caused this sudden change in Clare Stanley? It simply ran:

Meet me in the Broad Walk at Kensington at six.—

DICK.

It was already five o'clock. There was no time to be lost. She hastily changed her elaborate tea-gown for a plain serge dress, and was soon being whirled down to Kensington. She had had no minutes even for thought. Her brain was too dizzy to enable her to judge how to act.

She trembled as she walked up the Broad Walk, glancing nervously about her. At last a quietly-dressed gentleman stepped out from behind one of the huge trees.

"Nell!"

"Dick!"

Dick Lee held out his hand and she took it, though her eyes were downcast. They walked along a few yards in silence.

"Nell," the man began, and there was a note of the saddest compassion in his voice; "I am not here to reproach you, nor to molest you in any way. I only want you to answer me one question. Are you happy?"

"I am the most miserable woman on earth," she replied sobbing.

They strolled away from the madding crowd, though few would have recognised them as the Society beauty and callous gambler.

"Can you ever forgive me?" she murmured.

"I can and do forgive you. I forgive you so much that if you ask me to leave you now, your secret shall never pass my lips. If you wish me to remain, Nell, it is not too late now to return to the old days of happiness."

"How can I thank you for your generosity? How can I atone to you for the past? I was and am your wife. I will be your slave."

And thus she sacrificed her ambition at the altar of her love and duty.

In the course of the evening Sir Charles Wainwright received the following note, together with presents which he had made Mrs. Stanley:

DEAR SIR CHARLES.—Circumstances have occurred which render it imperative on my part to break off our engagement. I am sorry for any pain that this letter may cause you, but you would have suffered more if I had married you. Do not try to see me, as henceforth I am dead to Society. Wishing you happiness in the future, I am, yours sincerely,

CLARE STANLEY.

* * * * *

On board an Atlantic liner two people, whom the passengers have agreed to be a newly-married couple, are sitting side by side. Love is visible in the face of both; but in the face of the man it arises from the sense of protection, in the face of the woman from heartfelt gratitude.

L. Payne.

PEARSON'S ARE THIS YEAR . . . . . PUBLISHING AN EXTRA-SPECIAL CHRISTMAS . . .

ANNUAL OF ALL THEIR . . . . . PUBLICATIONS. IT IS REALLY THE BEST PRODUCED. . . CHRISTMAS NUMBER EVER

SEEN IN THIS COUNTRY, ...

ON ACCOUNT OF THE . . . .

NUMEROUS AND HUMOROUS . . .

STORIES, PICTURES, JOKES, AND . VERSES OF EVERY DESCRIPTION. BESIDES THIS THE . .

'XQUISITE COLOUR PRINTING. .

MAKES IT WORTH TEN TIMES . . . . WHAT IT IS SOLD

AT: NAMELY, ONE SHILLING,. . . . . .AN ABSURDLY

SMALL PRICE. BY BUYING IT . . . . . YOU WILL GET

'XTRAORDINARILY GOOD VALUE . FOR MONEY; AND AMONG OTHER THINGS . . . . .

THIRTY PAGES ODD IN . . . . . COLOURS. IT IS READY NOW, AND YOU CAN BUY IT

ANYWHERE; BUT DON'T . . . . . FORGET THE TITLE

PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA.

Digitized by Google

Seventy-Seven Cases of Nose and Throat Catarrh Cured.

THE failure of the usual medical and operative treatment for catarrh of the nose and throat is well illustrated in an analysis of 77 cases of catarrh of the nose and throat cured by the Drouet method. These cases are taken from the records of the Drouet Institute, dating from the first of this year, and are the subject of comment in the "Journal for the Deaf," an analytical quarterly review of diseases of the ear, nose, and throat. In reviewing these cases the editor presents forcibly the contrast between the success of the mild but thorough method advised by the Drouet Institute, and the non-success of operations and cauterisation. Those who desire to investigate the Drouet method, can obtain a free copy of the "Journal" by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. With the "Journal" is always enclosed a Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain free advice by correspondence, and instructions for using the treatment at home. When possible, however, patients are recommended to call at the Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff, between the hours of 2 to 4 p.m., weekdays.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 461.)

PAPER PATTERN of this

BOY'S SUIT

(Age 8 to 10.)

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

HAND-ORGANS from 20s.

Made in 3 sizes, ebony and gold case. With 6 metal tunes. Full organ tone. Plays songs, hymns, dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, can be paid 4s. monthly. Write for terms, price list and tunes. ATLAS CO., 184S High St., Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Rd.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

PHONOGRAPHS, 10/6 MUSICAL ALBUMS, 10/6.

DRUNKENNESS

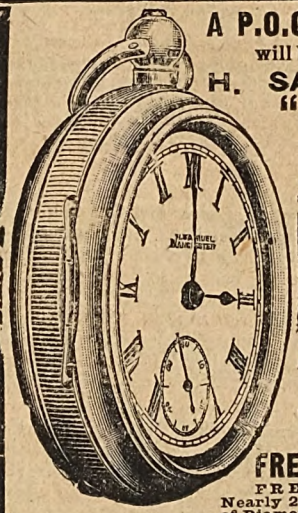
CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence,

Mrs. C. H.

(Room 8),

195 OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

FOR 5/- ONLY



A P.O.O. 5/- SENT TO-DAY

will bring you by return

H. SAMUEL'S FAMOUS

"ACME" LEVER.

Wear it Free for a Week; If satisfied, remit balance, 20s.

Solid Silver Cases, fine 7-plate movement, jewelled, dust and damp proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Written Warranty for 7 years. Price 25/-. Full amount returned if any dissatisfaction.

A SILVER ALBERT FREE!

To all sending full amount 25/- with order.

Write now for the FREE BUYER'S GUIDE.

FREE BY RETURN MAIL.

Nearly 200 Pages, 3,000 Engravings of Diamonds, Watches, 8s. 6d.; Clocks, 1s. 6d.; Gold Gem Rings, 3s. 6d.; Gold Brooches, 2s. 9d.; Cutlery, Plate, Fancy Goods, etc.

VALUABLE FREE GIFTS TO ALL BUYERS.

H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, Market St., MANCHESTER.

"Worth a Guinea a Box."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Wind and Pains in Stomach,

Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver, and

Female Ailments.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

CONTAINING 56 AND 168 PILLS RESPECTIVELY.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

The Absent Mother.

"ETIQUETTE" has known a certain girl for two years, but is not engaged. He, however, is in the habit of constantly visiting her at the lodgings in which she lives with her mother, who is a widow, and a trained nurse, and therefore constantly away from home. What "ETIQUETTE" wants to know is, "Is it right for him to call on the girl and sit with her for hours during her mother's absence, and not in the presence of third parties?" People have, apparently, been saying things, after the manner of "people."

* * * * *

It would save embarrassment to the girl, if "ETIQUETTE" became engaged to her. Living in apartments, obviously people would be inclined to make remarks at such visits in the absence of proper chaperonage. There is no alternative for "ETIQUETTE" save to announce their engagement, or else to discontinue his visits when the mother is absent if he wants to avoid gossip.

'Twixt Two Girls.

"WILFRED" is about to propose to Lily. But he has learnt from an indirect source that Isabel, a friend of his family, has conceived a deep affection for him. Lily, however, whom he deeply loves, does not care for him much.

* * * *

I suppose "WILFRED" will not propose to Lily unless he has some kind of token of her returning his affections. At any rate, he should certainly get some sort of confirmation before doing so. Perhaps it would be well for him to ask her outright if she thinks she could return his love. A definite negative would, though, perhaps, mortifying to "WILFRED," at any rate leave him in no doubt. As to Isabel, if he has no feeling towards her, he had better avoid all meeting rather than provoke an impossible fancy on her part.

A Case for Faith.

"PETAL" is engaged to a man, and they are to be married in twelve months' time. But he seems to have turned cold to her lately. People tell her that he has been paying attention to a pretty girl friend of "PETAL'S," but the latter does not want to mention the matter to her as they have always been very great friends. In spite of this, Ralph (the sweetheart) persists in saying his love for "PETAL" is unchanged, and that he hopes to marry her "some day."

* * * *

Don't believe what your friends say, "PETAL." Ralph may be simply momentarily attracted to the girl friend, and, perhaps, has simply been polite to her. She is, you say, very pretty, and even engaged men cannot resist being attentive under such circumstances. As the girl is a great friend of yours, I am sure she would not attempt to steal the affection of your sweetheart. In fact, she is much more likely, if she is a real friend, to resist any overtures on his part. You might take the opportunity to hint to her that it would be a terrible blow to you if you thought anybody was drawing him away from you. Why not ask her advice on the matter, and thereby find out her own feelings? In any case if he still protests his affection, believe him before others, who are probably speaking only from hearsay, and perhaps a little bit of mischief.

Grievance of a Go-between.

"MAUDIE'S" brother has taken a fancy to a girl friend of hers, but they have been quarrelling a good deal. When the girl quarrels with him she goes to "MAUDIE," but when they make it up, she seems not to want her company. What would I advise?

* * * *

Is it not always the fate of neutral parties that when the enemies are agreed, they find themselves left out in the cold? You had better refuse to sympathise with the girl when she quarrels with your brother. Naturally, you cannot know who is right and who is wrong, and should not take either side. Tell her next time that she must fight out her troubles with your brother on her own account. If you can pave the way to making it up, do so, but don't take either side if you wish to remain friends with either when they are reconciled.

A Changeable Lover.

WHAT is a man to do when he breaks off an engagement with one girl, to make one with another, and then discovers that it is the first girl after all that he really loves? Such is the plight in which "PERPLEXED" (South Africa) finds himself. For three years he had been attached to Sylvia, but on his travels he met Dorothy, with whom he fell in love, and started correspondence with her. Finally, he found that he was fonder of Dorothy, and got his release from Sylvia. He has since discovered that it is Sylvia after all that he really loves, but Dorothy still believes in his sincerity towards her, while he has already promised her marriage.

* * * *

Now "PERPLEXED" is evidently in two minds as to which girl he really loves. He has had a spell of Sylvia and evidently wearied of her, and, after taking turn with Dorothy, finds a similar result. I think myself that it is probable he does not really love either girl, or he would never have been drawn away from both in turn in this fashion. Now, if "PERPLEXED" finds that he no longer loves Dorothy, and that, apart altogether from any entanglement with Sylvia, he could not really be happy with her, it is right that he should make the matter known to her, but in as discreet a way as possible. He should make the severance gradual, and as he is a commercial traveller it should be possible for him to see her less frequently. Let him free himself of Dorothy, clearly and completely, and then start the position anew with Sylvia. I am not giving this advice in any sympathy with "PERPLEXED," as his conduct, which he himself admits, is not to be admired. But if his love towards his present fiancée has ceased, the engagement should not proceed if it can be broken off in a way which would not greatly injure either party. How to do that must depend on "PERPLEXED'S" tact.

Another Indictment.

THANKS, "E. W." (Paisley) for your remarks. However, I have nothing to add to my reply to the correspondent mentioned under the heading "Advice Misinterpreted." I am sorry you should have gained the impression that I am partial to women in my advice. But you will agree that it is not fair to select one paragraph from an article in support of this. If, in the instance you cite, I have selected the case of a "stupid man," in the same article, a little higher up, a similar reference was made to a "stupid woman." And this rule I have always tried to observe. If, on one occasion, I find myself compelled to sympathise with a woman in a trouble; on another, as you will see by glancing at any of my columns, I at once find myself in agreement with a man. That correspondents generally do not think me prejudiced where men are concerned is shown by my letters, three-quarters of which are from men.

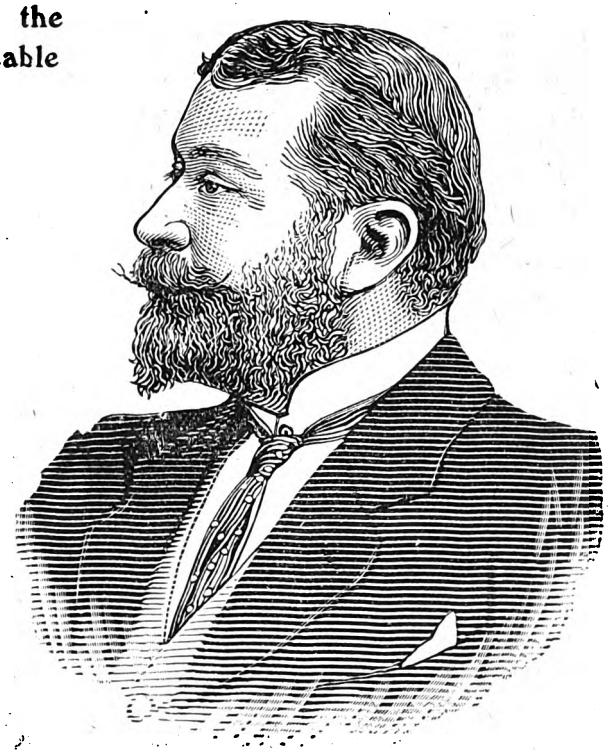
Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Keep your hair back, Put your hair right, Keep your hair right with

"TATCHO"

Many will tell you that "Tatcho" is the only remedy they have found serviceable after years of trying.



The Hon. Mrs. GORDON writes:

"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit from 'Tatcho.'—3 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, August 28th, 1902."

LADY SYKES writes:

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE writes:

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N., writes:

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER writes:

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

Major-General KEATE writes:

"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

Colonel PERRY writes:

"My Dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER writes:

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is. — Zetland House, Maidenhead."

A 4/6 full size Bottle for 1/10 carriage paid, is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "TATCHO" Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct from the "TATCHO" DEPOT, LINCOLN'S INN, LONDON.

"TATCHO" is a delightful Preparation, the colour of whisky, free from all smell, neither greasy nor sticky.

"TATCHO" will entirely banish that dead and dingy look of the hair.

"TATCHO" will ward off the approach of greyness.

"TATCHO" is invaluable to those suffering from actual loss of hair and who need a powerful stimulant to force fresh growth.

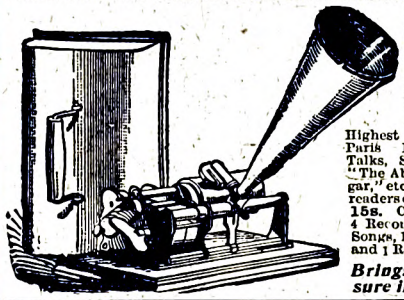
"TATCHO" is not a dye, and contains no harmful ingredient.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles, at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/- New South Wales Depot, Vickery Chambers, 76 Pitt Street, Sydney.

Digitized by Google

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.
A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

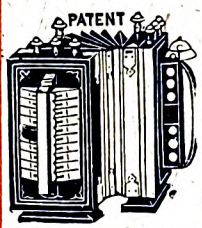
CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.
CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only	6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, "	10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, "	14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, "	16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount
Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901 2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—
CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.
Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

H.R.H. The PRINCE OF WALES says:
"WAKE UP, ENGLAND."
DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES.
BUY "MATCHLESS"
METAL POLISH

PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY!

AND SUPPORT BRITISH TRADE.
Guaranteed Free from Acid.
"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH, TINS & BOXES ARE ALL MADE AT OUR OWN WORKS IN LIVERPOOL.
Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, two 6½d. Tins will be sent Post Free (with address of nearest Dealer) on receipt of 1/-
MANUFACTURERS:
THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

Best FOOD FOR Babies
Contains all the constituents of Wheat (Nature's Model Food).
The Lancet says: "We hope it will take the place of the purely starchy foods now in use."
CHAPMAN'S ENTIRE WHEAT FOOD
6d. 1/- & 3/- TINS of all Chemists.
A splendid article of diet for children, and invaluable for Invalids.
Sole Proprietors: Chapman's Food Co., Battersea, S.W.

EVERY WISE WOMAN
Will Insist on Having
CROSFIELD'S PURE CANE SUGAR
Sweeter and More Economical than Common Beet Sugars. It Produces NO Fermentation.
The Best Sugar for Household Purposes. Write for Name of Nearest Agent to CROSFIELD'S LTD., Sugar Refiners, LIVERPOOL.

RENOWNED FOR HIGHEST EXCELLENCE
"HENDAWICK"
UNDERWEAR
FOR ALL SEASONS & CLIMATES

The LANCET says: "Such illness as is usually associated with weather changes, is to a large extent preventable. No one (at any season) should overlook the value of dry and absorbent Woollen Underwear."
This trade mark is a guarantee of Pure, Light, Absorbent Material

To be obtained through all the best Hosiers and Ladies' Outfitters, from the Sole Makers:
JAMES HENDERSON & CO., HENDAWICK WORKS, HAWICK, N.B.

Short Stories.

No. 725. Week ending November 22nd, 1902. Price One Penny.

"I MARRY THE MAN TO WHOM I DEAL THE QUEEN OF HEARTS!"

Worth a Guinea a Box.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

No other medicine in the world can claim so many regular users. Thousands of families always keep a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS in the house, so that, on the first sign of any irregularity of the system, a timely dose may be administered, and further trouble and suffering averted. Nine-tenths of the BEECHAM'S PILLS sold are purchased by those who HAVE USED THEM BEFORE and have found them indispensable as

A FAMILY MEDICINE.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

"LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

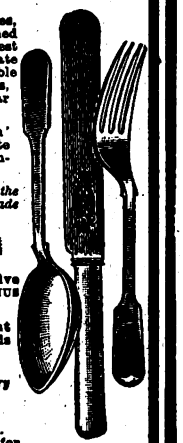
THE "ENTERPRISE" . PARCEL . 25/-

Household Cutlery & Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white "Ivorette" Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of 'Columbian' Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.



HOW TO PAY.

Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if the Goods are not perfectly satisfactory in every respect.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No. Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

NOSE RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp. Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (BT), Specialist South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

EVERY LADY should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

JUST READ IT.

FREE.

You can earn a 3 years warranted Watch, Life-sized Doll, Powerful Air Rifle, Beautiful Solid Gold Dress Rings, Long Guard, Bracelet, filled Jewellery of all kinds from our list of presents. You can have any of these FREE after selling Nine Articles of Exquisite Jewellery, at 9d. each (sold by shops at 1/6.) We send the goods on approval on receipt of your post-card. When sold you remit us the 6/9, and you get a Beautiful Present, absolutely free. Send no money, we trust you. You take no risk, as they sell at once, and we receive back unsold goods. Colonials must send 1/- for extra postage.

FREE.

(Room 50) HYDE PARK WATCH CO., 14 Ranelagh Road, Paddington, London, W.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Guaranteed 4 years. Will work by hand or treadle. To ensure satisfaction, machine sent on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL: if desired can be paid 5/- Monthly. Write for terms. Designs, and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Short Stories.

No. 725. For the Week Ending November 22nd, 1902. One Penny.

FASCINATING NEW SERIES. BEGIN TO-DAY.

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. A beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

LORD REGINALD DAVENANT. Another of Belinda's suitors.

LADY HONORIA. The Duke's sister.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

HOW LADY PEGGY FINDS BELINDA.

Lady Peggy undertakes, for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, to chaperon Belinda, and to marry her to a son of some old and titled family. Staying at the same hotel in Cairo are the Duke of Eastacres and his mother, the Duchess. Lady Peggy and the Duchess agree that nothing could be better than a union of the Duke's title and Belinda's millions; everything is therefore done to bring this about. One evening, under the guidance of a fine looking Bedouin, they all go to witness a religious festival. Some dervishes are dancing when suddenly Belinda, excited beyond all self-restraint, throws herself into the midst of the fanatics and tries to imitate their weird dance. Her enthusiasm is misinterpreted. Instantly all is confusion. The guide, however, snatches Belinda from danger, and hurries them away. Belinda is profuse in her thanks, then suddenly with a cry of: "It is you, you! Lady Peggy, he's not a dragoman at all. He's David Carr," throws herself into his arms.

The dragoman is dismissed, and back at the hotel the Duchess of Eastacres takes Lady Peggy to task for the occurrence. Lady Peggy retorts that not long ago she saw the Duchess' own daughter Honoria in the arms of a real Egyptian. The Duchess is furious, calls Honoria, and after storming at her, is slapping her face when Belinda rushes in, rescues Honoria and takes her to her room. Shortly afterwards a fearful shriek is heard, followed by an impassioned appeal for "Help!" The voice is Belinda's!

We Visit the Pyramids.

I wasted neither time nor thought in wondering what had happened, but went swiftly up the stairs and across the corridor towards Belinda's room, Crawley and Lord Davenant following close behind. Doors flew open, anxious faces watched, eager voices questioned as I passed. "What did it mean, what could it be?"

Once more the cry of "Help!" rang out, but by that time I had reached Belinda's door, had turned the handle, crossed the threshold.

And then!

In the middle of the room I beheld Belinda, with terror-stricken eyes and white, blanched face, struggling with Honoria, struggling to gain possession of something that the distracted girl clasped tightly in her clenched hand, clenched with a strength and tenacity I had not thought her capable of showing.

In a flash I grasped the situation, and promptly took the initiative. I smartly shut the door and turned the key. Then, falling upon Honoria, with Belinda's help, forced her to unclose her fingers, which were convulsively gripping a small phial.

I uncorked the bottle, smelt the contents, and put it down with a queer, sickening feeling. A terrible tragedy had only just been averted. The bottle contained laudanum of sufficient quantity and strength to kill a far stronger woman than Honoria.

She, poor wretched girl, lay in a heap upon the floor, giving utterance to low, broken cries that brought tears to Belinda's beautiful eyes, and made me for a moment weaken. The next, I had pulled myself together.

"What does this mean?" I asked sharply. "Belinda, stop crying at once, and help Honoria on to the bed. Now," I demanded when my directions had been carried out, "will you please explain yourself?"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Honoria sat upright and gazed at me in an excited sort of way.

"I meant to take poison," she said slowly. "I came here, to Belinda's room, because I have no peace, no quiet in my own."

"What could have put such a wicked, such an awful idea into your mind?" I asked.

Honoria's thin lips twitched.

"You know," she said sullenly. "You know quite well my brother says I am to marry Mark Striven. Oh!" She shivered and her lips grew white. "I am frightened, frightened! Don't let him hurt me. Keep him away. Belinda"—she threw out her hands and clung piteously to the young girl.

"Surely, Honor, you are not so silly as to think of killing yourself because your brother says you are to marry a man you don't like?" said Belinda indignantly. "Don't marry him; refuse point blank, that's all you have to do."

"You don't understand," whispered Honoria. "How should you? Girls like you know nothing of the lives women like me have to lead. Listen," she grasped Belinda's wrist, bringing the fresh young face close to her own, "if I don't marry this man, my brother will have me sent away, shut up in a strange, terrible place, where I shall see no one but strange, terrible people. He has said so, and he meant it. And I am powerless to go against him. What can I do? There is nobody to help me—to care for me. Nobody but Hamed, and I dare not send to him. Look at me," she turned her head, and the light fell on her face, with its weak blue eyes, tremulous mouth, and indeterminate features. "No one wants me, or cares for me," she went on bitterly. "I'm neither pretty, nor clever, nor rich. My mother has always been ashamed of me, and my brother dislikes and despises me. They want to be rid of me, but there's only one way of doing that—marriage, and," she paused, "no one will marry me," she said, a flush in her cheeks. "No one but Mark Striven. I can't work," she put out her white, helpless-looking hands. "I should have to starve if I depended upon myself for bread. And I don't want to starve; that," she glanced towards the bottle that I still firmly held, "that is the easier way!"

"Honor, don't talk like that," beseeched Belinda. "I'll help you, dear. I'll be your friend. I'll lend you all the money you want, so that you can go away by yourself to some place where no one can find you except me and Hamed. I'll write to Hamed for you if you wish. I'll——"

All further undertakings on Belinda's part were nipped in the bud.

"You will please understand, my dear," I said calmly but firmly, "that I cannot countenance you in assisting Honoria to disobey her people. Her mother and brother are the best judges of what is for her good. How can a young and inexperienced girl like you understand what is fitting?"

"Honor doesn't wish to marry this person," retorted Belinda. "I can understand that, at any rate. If I can help it, she shan't marry him. Lady Peggy," she turned towards me swiftly, "perhaps the Duke doesn't understand how much Honor dislikes the idea. She finds it difficult to express herself at times, poor dear. Let me talk to the Duke? He was very nice to me this morning. Perhaps I may be able to persuade him. May I go, Lady Peggy?"

I smiled discreetly. Nothing could have pleased me better. Belinda's errand would give Eastacres a splendid opportunity for ingratiating himself with her. He would yield to her persuasions, and by doing so, imply the extent of his regard. My pretty, blue-eyed charge was knotting the end of the noose round her own neck.

I did not show my satisfaction at the proposition, however, but shook my head.

"The Duke would resent your interference, Belinda. Besides, it would be in vain. He is a very determined man, and most difficult to move!"

"I'll try, at any rate," and without waiting for permission, Belinda hurried off.

Awaiting the result of her mission I sat by Honoria's side and gave her good advice.

"You're fond of Belinda?" I observed.

A dispirited "Yes," came from the pillow.

"You wish to retain her friendship and companionship?"

Honoria turned an agonised glance upon me.

"You're not going to say she mustn't speak to me?" she gasped.

"Certainly not—unless you persist in being foolish. Belinda may remain your friend on one condition, that you don't tell her ridiculous stories about your brother—stories that are likely to influence her against him. Eastacres will probably marry Belinda. You understand?"

"You don't really mean to let her marry him?" she asked. "He said something about it this morning, but I didn't believe it. Lady Peggy, it's too dreadful to think of! He is a bad, cruel man; you don't know how cruel. He'll break Belinda's heart before she's been his wife a year!"

"Nonsense!" I returned sharply. I knew Eastacres hadn't an amiable disposition, but I didn't want to be reminded of it. "They'll be a most devoted couple if you don't prejudice Belinda against him. Anyway, understand this, Honoria, if you say a word against your brother I shall forbid Belinda to speak to you. If necessary I shall leave Cairo to avoid you. If, however, you behave properly, I've no objection to her seeing you occasionally."

Honoria sighed.

"I ought not to consent," she said. "Belinda's been very good to me, but I suppose I must. I'll say no more to her about Lawson, Lady Peggy."

"I'm glad to hear it, Honoria. If you would be as sensible in other matters you'd get on much better with everybody, Eastacres included. Take my advice now, and be nice to Mark Striven when he comes to-night."

"I can't," she moaned. "I can't!"

I had no energy to waste upon the foolish girl, so I did not further combat her obstinacy, but waited in silence until Belinda reappeared. She returned in triumph, with a fine colour in her cheeks.

"Your brother's come to see you, Honor," she said. "May he come in? He's been so kind, and he is so sorry that you're ill. Try to be nice to him," she added, as the girl showed signs of aversion at the mention of his presence.

"Come in, Duke," called Belinda. "Honor's better now."

In the short scene that followed, I must confess the Duke enacted his part to perfection. He assumed the affectionate yet grieved brother, and gently yet earnestly rebuked Honoria, till the silly thing was genuinely moved.

"You had better rest this afternoon," he said kindly. "I'll send some books up to your room. I shouldn't come down to table d'hote; you can have your food upstairs. Don't worry about Mark. Mother will look after him till I come back. Good-bye, Honoria, and don't worry." He stooped and kissed, yes, actually kissed his sister's forehead. Honoria sighed as he left the room, and Belinda, flushed with delight at her successful impersonation of a peace-maker, showed every sympathy.

The Duke and I held a short conclave in the corridor.

"Honoria won't say anything indiscreet to Belinda now," I whispered. "I've seen to that."

"A thousand thanks," said the Duke, smiling.

"And"—I laid my hand upon his arm—"try to be patient with your sister. Belinda——"

"I will be the most loving and considerate of brothers," he said, with a little sneer, "for the present. And now about the Pyramids, Lady Peggy. When are we going to start?"

"It's a little late to-day," I said dubiously, "it's just on five."

Digitized by Google

"We shall be at the Mena about eight," he answered anxiously. "I don't want to put it off. People will talk enough as it is," and he glanced angrily towards the room which, for the moment, sheltered Honoria from his wrath.

"Very well, Duke, it shall be as you wish, as you say our going will help to stop the gossip."

A quarter of an hour after our cavalcade set forth, thereby escaping something of the shower of questions and surmises that Honoria's escapade called forth.

"Matter, my dear?" said I to Midge, who was gasping with fright or annoyance, I can't say which. "Nothing at all. Honoria had a bad fit of hysterics and Belinda took fright, that's all."

My explanation or the reappearance of Reggie calmed her. She mounted her camel and ambled after Belinda and the Duke, already disappearing in the distance, while Crawley and I took our places in a carriage as more befitting our age and ideas as to comfort.

I leant back in my seat with a sigh of content. Life was going smoothly with me for the present, and in the future—the near future, I was certain of £20,000!

I quite blessed Honoria for her attempt at suicide. She had been the means of bringing Eastacres into close touch with Belinda. The Duke's ready acquiescence to her wishes had undoubtedly gratified the girl's vanity, and as a wise man remarked, "look after a woman's vanity, and her love will take care of itself."

We drove swiftly through the desert, fanned by a breezy wind that tossed the sand into tiny billows, and bent the tall heads of the distant palms. It had been a terribly hot day, and the cool of the approaching evening was very pleasant. The sun crept lower and lower towards the horizon. In its slanting rays the Nile gleamed a blood red, fading suddenly into a dusky grey. The sun had set. The grey crept from the river to the desert, deepening swiftly into night.

We found the rest of our party comfortably established on the verandah of the hotel, enjoying the view; Belinda and the Duke, with Reggie on the other side; Midge, a short distance away, was talking volubly to a good-looking boy in glasses.

"It's quite absurd, the way one meets people in Egypt," said Midge, pointing airily to her companion. "Long lost relations claim you as kith and kin, missing parents are unearthed by their sorrowing offspring, and prodigal sons are discovered playing with the fatted calf. Whoever could have dreamt of finding cousin Randolph right here at the Pyramids?"

She smiled in dazzling fashion at the hapless Randolph, who surrendered then and there to the little lady's charm. If Midge hoped to rouse the fire of jealousy slumbering in Davenant's heart by this manœuvre, she was grievously disappointed. Reggie appeared resigned, if not delighted, at the finding of the cousin; Randolph would free him from attendance upon Midge and give him time for attentions to Belinda.

There were a good many people at the Mena, Americans and English mostly, with a sprinkling of Egyptian officials. As usual, everybody stared at Belinda when we entered the dining-room, one man going so far as to pause in the discussion of an excellent omelette to study the lines of her profile.

She accepted the homage with her usual calm indifference, and exchanged remarks with the Duke in her clear voice with the greatest sang froid.

"Not go up the Pyramids to-night?" she cried, "Oh, Duke, this is unkind of you. It won't be any fun at all if we have to wait till the morning. I want to walk up like a human being, not wait to be hauled to the top like a bale of goods by a crowd of chattering, grinning Arabs."

"My dear girl," said Eastacres, "It is hardly safe to venture without guides after nightfall. You might stumble, catch your foot in a stone, or something equally dreadful."

"I'm not likely to fall," laughed the girl. "I can climb like a goat and jump, well, almost as high as a kangaroo. I shall be all right; besides, you'll be there to look after me?"

She gazed at him with a directness that robbed the speech of all suggestion of coquetry.

"Of course I shall, if you're bent on going."

"I must see the Great Pyramid to-night, at any rate," she said decisively. "Will you come, Lady Peggy?"

I smiled and shook my head. The Duke, I thought, would make a very efficient substitute. I had need of rest. I was compelled to change my views, however, when I heard that Reggie had determined to accompany the pair, with the unkind intention, I am sure, of spoiling the Duke's opportunity for private conversation. I appealed to Crawley to save the situation and pair with Davenant, but he refused to stir, and Midge haughtily declined even to consider the suggestion.

For a moment I was in despair. I hated the idea of a ridiculous and undignified scramble up an absurd heap of stones, but it seemed I should be forced to the sacrifice. Crawley, however, doubtless to appease his conscience, told me that a party had started for Cheops, generally called the Great Pyramid, just before we arrived.

"You'll meet them coming down, Peggy. You can insist on questioning them. That will insure you and Davenant a rest, and the Duke——" Crawley grinned and nodded his foolish head.

Reggie seemed hardly pleased when I appeared on the verandah.

"I'm coming too," I said, "it's such a lovely night," and with a gentle smile I slipped my arm through the young man's and held it lightly but firmly.

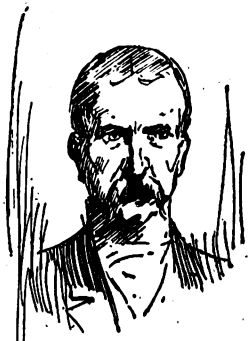
I suppose had I been as young as Belinda I should have felt as deeply stirred as she by the wonder and beauty of the scene. The desert, the wild free sea of sand that surrounded the hotel—an oasis of civilisation—was steeped in the wonderful white light of the African moon. Before us darkly frowning up against the sky rose the Pyramids, tombs of the great, immutable as death itself, changeless as eternity. Here and there grew clumps of spiky mimosa bushes, and in the moonshine a few stunted palms flourished their branches. And surveying it all with mystic and unfathomable smile, the face of the Sphinx looked over the desert, the People, and the Pyramids—the new world and the old.

In the distance the smoke of an Arab fire curled up to Heaven, tall, shrouded figures gathered round the blaze, while from the Mena came the click of the billiard balls, the sound of the mandoline, the ripple of a woman's laugh.

Belinda's enthusiasm grew as we approached the Pyramid. She hurried the Duke at such a pace that I had difficulty to keep up with them. Reggie, however, insisted I should make an effort, and, much against my will, assisted me with such earnestness that we did not once lose sight of them.

It is not a very difficult matter to climb the Great Pyramid, with plenty of time and breath. It is for all the world like going up a steep flight of stairs, only the resting-places are very far apart.

At the end of the first stage I sat down exhausted. Belinda, to my annoyance, followed suit, and gazed rapturously at the prospect. The Duke gazed rapturously too—though not at the prospect. Truly the scene before us was a marvellous one. We looked down at the Delta of the Nile interspersed with countless canals and rivulets winding about like silver threads, and glistening like jewels in the moonshine. In the distance gleamed the domes and palaces of Cairo, a diamond stud set in a silver fan.



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES'

I found some difficulty in recommencing my ascent, and by the time Reggie and I had joined the second stage Belinda and the Duke were half way up the third. At this point we encountered the party of tourists of which Crawley had spoken. One of them recognised Reggie, hailed him with glee, and, to my great satisfaction, button-holed him on the spot.

Digitized by Google

I left him to the tender mercies of his new companion, and scrambled up the last stage by myself. I was anxious to see how matters were progressing with Belinda and the Duke. I did not find them as I expected waiting my arrival, and I concluded they had gone to explore the tomb of Rameses. As a girl, I had been a frequent visitor to Cairo. My father was an ancient Egyptologist, and would spend hours in speechless admiration at the remnants of a temple or a portion of a tomb.

I had often and painfully climbed the Pyramids and explored them through and through. I had small difficulty, therefore, in finding the passage that leads to the Great Gallery and the King's Tomb.

Some members of the party we had met had left their candles stuck in the walls. I took one in my hand and by its dim light I could find my way in safety if not comfort. As I neared the end of the passage a whistle rang out clear and sweet as the trill of a bird.

"Listen to the echoes," cried Belinda, as the whistle returned again and yet again. And the terrible girl whistled once more.

The Duke did not attempt to end this unladylike performance, but clapped his hands in applause. In his enthusiasm he dropped the candle he was carrying; for the moment they were plunged in darkness, and just at that part of the passage, as I remembered with a horrible distinctness, there was a break in the masonry, a sort of pit into which it would be dangerous to fall.

Quick on my thought came a stumble, a cry. I rushed forward, light in hand. Belinda was standing safe, but rather white, on the farther side of the danger trap, leaning against the Duke. He was supporting her with tender yet eager solicitude.

"A narrow escape, Lady Peggy," he said, as I came up. "Another moment and Miss North would have had a nasty fall."

"You were very quick and very clever," said Belinda gratefully, "and most brave."

The Duke smiled and disclaimed any special courage. Personally, I don't think he had displayed any. On close inspection the pit proved to be little more than a foot deep, being nearly filled up with rubbish. But Eastacres took all possible credit for his performance, however, and fell in with the suggestion that Belinda should rest awhile in the great King's Tomb.

The tomb is a small room built of stone, and once upon a time contained the mummies of several Rameses. The burying-place of kings now served to give rest to Belinda. How those ancient persons would have opened their eyes could they have seen her, a fair-haired divinity in blue serge!

She was still a little frightened, and clung appealingly to Eastacres, as she would have clung to anybody at that moment. The pale face of the Duke flushed as he felt the pressure of her warm, bare hand. His breath came quickly, and his eyes narrowed as they wandered from point to point of her beauty. Her head thrown back, showed the curve of her round, white throat, with a glimpse of a small, pink ear. He tightened his clasp about the lissom figure and drew her closer to him.

Something of cruelty and exultance came into his face. He watched her as a boy watches the exquisite motions of a moth, desirous to catch the creature only that he may crush it.

For a moment I wished that Davenant and not the Duke was going to marry Belinda, but only for a moment; the next I remembered that Davenant's was only a courtesy title, he being the younger son of the Duke of St. Ormont, and, therefore, of no use to me or Belinda. It wasn't likely Hardy North would think a younger son worth £20,000.

"Are you better?" Eastacres asked slowly.

"Yes, thank you," said Belinda with a sigh. "It's awfully silly of me to be so foolish and turn faint when nothing's happened, but it's awful to feel the ground slipping from under one's feet."

"Terrible!" said Eastacres sympathetically. As he spoke he led her from the room, skilfully engineered her past the hole, and so into the fresh air once more.

Not more than fifteen minutes had elapsed since they had first entered the great passage. But in that fifteen minutes much had happened. Belinda looked upon the Duke as one who had saved her from a dreadful accident; her feeling towards him was softened. The noose already had begun to tighten.

The next day we went for an expedition in the desert. That is to say, Belinda and the Duke, Crawley and Davenant. Midge and I stayed at home. Randolph, the newly discovered cousin, hung about in disconsolate fashion. He was only petted when Reggie was there. During that individual's absence he was ignored, not to say snubbed.

Midge unburdened herself to me at great length in the privacy of her room.

"Reggie's behaving shamefully, Peggy," she cried with heightened colour. "It's scandalous the way he neglects me to go after this girl. I sent him a message last night to say that I must speak to him. He sent word back he was so awfully tired, would I excuse him? Tired! When I was waiting for him. A one time he thought nothing of fatigue or trouble when I was concerned. I can't stand it, Peggy. I shall do something desperate if it goes on. The girl doesn't want him, she doesn't mind if he's with her or not. You must tell her to snub him, Peggy. I mean it, you must give Belinda her orders in respect to Reggie!"

"My dear Midge, you are excited, and——" I glanced at the flushed, eager face, and thence to her open dressing-case. Rumour had it that Mrs. Murchison-Lee's vivacity and wonderful flow of spirits had their root in hypodermic injections of morphia. I thought an injection might be helpful at that moment. She seemed to read my thoughts, and coloured from brow to chin.

"I'm not using morphia," she said sullenly. Then, "Peggy, if you don't speak to Belinda I will. I'll tell her all about the Duke, and how badly he treated that pretty little Armstrong girl."

"Don't be absurd, Midge!"

"I mean it!" She grasped me by the arm, her eyes flashing, her face twitching. For the moment I was alarmed. Midge was utterly irresponsible. Her husband, a Chicago manufacturer, never interfered with her. She obeyed each impulse, every whim that seized her, and was quite capable of upsetting all my plans and hopes in regard to Belinda.

There was but one way of subduing the little woman. Deprive her of morphia, keep her without the drug that stimulated nerves and brain to such abnormal quickness, and she would be limp as a rag and as helpless.

"I shall tell Belinda," she repeated, and then, falling from temper to tears, threw herself into a comfortable chair, and rocking herself to and fro, sobbed piteously. Her head was turned away from me, towards the window, her face buried in a pocket handkerchief. Now was my time and opportunity.

"Poor Midge!" I said commiseratingly. "It's too bad that a girl in her first season should cut you out!" As I spoke I deftly lifted the lid from her dressing-case. There, in the lower compartment, nestling in the corner, was the bottle that I sought, together with the hypodermic syringe, a tiny little affair small enough to go into the pocket. I slipped bottle and syringe into mine softly, almost stealthily, and withdrew.

Digitized by Google

Midge was checkmated! She would not come down to dinner that night, I surmised. She would, in fact, be unable to do so. Such slaves are the victims of the morphine habit, that they cannot go without the drug for longer than an hour or two. And their sufferings if kept without are terrible. I meant Midge to suffer. She should only have her morphia back on certain terms, and in the middle of the desert she could not get a fresh supply.

There were two or three fresh arrivals at the Mena in the course of the day. Among them was Stanley Forbes, the famous barrister. A few years previous to the time of which I am writing, Stanley was one of the most prominent and most popular figures in Society. He was the heir to a baronetcy, and had large private means besides his practice, which brought him in some thousands. His prospective title and his personal charm made him a most desirable parti. Great, therefore, was the sorrow among ambitious mothers when he suddenly and unexpectedly threw up his work at the Bar and disappeared. Many and wild were the reasons assigned for his conduct. One tale I remember gained credence for a short time, to the effect that he was in love with a charming young cousin—an Irish girl who lived in the wilds of Galway. Rumour had it that one fine morning Sheila Kenwyn left her home, and had not been heard of since.

Stanley, broken-hearted at her loss, had vowed to find her and execute dire vengeance on the man who had taken her from home and from him. That there was a man in the case was a foregone conclusion.

Stanley was a tall, striking-looking man, with keen eyes and clear-cut features, and a particularly charming smile. He was a favourite of mine, and we enjoyed a quiet chat until dinner.

As I expected, Midge did not turn up. Neither did the Duke, or his party. After dinner I received a wild note from Midge, imploring me to come to her room. I put the note in my pocket—it would do her no harm to wait a little longer—and sat down by my window to enjoy the view.

I watched till once more the moon lit up the heavens, watched until I could distinguish the figures of Belinda and the Duke, with Reggie and Crawley close behind. The two first came straight into the hotel, Eastacres and Belinda lingered in the garden.

I leant as far out of my window as was consistent with safety, and resolved to watch them with intense excitement. Given a garden, or a wilderness—either will do—moonlight, a lovely girl, and a man versed in the art of pleasing women, and in most cases the result could be foretold with certainty.

If only the image of that hateful David Carr could be erased from the girl's mind. If only she could forget his tall, strong figure, his dark face and passionate eyes. If only——

The Duke was speaking quickly, eagerly, to Belinda. The girl listened, her face turned towards him. He took her hand and raised it to his lips.

The caress startled the girl, she drew back and glanced apprehensively towards the house. The action irritated Eastacres. I saw him catch his under lip between his teeth. Then, with a sudden, unexpected movement, he bent towards her. Holding her firmly round the waist, he drew her face towards his own. Belinda had found her master early in the game, I thought, and waited for the sequel.

It proved to be an unexpected one.

Suddenly, swiftly, without sign or warning, a figure stepped from the bushes at their back. A strong hand dropped upon Eastacres' shoulder and roughly drew him from Belinda's side.

"I've been looking for you, Duke," remarked the newcomer, "for a long time. Now I've found you I should like a little talk."

He smiled grimly as he spoke, and laid his hand once more upon the other's arm.

Eastacres' face seemed to grow absolutely bloodless. Then, with an effort, he steadied himself.

"I am at your service," he said quietly. "Miss North, you will excuse me?"

Belinda nodded, and hurriedly left them. A sudden foreboding of danger made me fling on a wrap, hurry downstairs, and steal after these two figures walking rapidly, crossing the desert.

My heart thumped painfully. I confess I felt afraid. Truly I had reason.

The man who had interrupted the Duke's conversation with Belinda at so critical a moment was Stanley Forbes!

He had sought the Duke—I knew it, I felt it—on account of Sheila Kenwyn. Stanley was a strong man, on occasions a ruthless one. Eastacres would be as nothing in his hands. I shook at the thought of what might happen. The scandal of an open quarrel between the two men would jeopardise, if not prevent Belinda's marriage; my plans would come to naught.

I could not tranquilly face such a possibility. For my own sake I must at all costs save the Duke from Stanley's wrath.

The two men paused in the moonlight. There was a dangerous look on Stanley's face, a look that frightened me. He meant mischief to Eastacres, and I, a mere woman, how could I hope to stop him?

I went forward and stood trembling between them.

(The result of Lady Peggy's interference will be told next Tuesday.)

HE: "So the engagement is at an end?" She: "Yes." He: "Who broke it?" She: "The minster who married us."

"THEN, Marie, you don't love me any longer?" "No, dear. I can only be a sister to you for the future." "A real true sister?" "Yes." "Ah, then lend me a sovereign."

"WHAT'S the matter, Brush? You look sad." "I am sad. I decorated a set of soup plates for Mrs. Hoodelle, and what do you suppose she did with them?" "Give it up. What?" "Used them for soup."

HE waxed eloquent over his fiancée's beauty. Her eyes were lustrous, her nose fine, her lips a theme for the poet. "And her teeth?" interrupted his friend. "Teeth," he murmured rapturously, "like those of a newly-born babe!"

Two soldiers lay under their blankets looking up at the stars. Jack: "What made you go into the army, Tom?" Tom: "Well, I had no wife, and I loved war, Jack, so I went. What made you go?" Jack: "Well, I had a wife, and I loved peace, Tom, so I went."

THE REJECTED ONE (after a painful pause): "I think, on the whole, I will accept your offer to be a sister to me; but on one condition." The Rejecting One: "What is it?" The Rejected One: "That you let me be your little brother. Then I can get even with some of my successors."

TARTAN COVER No. 6
Will Appear Next Week.

THE TARTAN WILL BE THAT OF MACDONALD OF SLEAT.

Don't miss it. Don't miss it.

Digitized by Google

AN UNSPOKEN ANSWER.

Or, Spoiling His Chances.

"Look here, Digby," observed Guy Maxwell to his chum, with that air of superiority which was peculiar to him, "there's only to-morrow left, and I must arrange to have a few minutes with Miss Lyttleton. She's the sort of girl who would make a fellow a real good wife. I rather think she likes me, and the fact that I am heir to a baronetcy, with a good income attached, will have some weight. I intend to have a try to-morrow."

Digby Grant blew out a cloud of smoke in order to hide the expression that crept over his face.

"That means," said Digby after a pause, "that you intend to propose to her to-morrow?"

"I don't see what other interpretation you can put on my words!" rejoined Guy, rather irritably. "You don't seem very bright to-day; you are tired after your walk. Your voice is a bit shaky. Have something to brace you up."

"No, thanks!" said Digby, forcing a laugh. "But go on."

"Well," continued Guy, "I have fallen in love with that girl. My life will not be a happy one if I do not win her! I have mentioned my intention to you, old fellow, because I wish to ask a favour."

"What is it?" inquired Digby, surprised. "I can't help you to win Grace—I ought to say, Miss Grace Lyttleton!"

"Yes, you can!" was the astonishing rejoinder. "I simply want you to keep out of the way. You see," pursued Guy, a trifle awkwardly, we are always together. Now, I can't propose to her with you by my side, so I want——"

"Oh, I'll clear out for the day!" agreed Digby. "You ought to get a good chance. I'm going to turn in now. You will have to-morrow entirely, and on the following morning we start for town. Good night!"

Digby Grant was not in a pleasant mood when he reached his own bedroom. He, too, was in love with Grace Lyttleton; he had been trying to arrive at a decision as to whether she cared for him or not—whether he would be likely to stand any chance if he proposed. He was not very well off, but nevertheless he could offer her a good home, and he was rising in his profession. Now, at the last moment, Guy had announced his intention of essaying the capture of Grace's hand and heart.

"I can't go behind his back," muttered Digby disconsolately, "so I must stand aside. Is she the sort of girl that would be captivated by the prospect of a title? I hardly think so, yet she may be in love with him, for women like a masterful man."

He pictured Grace Lyttleton as he had seen her that afternoon. A tender, sweet, loving and lovable girl; quiet and womanly; one who would make a perfect helpmeet, encouraging, soothing, and urging in times of trouble and illness, and filled with pride and delight when success crowned her husband's efforts. Guy Maxwell scarcely seemed the kind of husband for her; he was wilful, and his affection was of the passionate kind that does not endure; yet Grace might be in love with him, might be fascinated by him.

"I don't see that I have any right to interfere!" groaned Digby. "I must be off early, and go to—somewhere—for the day!"

He was true to his word, and Guy Maxwell watched for his opportunity. Miss Lyttleton was staying at the same hotel, where her father had taken a suite of rooms to accommodate himself, his daughter, and his young son, a boy of fourteen. Mr. Lyttleton thought it a bore to be compelled to spend two or three weeks away from his business, so he had letters sent on, and spent a fair proportion of his time in writing his instructions, talking to London on the telephone or reflecting over commercial problems in the smoking-room. Grace and Roy were left much to themselves, which was fortunate from Guy's point of view.

"The boy will be off somewhere, and she will be alone, so far as her relations are concerned," mused Guy, with great satisfaction. "I can manage to get her to a quiet spot somewhere inside or out, and the thing will be done."

He had to wait some time for his chance during the morning. Other gentlemen appeared to claim a goodly share of her attention, and she was playing tennis in the spacious grounds of the palatial hotel. Roy, too, seemed to be "dodging about," as Guy inelegantly phrased it, more than usual. However, the much-desired opportunity presented itself at last, and he found himself alone with Grace Lyttleton.

"May I have the pleasure of a walk and a talk with you in the garden, Miss Lyttleton?" he asked gallantly. "You must feel warm after that game, and the flowers are worth seeing. I am going away to-morrow, and I should like this last day of my stay here to be the happiest."

She glanced at him shyly, half frightened, but bowed and said briefly that she would like a walk among the flowers.

"I think she guesses what is coming!" said Guy exultantly to himself. "That makes my task easier!"

They went into the garden, and, after a few steps, he suggested that they should seat themselves on a rustic bench.

In spite of his masterful disposition, Guy felt a little nervous about beginning. He nerved himself, and said—

"Miss Lyttleton, I have asked you to come here because——"

"Oh, here you are!" chimed in a shrill voice. "Nice in here, isn't it? Got room for me?"

And Roy Lyttleton took a seat next to his sister.

"What do you think of Mr. Benson's play, Mr. Maxwell? Not up to much, is it?" asked the boy.

Guy made some kind of reply mechanically. He wished that young gentleman further, but he had to conceal his annoyance and be pleasant.

Guy Maxwell laid himself out to make another opportunity for the afternoon. He suggested to Roy that there was good scenery for an amateur photographer in the neighbourhood of Rookham, about three miles away, and that the day was a perfect one; Roy appeared to catch at the idea, and Guy was hopeful.

Guy felt just a trifle mean at the thought of spying on Miss Lyttleton in order to discover which way she went for a walk, but he did it, and was rewarded by seeing her alone on the cliffs.

"This is a fortunate meeting, Miss Lyttleton!" he declared, raising his hat. "Suppose we go to the base of that cliff? There is a pretty nook, invisible from here, and it would form a pleasant afternoon excursion. Don't you think so?"

Grace Lyttleton murmured that it might be so, but she was afraid to undertake any climbing on account of the fatigue.

"It is really very good of you to take so much trouble to make my stay agreeable, Mr. Maxwell," she said charmingly, "but I fear that it is a thankless task for you."

She looked at him with a strange expression, which he interpreted favourably. He stretched out his hand to take hers.

"I'm going to Rookham to-morrow or the next day, Mr. Maxwell!" said a well-known voice behind him.

Guy nearly uttered a rude exclamation, but he smothered it, and resigned himself to the loss of another opportunity.

The evening alone remained, and Guy vowed that, by hook or by crook, he would have his answer then. There was a ball that evening, so he would certainly get Grace alone at one portion of the entertainment. Roy would be in bed, that was one thing to be thankful for, and old Lyttleton was nobody.

He secured three or four dances, carefully selected by himself for convenient times, and felt certain of victory.

"She knows what to expect!" he murmured several times. "She's shy and restrained, which is a good sign."

When his first dance with her was over, he tried to lead her away to the conservatory, but her next partner claimed her.

The second dance was before the interval, so he was safe from the intrusion of the next partner. Without asking her, he led her away to a quiet spot; she appeared reluctant, but he paid no heed. If he lost this chance——!

"Miss Lyttleton—Grace! I must tell you!" he began, losing no time in preliminaries. "I cannot——"

"I say, it's late for me to be up, sis, and dad is cross! Do you think that Mr. Maxwell——? Oh, that is Mr. Maxwell!"

Roy looked as though he had said too much. Guy was on the point of telling him to clear off when Grace spoke.

"I am afraid father will be cross, Roy, but I must take the blame. I'll go and find him and explain. You will excuse me, won't you, Mr. Maxwell?"

She was gone before he had time to realise the fact. He gazed sternly at Roy; if he could get that young rascal out of the way, there would still be a chance after one of the other dances.

"Roy," said Maxwell impressively. "I want to have a quiet talk with your sister, and you come in every time. See here, I'll give you this half-crown if you'll go to bed—go anywhere and leave us!"

Roy's face lighted up and his arm began to stretch itself in the direction of the piece of silver; then his face grew sombre and he shook his head.

"That would be treachery," he explained. "Grace told me this morning that she expected you would try and say something to her if you were with her alone, and she didn't want you to. So she gave me a shilling to keep near her all day, so as you shouldn't have a chance, and I agreed. I'll stick to the bargain, even if I lose by it!"

Maxwell paled.

"Did she tell you why she didn't wish me to speak to her?" he asked, as an idea crossed his mind.

"Yes," admitted the boy. "She said she didn't want to hurt your feelings by saying something you wouldn't like, so it would be better to prevent you from saying anything to her. Girls are funny, aren't they?"

"Roy," said Maxwell, after a pause, "I understand now. I'll give you this half-crown on condition that you say nothing whatever about this chat we've had."

"Done!" exclaimed the boy, and the money changed hands.

"So that's my answer!" groaned Maxwell, as he made his way to his room. "Yet it was kindly on her part to wish to spare me a refusal. A refusal! H'm! That must be pretty uncomfortable for a man to hear when he expects to be accepted! Yes, it was a strange way of doing it, but a well-meaning way. Now I understand her apparently shy glances. I'm off by the earliest train to-morrow. I wonder if she is in love, and whom she loves?"

His question was answered six weeks later by the announcement in the newspaper of the engagement of Miss Grace Lyttleton and Mr. Digby Grant, the rising young barrister.

George Day.

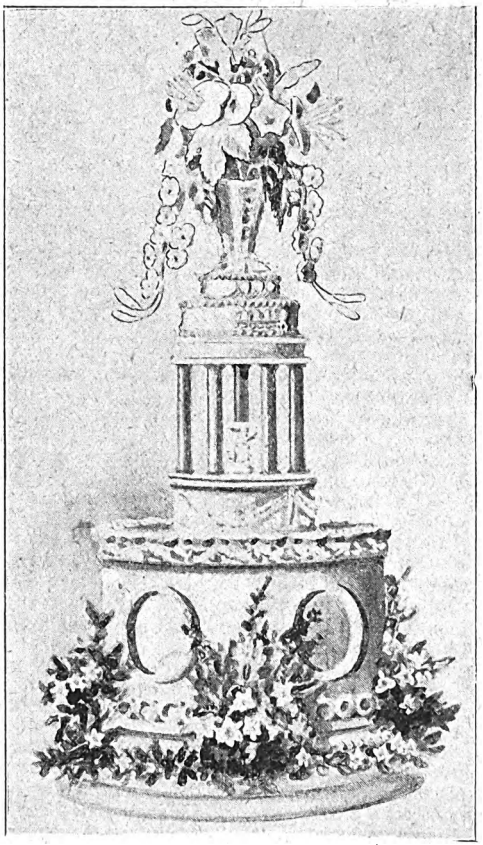
THE BEAUTIFUL BRIDE-CAKE

that we shall divide amongst 101 readers.

The lovely ornament at the top will go to one reader—perhaps you.

Miss Madge Morris will be married on Tuesday, December 2nd.

We shall purchase a big wedding-cake for Miss Morris,



and after the wedding festivities are over it will be cut up, put into boxes, and sent to certain readers of the paper.

Altogether, a hundred delicious pieces of cake will be sent out.

Moreover, the beautiful centre ornament from the top of the cake will also be offered as a prize.

The conditions under which you will be entitled to receive a piece are as follows:

All you have to do is to sit down and write a short congratulatory letter to Miss Morris on the auspicious occasion of her marriage. The reader who sends what Miss Morris considers to be the best letter will receive the beautiful centre ornament from the top, and the senders of each of the next hundred best will receive a piece of the cake.

Send your attempt to Miss Madge Morris, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., marking the envelope "Wedding" in the top left-hand corner, to arrive not later than Monday, December 1st.

Digitized by Google

Another Man's Love.

THE ROMANCE OF A SWIMMING GALA.

"Oh, hearts are fond and faith is frail, and the years are over-long,
And the man that loves another man's love, must do or suffer wrong."

PART I.

Tells How "Hearts Were Fond."

"Well, I bet you a new hat Murray wins, and wins easily. Ask Cassie what she thinks, she has any number of gloves wagered on him—haven't you, Cassie?"

The girl addressed blushed and laughed, the laugh had a little echo of embarrassment in it. She was looking out over the strong iron railing near which she stood with her companions. Beyond, the long concrete wall of the hot white pier dropped to the level of the flat ripples that lapped at it sleepily. A tiny breeze fluttered her smart costume of butcher-blue drill and fanned the pink cheeks under the shady blue hat.

"I—I think Mr. Murray has a very good chance, papa," was her demure answer; "he is what I believe they call a popular tip. And I hope he wins, not only on account of my gloves, but because he swims so gracefully, not like our lumbering local champions."

"Trust a woman for being on the side of elegance," said her father; "however, in swimming, elegance is all in favour of speed, and I fancy Murray's chances myself for that reason, Vallance. But some people would prefer him in a hundred or two hundred yards sprint; he is lightly built in comparison with our fisher folk, and strength tells in five hundred yards and upwards."

"Whether yonder pretty jackanapes of an artist wins or not, Dr. Gibson," retorted the third person of the small group, "there's one man who, if he were here, would give him thirty yards and a beating. And that's my boy Ben."

Dr. Gibson glanced shrewdly at the tanned, grey-bearded face of the speaker, and noted the flash in the eyes under the peaked, gold-banded cap.

"Perhaps you're right, harbourmaster," he answered, soothingly. "Ben swims a good racing-stroke, though I don't suppose he's had much practice, at least not since he got command of the Nova Scotian."

The harbourmaster leant on the rail before him, biting his grizzled moustache.

"That's as maybe," he rejoined, "but I'd back him to beat this whipper-snapper, any day of the week. He's a man, is my boy, and let Cassie here remember it."

Cassie Gibson shrugged her shoulders almost imperceptibly—her father was adjusting a pair of binoculars and did not notice it. But Eli Vallance did, and the scowl grew on his weather-beaten visage as he bent his gaze upon a distant barge, moored at the head of the still, land-locked harbour, whose waters shimmered under the westering sun. Around it, on wharf and pier and foreshore, on masts and spars and standing rigging, was gathered a crowd of eager spectators.

"They're ready for the start," said Dr. Gibson, peering through his glasses and fumbling meanwhile to unhook from his guard a fine stop-watch; "take this Cassie, and time them when I cry 'off!'"

His daughter secured the watch, put a finger-tip on the stop-lever, and waited.

"Off!" exclaimed the doctor. At the starter's signal four figures had dived from the deck of the barge, and four heads, one brown, three fair, with the fairness of the southern shiresmen, were visible upon the sapphire surface of the harbour. Cassie had touched the stop-lever and the long seconds-hand of her father's chronometer was flitting upon its way as four arms showed themselves intermittently in the powerful swing of the overhand racing-stroke.

The on-lookers regarded the contest silently, and then a sudden shout went up. Two of the fair heads had drawn clear of the other—the brown head imitated them.

"Aha!" said Dr. Gibson approvingly. "Murray's no fool, he's letting his rivals make the pace. Do you see, Cassie, he's swimming on his right side to watch them—it's lucky for him he's equally good on both. By Jove, child, you're correct—he is a pretty swimmer. No splashing or blowing, and his strokes carry him half as far again as those of his competitors—he cuts the water like a fish."

"I'll take your bet about the hat, doctor," observed the harbourmaster slowly; "he'll give out at three hundred yards."

"Done," assented the doctor, gazing critically through his binoculars. "Here they come past us, Cassie. Bravo, Murray, bravo!"

His big voice rang out cheerfully as the swimmers went down the harbour, two of the fair-haired south countrymen out of it, the brown head keeping abreast of the remaining competitor coolly enough. Yet there was something desperately exciting about the fierce energy with which the strokes were made by the powerful arms, one white as a woman's, one leather-hued with tan.

Cassie Gibson could hear her heart beat loudly as she stared at the ruffled water and saw the dark, clean-shaven face of Joscelyn Murray, a quiet smile upon it and a determined gleam in the wet hazel eyes. Swift and true his left arm swung in the mighty racing-stroke, and his slight, yet muscular figure hurtled under its impetus towards its goal.

Fifty yards from the judges' boat his opponent spurted—the fair head distanced the brown one. The shouting broke out again—and hushed, the artist had spurted, too. The leading swimmers drew level and, for an instant, hung side by side. Then an interval began to open between them—the spectators cheered them wildly, madly, vociferously. But the fight was already ended, the brown head had reached the judge's boat, the white arms were flung over the edge, the dripping, dark features were shaking themselves free of the sea water.

"Won by half a dozen lengths," said Dr. Gibson, pocketing his glasses, and consulting the watch in Cassie's fingers, "time, eleven minutes, twenty-five seconds. Harbourmaster, I take six and three-eighths; Cassie, my dear, you will have sufficient gloves for months."

He put his watch back on to its chain and chuckled. "I win several little cash bets," he added, "with your permission, Cassie, I'll go and collect them. Good day, harbourmaster."

Digitized by Google

"Good day, doctor, good day," growled Eli Vallance, and Dr. Gibson shouldered his way out of the crowd, a sturdy, middle-aged figure in a linen jacket and a Panama. But the harbourmaster stayed to put a heavy hand on Cassie Gibson's wrist.

"Cassie, my lass," he said. "I'm loth to do you a wrong, and it may be that you don't mean aught. Yet the whole port is talking about you and this artist fellow. You've been walking and talking and riding and boating together, for a matter of a month. If it wasn't for Ben it'd be none of my business, but you're promised to be my boy's wedded wife. The Nova Scotian is due any day. Supposing I was to let Ben know, when he gets back, how you've been philandering with Mr. Joscelyn Murray."

"I don't care, I'm sure," responded Cassie proudly. But her head drooped, nevertheless.

Eli Vallance pulled his peaked cap hard over his brows. "Maybe not," he replied hoarsely, "but it'd break Ben's heart, and he might break yonder young fool's neck into the bargain."

"Mr. Murray," declared Cassie, haughtily, "is quite able to protect himself. And if everybody is talking about—about Mr. Murray and me, as you say they are, Ben will hear whether you tell him or not."

The harbourmaster gripped her wrist tightly. "Cassie," he murmured, "don't, for heaven's sake—don't spoil my boy's life. Ben was fond of you as a little lad, you were like brother and sister together. Now he's got his ship and can marry and settle down. Don't break his heart, Cassie, don't do it! I'm sorry if I spoke clumsily—I'm only a clumsy old man, but I love my boy. Say you've only been fooling with Murray, and I'll tell Ben that I watched it and laughed at it, whatever folks tell him."

Cassie released herself and looked down into the azure waters below.

"I—I—perhaps I have been fooling," she said, in a strange, quiet voice. "There, Ben shan't have anything to complain of, Mr. Vallance, I promise you."

Eli Vallance coughed awkwardly. "Don't remember it against me, lass," he pleaded. "My—my speaking about it. I expect there was no need, but Ben's my only child, Cassie, and—and he loves you better than he does me. Well, I'll be off, Cassie, you've taken a load from my mind, you have indeed."

Cassie Gibson sighed heavily as the harbourmaster stepped over the railing and went along the edge of the breakwater.

She herself did not move from the spot, but stood, trifling with her parasol, and biting at her delicate underlip. At length she was roused from her reverie.

There stood Cassie Gibson, a tall, distressful shape, gazing on at the wreck.

"Well, Miss Gibson," said a pleasant, masculine voice, "I managed to win you your gloves, you see."

The doctor's daughter turned. Joscelyn Murray had come unperceived along the pier—now relieved of its crowd, for the five hundred yards scratch race had been the last event of the swimming gala—and paused by her, a modest, personable young Englishman in grey flannels and a straw "boater." He was rather more like a lawyer than an artist, save for the soft, somewhat dreamy expression of his dark eyes. His curly brown locks were still damp with the sea water.

Cassie did not meet his glance. "Yes," she answered, "it was quite exciting—papa waxed positively enthusiastic."

The artist laughed and leant on the rail near her. The sun was westering fast and the small sea-port of Meols—pronounced by the natives as Mells—was all aglow with the last of a glorious afternoon. In its compact, picturesque bay a white-winged pleasure-yacht or two, under a press of canvas, tacked hither and thither, and wandering rowboats crept about it like water-beetles. Meols was a lovely corner of the south-west coast, and Joscelyn Murray might have been forgiven, on purely professional grounds, his prolonged stay within its straggling borders.

The painter was putting a thumb and finger into a vest-pocket. He drew out a short strip of narrow pink ribbon, rather damp and woebegone.

"I did as I said I would," he remarked with a smile in which a certain grave tenderness was mingled, "carried my lady's favour to victory. I'm afraid it was a trifle conspicuous, tied on my wrist, but probably no one noticed it. By-the-bye, you never told me you forgave me for stealing it.

"I'm not so sure that I do," rejoined Cassie. "I may have some difficulty in matching the shade, and, besides, you tore the chiffon of my ruffle in pulling that streamer off it."

"I'm sorry," said the artist penitently, "especially as I wanted to ask your advice about something. That confounded prize I've won—it's a silver tea-service, presented by a local tradesman. I've no use for a silver tea-service, and I thought perhaps that you would—that you might——" Cassie Gibson cut swiftly into his sentence.

"I couldn't think of it, Mr. Murray," she assured him, a fraction of severity in her tone, "such a present would be too valuable for me to receive—except as a wedding-present, and as you are merely an acquaintance of my father's and do not in the least know Captain Vallance, I—I fear——"

Joscelyn Murray was staring at her amazedly. "Cassie—Miss Gibson," he gasped, "what in Heaven's name——"

Cassie turned away, yet he heard the sob that rose in her throat. "It's quite true," she said, "forgive me my unceremonious fashion of breaking the news. But I am really to be married one of these days—a woman's usual fate, after all—to Captain Vallance. He is our harbourmaster's son, and commands a Meols vessel, the Nova Scotian."

The artist twisted the bit of ribbon round his finger. "I—I congratulate Captain Vallance," he responded, and there was a bitter note in his voice. "I shall hope—notwithstanding my lack of acquaintance with your future husband — to be allowed to — to dance at your wedding. Luckily one doesn't have to dance with one's heart, only with one's feet."

Digitized by Google

HAVE YOU ENTERED OUR WEDDING COMPETITION? SEE PAGE 647.

A second sob came to his ears. He held out the bit of ribbon. "I ask your pardon for this piece of folly," he said; "our friendship has been very pleasant to me."

Cassie made no motion to take the damp little strip. "Thank you," she faltered, averting her head, "I—I do not deserve such a friend." She raised her hand to her long lashes, as if to wipe away a tear. "Here is dad coming for me," she added. "I—I think I will go and meet him."

Joscelyn Murray assented mechanically, but his fingers sought hers. Two hands encountered and clasped lingeringly. The next moment Joscelyn Murray had slipped out of sight down a flight of landing-steps, to escape an interview with the genial, sharp-eyed doctor, and to stand for some time, twisting the scrap of moist ribbon and biting his lip. The victory to which he had borne the little favour had suddenly become as dust and ashes in his mouth.

PART II.

Shows That "Faith Was Frail."

"MR. MURRAY! MR. MURRAY!—just a moment, sir!"

A door swung slowly inwards and the artist appeared. He was dressed in pyjamas, a big meerschaum pipe was balanced between his fingers, those of the other hand held a book, and his brown hair was ruffled picturesquely.

"Dear, dear, sir!" said his disturber, a red-cheeked, red-nosed man in a collarless shirt, unbraced pantaloons, and down-at-heel slippers; "what a time of night, or rather morning, to be sitting up. I made no doubt you'd be asleep."

Joscelyn Murray coloured and looked down ostentatiously at his book as he stepped out on to the landing of the little seaside hotel.

"I was trying to read," he answered, "I had an attack of sleeplessness. Is anything wrong?"

"There's a barque ashore in the bay, sir," he was told, "I fancied perhaps you'd like to see them launch the lifeboat."

The artist threw his book back into the room and began to unbutton his sleeping-jacket.

"By Jove I should, landlord," he said, "they might want someone to pull an oar."

The landlord of the Regatta Hotel shook his head and snuffed thoughtfully a candle he carried. "They've a full crew," he responded, "and reserves—there's no call for such as you to risk their lives, sir."

"My life," exclaimed the artist, "is a very useless, purposeless thing, Bateson, and well worth risking on any decent excuse. But I must see the launch, whatever happens."

He went in to fling some clothes on, leaving Mr. Bateson to carry off himself and his candle in a species of bewilderment, so unexpectedly bitter had been his guest's retort.

Joscelyn Murray donned a thick sweater and a pair of rough trousers. "Perhaps they'll let me go in the lifeboat if I insist," he muttered, as he put a mackintosh loosely over his garments, "it would be a good end if—if there were any accidents. I'm only in the way now—in Cassie's way."

The artist picked up something from his toilet table. It was the bit of pink ribbon and he tied it upon his wrist once more. "My lady's favour," he murmured, and the words sounded like a sneer.

Catching up a cap, he ran down the creaking stairs and out of the hotel. The landlord followed him and they went along the sea-front together. A storm had burst over Meols with the first flush of the dawn, and in the wan daylight the great waves from the bay were thundering across the little esplanade. Out to sea, just where an ugly reef formed, at low water, a flat black island, were the three masts, two of them square-rigged, of a smart modern barque. A fluttering rag or so of canvas on her foremast showed that what sail she had dared to leave set in her attempt to beat off-shore against the sudden storm, had been blown from the bolt ropes.

"She's thought to be a Meols ship, sir," shouted the landlord in the artist's ear; "the Nova Scotian—old Eli Vallance's son is skipper of her, she was reported past the Lizard this morning, it seems."

An exclamation burst from Joscelyn Murray's lips. "Captain Vallance!—the Nova Scotian!" he cried, "why——"

He stopped, recollecting Mr. Bateson's presence. But an uncontrollable thrill ran over him as he realised that upon that wave-lashed hull, out there in the wild green seas, was the man who stood between him and Cassia Gibson.

His companion pressed on and the artist kept abreast of him. The lifeboat house fronted the bay from the inner edge of the esplanade. They reached it to find a team already harnessed to the ponderous carriage and straining it down the concrete slope. At the top of the beach her crew got into her—Meols fashion—big and bearded men in cork jackets, oilskins and sou-westers. A crowd of fisher-folk ranged themselves to push at the laden carriage—Joscelyn Murray noticed that Dr. Gibson was aiding them unassumingly—the whip of the teamster cracked, and the bulky vessel was thrust towards the furious sea. The artist caught his breath as he wondered what would be the result of the battle between that handful of men and the elements—an awful hope had sprung up in his heart. He banished it with a shudder.

Suddenly a cry rose from the margin of the thundering waves. A huge roller, washing far in-shore, had caught the laden boat, lifted her from her carriage, filled her, and dropped her upon it again—transversely, so that she rolled into the surf. Joscelyn Murray started from his absorption and hastened down the beach.

The crew of the lifeboat were struggling back to the shore, borne up by their cork jackets, the boat herself wallowed like a wounded creature in the waves. A hundred willing hands seized and dragged her up. Another shout arose—a shout of alarm and dismay that made itself heard high above the howling of the storm. A horrified murmur went round among the helpers on the beach.

"She's broken her back, sir," said a voice by the artist. He looked and saw the landlord of the Regatta Hotel—whitefaced and dripping, Mr. Bateson had already thrown himself into the contest with the storm.

"Wouldn't have believed it possible if anyone had told me," added the landlord, gaspingly. "Well, they'll have to try a rocket and the breeches buoy. But the nearest rocket-brigade is at Frisby, five miles off, where they've no life-boat, and no telegraph or telephone either, worse luck. We'll have the brigade here as quickly as my best horses and a brake can fetch them, and that'll not be much under an hour, everything else serving."

He panted away in pursuit of the harbourmaster. Eli Vallance had just passed them, his cap gone, his white hair fluttering in the wind.

"Rockets be—— !" he swore, at the landlord's first words; "the barque will begin to go to pieces in no time if this sea lasts. But we're not beaten yet."

The harbourmaster turned to the crowd of fisher-folk and threw up his hands appealingly.

"Lads," he cried, "I want volunteers—we'll try for her in a gig. You know who are yonder—your own sons and brothers and one of the finest skippers that ever sailed, my boy Ben."

"It is useless, my poor friend," said a pitiful voice—Dr Gibson had come up the beach and stood beside the white locked, desperate figure, "if the lifeboat can't cope with a sea like that, what will happen to a cockle-shell?"

Digitized by Google

Eli Vallance laughed wildly. "You're a coward, Gibson," he exclaimed, "a rotten coward. But the men of Meols are no cowards—look lively, lads, there's no time to be lost."

A bronzed form or two stepped forward dauntlessly, but the rest faltered. "It's throwing life away," said one, "I'd chance mine with any man, but I've a wife and young children. It's suicide, Mr. Vallance."

A wail burst from the harbourmaster. "Cowards! cowards!" he cried, "and here's my boy's betrothed and many another lass to call you so."

Joscelyn Murray touched the excited old man upon the arm. The artist had seen Cassie Gibson suddenly, a tall, distressful shape, wrapped in a long cloak and gazing out at the wreck, a group of rough women near her. A lump rose in his throat and a pang of jealousy cut him to the heart. It was lost in a nobler impulse and he found himself interrupting the bitter denunciation of the harbourmaster.

"Mr. Vallance," he said, "there is another way, let me try it."

Eli Vallance lifted his head, the tears were running down his withered cheeks. "You!" he exclaimed.

"Yes," answered Joscelyn Murray, "I'll swim out with a line. I—I can do it, by diving through the rollers."

A murmur of admiration and dissent ran round the throng on the beach. "The rocks, sir, the rocks!" said an old fisher-wife; "you'd be battered to death, dive or not."

The artist threw aside his mackintosh and pushed off his shoes. "The middle of the bay is all sand," he rejoined, "she's struck just over the bar and that's sand, too, of course. There's a chance. Give me a line—the best and lightest you have."

With anxious faces and almost reluctant haste they brought the long, fine cord and arranged it skilfully that he might pay it out as he went instead of dragging it from the shore. The harbourmaster wrung his hand, but Dr. Gibson frowned.

"Madness! madness!" he said. There was a little cry, the echo of his own melancholy tone, and Cassia, standing by him, reeled and fainted in her father's arms. Joscelyn Murray had mounted the disabled lifeboat as she lay lifting to the surf, ran along the sloping gunwale, and leapt far out into the rollers

The captain led her forward. "My wife," he explained. "Your what?" cried Joscelyn in astonishment.

The pathetic feminine cry and swoon passed unnoticed by the majority of the helpers on the beach. With breathless tension, straining their vision through the grey morning, they waited for a glimpse of the daring swimmer. A moment, another, and yet another slipped away and then a sigh burst from every bosom. The artist's head had emerged, visible for an instant to those upon the higher ground of the beach. Then it was lost again in the swirling green seas.

"He'll not do it," said the landlord of the Regatta Inn; "a pity, a great pity, he is a brave fellow." And Mr. Bateson gazed wistfully at the turbulent surface of the bay. Many an eager glance was focussed on the angry billows, but nobody contradicted the pessimistic Mr. Bateson.

Meanwhile, Joscelyn Murray, progressing by a series of long dives and aided by the now changed run of the tide, was nearing the sandy bar of the small bay. Soon he had to forge athwart the set of the current and it tried him to the utmost. Beaten, buffeted, smothered in a whirl of glassy, foam-flecked billows, he struggled on, husbanding his strength as far as he might for the contest with the breakers that hammered upon the good ship Nova Scotian. He dared not dive any more, but allowed the rollers to carry him forward, treading water to peer over their tops.

At length a giant wave hurled him forward and he felt a shock that numbed him in every limb. He had been dashed against the reef on which the barque had struck. Above him he could see the hull and quivering masts of the vessel, enveloped to her main-top in clouds of driven foam. But the shock to the daring swimmer had been critical, it had enfeebled, if not injured him—a sense of lethargy crept over the artist, a retreating roller dragged him back, to fling him again upon the reef.

Unexpectedly he was seized in a pair of strong arms. A big and powerful swimmer had dived far out over him from the deck of the vessel and risen behind him, to grasp the artist dexterously. A rope was bound about the waist of the rescuer, it tightened and they were drawn up into the barque.

Finding his feet on the listing deck of the vessel, Joscelyn Murray shook out the last few coils of the line he had brought from the shore, and lashed it to the mainmast. Then he looked about him with a certain curiosity.

Digitized by Google

His rescuer clapped him on the back. "You are a brave fellow and no mistake," the artist was told, "we'd almost lost hope when we saw the lifeboat go wrong.

Joscelyn Murray dashed a trickle of water out of his eyes and surveyed the speaker—there was something about him that recalled the tanned and wrinkled features of the harbour-master.

"This is the Nova Scotian?" he asked. The other nodded; he was a bluff, fair-haired Englishman.

"Hamburg to Meols," he pursued, "and I'm her skipper, worse luck, Captain Vallance—my dad is harbourmaster here."

"Quite so," said the artist, coldly; "well, suppose we get this line in and rig up a substitute for the breeches buoy. The sooner we're all ashore the better."

His curt advice was promptly acted upon and ten minutes later a stout rope had been stretched between the shore and the ship, with a basket and hauling-tackle upon it. The means of escape were complete.

"Ladies first," observed the captain of the Nova Scotian, and he motioned invitingly to a closely-wrapped, yet obviously girlish figure that had been watching interestedly the procedure of rigging the impromptu device. "My wife," he added explanatorily, and with a sailor-like courtesy, for a brief inspection of the artist had convinced him that the latter was no common long-shoreman or Meols fisher.

Joscelyn Murray leapt an inch into the air. "Your what?" he cried.

"My wife," repeated the captain, as he glanced affectionately into a blonde, pleasant face, blue-eyed and blushing. "Sweet ending to a runaway honeymoon trip, isn't it. Luckily Gretchen is a sailor's child herself and doesn't know what fear means. But won't the old man give me a keelhauling for marrying a Dutch lass." And he sighed as he helped his pretty partner into the basket that swung from the suspended cable.

* * * * *

Captain Benjamin Vallance was right. The "keelhauling"—which is maritime slang for a warm quarter of an hour—was duly performed by the indignant, if relieved harbour-master, who was, however, persuaded ultimately to welcome the little Dutch girl as his daughter-in-law, much to the gallant captain's gratification.

"Sorry to give you all such a surprise, dad," said that person the next day, after a long talk with Joscelyn Murray and another with Cassie Gibson, "but I loved Gretchen and she loved me, and I knew Cassie didn't and never would. So I exploded all that boy-and-girl nonsense by getting married in Hamburg. And a nice ending my honeymoon trip would have had if it hadn't been for Mr. Murray. But bless you, Gretchen and I have got it out of Cassie that she's not particularly sorry to be rid of me. So here's their healths." And he lifted the glass that stood at his elbow.

"Whose healths?" demanded his father irritably.

"Cassie's and Mr. Murray's," said the skipper of the Nova Scotian, "and may he come as safely through the stormy seas of matrimony as he did through those of Meols Bay."

And Captain Benjamin Vallance drank his own toast with enthusiasm.

R. Norman Silver.

PHILANTHROPIST: "Look here, my man, didn't I give you sixpence last night to get a bath?" Tramp: "You did, yer honour, but I tried it before, an' you get just as dirty again!"

A FRENCH lady, of very elegant figure, was recently asked why she always had such enormously stout servants. Her answer was characteristic: "To prevent them wearing my clothes when I am away from home."

"JANETTE, I'm afraid you're a vain little wife. You gaze into your mirror so much." "You oughtn't to blame me for that. I haven't your advantage." "What's that?" "You can see my face without looking into a mirror."

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

November 18.—An unfavourable year for those whose birthdays fall here. Much competition and annoyance in business and over home affairs.

Girls will have many minor troubles in love matters.

The day is evil for marriage, pleasure, signing papers, and dealing with superiors.

A child born here will be careless, romantic, and moody; will not have a fortunate life.

November 19.—A mixed year is promised; Health will need extra care. More than usual activity and some pleasant events in home circle.

Young girls will find love affairs very interesting; if engaged they marry.

The day is good for dealing with opposite sex. Evil for doing business with landlords and farmers.

A child born to-day will be active, affectionate, and clever.

November 20.—Rather a fortunate birthday; those in employ are promoted. Insure against fire and mishap.

Love affairs go favourably, and girls become engaged or marry.

The day is good for asking favours, marriage, and doing business with governmental bodies.

A child born here will be ambitious, fond of change and adventure.

November 21.—An unfortunate year for business, and finances. Beware of law, and have a care in signing papers.

Girls born near 4 p.m need caution and prudence in dealing with the opposite sex.

The day is unfavourable for most things. Don't speculate, sign agreements, nor lend to friends.

A child born this day will be unsettled, improvident, and unfortunate in most matters.

November 22.—A trying year; sickness in domestic circle; health will need care; those in employ are in danger of losing it.

Girls will meet with deceit from opposite sex.

The day is evil for marriage, visiting, engaging servants and asking favours.

A child born to-day will be idle, careless and often without employment. If a girl the health will be poor.

November 23.—The year will be full of change; much travelling and movement.

Girls born near 5 or 6 p.m. receive attentions from married men and should beware of deceit.

A child born here will be stubborn, moody, and malicious. Will be fond of travel, and subject to accident.

November 24.—Good and evil come into the following year. Be cautious in buying and selling. Some pleasant events in domestic circle.

Girls will receive attentions and become engaged or marry: a good year to visit and seek introductions.

The day is good for asking favours, and dealing with those in authority.

A child born here will be ambitious, affectionate, and will rise in life.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

A Juggler's Daughter.

The Story of a Dark Cloud and a Silver Lining.

1882.

"Doctor Beckett?"

"Yes, what do you want?"

"I want you to come with me to a dying man!"

"Who is it?"

"No one you know, doctor. No one living in the place, I mean."

"But I don't know you! Ah! I have it now. You belong to one of the travelling shows, just come in for the fair."

"You've hit it, guv'nor! That's me."

"Well, is the sick man also a van-dweller?"

"Yes. It's old Joey Baretta, the juggler! He's struck for death, and wants to see you."

"To see me? It must be a mistake. I have never heard of him."

"It's no mistake; for the old 'un had got your name as pat as mine, and I've knowed him more nor a year or two."

"Well, I'll go with you. Just wait a minute while I put up a few things. Baretta—never heard the name in my life."

The flashily-dressed, shabby-looking individual, who had knocked up Dr. Miles Beckett just before dawn, on a raw, dark morning in October, was not a person likely to inspire confidence in a staid country practitioner, not too well versed in the ways of the world.

The doctor had a prejudice—a deep-rooted prejudice—against folks of this kidney, and even in broad daylight gave them a wide berth.

But the man's assertion of Baretta's knowledge of, at least his name, puzzled him, and roused in him a strange feeling of curiosity.

"It's a good step," said the doctor's guide, by way of apology. "That Parson-Squire of yours keeps us well outside. Won't let us come within touchin' distance, if he can help it. Hates show folk, he does."

"Yes, he's not a bad judge," replied the other, with a dry cough. "But this man, Baretta, is he married—has he any family?"

"Well, it's like this 'ere—his wife's dead—a toff she was, he run away with her, and he's got one young 'un, a girl, four years old."

"Ah, this is the place, I suppose?" said the doctor, as they stumbled into a tangle of vans, tents, tethered horses, and all the scattered, ragged and dirty paraphernalia of a stroller's encampment.

"Nat!" said a voice out of the darkness, and apparently proceeding from a large van, the windows of which showed a dim light, through the grimy blinds, "Got the doctor? The old man's nearly gone. He's bin callin' for you this arf 'our or more."

"All right, doctor's here. You keep outside till I tells you."

On the lowermost bunk in the hot, stifling van lay a man, evidently prematurely old. His hair was grey, his features drawn and ashen white.

Doctor Beckett lost no time, but went down to look at him.

"Here, the light—you!" said the doctor sharply to his guide. "I thought so."

Filling a small pocket-glass with brandy, he put his arm under the sick man's head, lifted him slightly, and made him drink the spirit.

It was at this moment that the doctor was conscious of another presence.

Half hidden by the curtain at the bed-head, he could just make out in the gloom a little figure, a girl-child, whose large round eyes were fixed in terrified intensity upon the face of the dying man.

"You sent for me!" he said to the latter. "Have I seen you before? Do you know me?"

"Yes, I know you, but you have never seen me," was the whispered reply.

"I don't understand."

"Your sister—doctor—Ivy——"

"What do you know of her, man?" cried Dr. Beckett, startled out of himself. "My sister disappeared years ago! What of her?"

"She—she died—when this little one was born."

"You are dying!" the doctor responded, with almost brutal frankness. "You would not, you could not deceive yourself or me with such a statement, if it were not true."

"It is true!" came with laboured articulation. "In those days I was just from Milan, young, famous, rich! I saw your sister at Liverpool. I loved her—she loved me, and, Heaven forgive me if I did wrong! I persuaded her to marry me and to cast in her lot with me."

"Yes, yes, and then?"

"Then," went on the dying man with ever-increasing gasps for breath—"then was the happiest time of all my life. One, two, three children were born and died; and now, come closer—I cannot see you—now—my—my little Ivy—my baby. I go from her."

The child heard and understood. Throwing herself across her father's breast, in an abandonment of grief, she kissed his thin, pale cheeks, beseeching him—crying bitterly the while—not to leave her.

Tenderly the doctor detached her arms from around Guiseppe Baretta's neck and lifted her away.

Sitting her on his knee, with her head against his shoulder, he spoke again.

"You are distressed for the child's future?" he said. "But why did you not send her to me when my—when your wife died?"

"Send her away!" was the almost fierce reply; the last flicker of the lamp of life. "My Ivy—the one thing in all the world I had to love me and to love!"

"Well—no—perhaps you could not. But listen. I will take her now. She is my own flesh and blood. We—my wife and I—have no children. She shall be to us as a daughter. Will that comfort, and content you?"

Guiseppe Baretta was beyond speech. His eyes rested for a second only upon the fair-haired child he was leaving, and with a satisfied smile upon his lips, he fell back dead.

* * * * *

1902.

The following extract is from the Morning Post of September 18th.

"Sir Randall and Lady Ivy Sandys have returned from the Austrian Tyrol, whither they went for their honeymoon.

"Lady Sandys, who it may be remembered, is the niece of Sir Miles Beckett, Physician-in-Ordinary to His Majesty, is one of the loveliest women in Society, and as popular as she is beautiful. The match was quite a romantic one. Sir Randall, with all the honours of the late campaign thick upon him, and being one of the most distinguished heroes of the hour; having won his wife, Othello-wise, as it were, and for the sake of 'the dangers he had passed.' General Sir Randall Sandys, who has received a baronetcy, is quite twenty-five years the senior of Lady Ivy."

Digitized by Google

"Isn't it too bad?" said the lady, passing the paper to her husband across the table. "There is absolutely nothing sacred with editors nowadays!"

"It is one of the penalties of over-civilisation, I suppose," said the bronzed soldier opposite. "There is one thing, it breaks no bones, and we can afford to laugh at it."

They were at breakfast at Claridge's the morning after their arrival.

"As soon," continued Lady Ivy, "as I have safely packed you off, sir, to the War Office, I am going to see Uncle Miles."

"That's right, dear, and directly I have finished my business I will follow you."

Within the half hour the dainty little figure—not to be recognised as one with the grief-stricken child of twenty years before, watching the dying juggler, her father, in a stroller's van—tripped down the great staircase and into her brougham.

"Dear old uncle," she kept repeating to herself—her aunt had been dead for many years—"home would not be home without him!"

The drive was a short one across Oxford Street to Seamore Place, Park Lane.

The once obscure country doctor was now the famous and honoured specialist. A member of the reigning house had been practically saved by his skill, and the reward was a knighthood and a Court appointment.

From the night when he had taken his sister's child to his own home, he had loved her as a father; while she regarded him with, if possible, even greater affection.

As she grew up, she developed personal gifts that attracted round her half the fortune-hunters of London.

Not that Sir Miles Beckett was a millionaire or even an exceptionally wealthy man, but he was sufficiently rich for his niece and adopted daughter to be an object of consideration to impecunious matrimonial speculators.

Her early life with her father, all the squalor and the misery of an ever-deteriorating nomadic existence, gradually became but a dim memory; so that by the time she met with her life's hero, the past was practically forgotten. Ivy Beckett the famous physician's adopted child, and Ivy Baretta, the daughter of Guiseppe, or Joey Baretta, the Italian juggler, had, in the eyes of the world, nothing whatever in common.

With wedding presents from Royalty itself and from a large section of the upper ten thousand, Ivy Beckett's transformation into a successful general's wife, and a future Society leader, was but one more notable instance of Nature's delight in the exceptional and the rare.

As Ivy descended from the carriage at her uncle's door, she saw what she had failed in her excitement to notice before, that the coachman (the brougham was one of Sir Miles', sent by him for her use till she was settled) was grinning a recognition.

"Why, Plunkett!" she exclaimed, with a smile, "is that you? You don't look a bit altered!"

"Nor more do you, miss—my lady—I beg your ladyship's pardon!"

"That's all right, Plunkett! You and I have known each other for a few years. And has my uncle lent you to me?"

"Yes, my lady! He said he thought I'd take more care of you than the second coachman."

"Just like him, isn't it, Plunkett? You needn't wait. I'm going to stay all day with Sir Miles."

The meeting between uncle and niece was something neither would be likely to forget. He had missed her so, this lonely, prosperous man, and she, though her heart was now given to a husband, had looked forward to seeing him again with all the great love of a child for her father.

Later on, when the General joined the little family circle, it was a question whether a happier one existed in all England.

While the two were alone, however, Sir Miles was suddenly reminded by a chance remark of Ivy's of the death-bed scene of twenty years before.

"Uncle," she said, "have you not a picture, a trinket, or some little thing once owned by my mother which you could give me?"

"Why, of course I have, child! Your father the night he died gave me a packet, which, somehow, I have refrained from opening until now."

"Oh, fetch it dear, do! I think that I should be still happier than I am, if I could only see and touch something which belonged to—my mother."

He went and got it, and together they opened it.

There was a miniature of the first Ivy; a pathetic letter, written to her father, but never sent; her marriage certificate, and a ring. With these, was a letter addressed to Sir Miles, and which, reproaching himself for having so long neglected to read, he passed to the writer's daughter.

After a repetition of that which, when dying, he had told the doctor, he went on to say that "he had always desired, for the child's sake, to entrust her to her uncle's care, but that the temptation to have her near him was too great to be resisted. Finding himself in the neighbourhood where his wife's brother lived, and realising that his own end was near, he determined that he would lose no time in carrying out that which he knew to have been his wife's earnest desire.

"For two or three years now," he concluded, "things have gone from bad to worse with me, so that I can leave nothing to my little Ivy, save my prayers for her future happiness. Don't let her quite forget me, bless her!"

The letter ended abruptly here, but underneath, as an evident afterthought, were the words: "I have arranged with my two partners, Nat Ross and Charlie Townsend, that after my death the whole show—tent, vans, and horses—be sold; see that there is taken out of the proceeds enough to bury me decently. I want to lie with Ivy, my wife. Nat knows where."

Uncle and niece looked at one another, the thoughts of both going out to the grave of the strangely-assorted pair, who after the struggle and the storm lay calmly and peacefully side by side, at rest for evermore.

* * * * * * *

Once more it was fair time on the outskirts of the little county town, where we first met most of the people who figure in this little story.

The parlour of the "Bear" was fairly full about six in the evening.

There appeared to be something under discussion which was the cause of more than ordinary interest.

"Read that agen, Mister Plunkett!" said a grey-headed father of the hamlet.

"My son, ye see," repeated Mr. Plunkett, "as is up in Lunnon as coachman to Sir Miles Beckett—him as lived about 'ere nigh twenty year ago—'as sent me this paaper, the Marnin' Poast, which 'as a bit in it about the owd doctor and 'is niece."

Mr. Plunkett then proceeded to read the extract with which we are already familiar.

While he was reading it a poorly-dressed man, who was quietly sitting in a corner with some bread and cheese and a pint of beer, ceased from his eating and drinking, and listened intently.

"Beg pardin', mate," he said, when the other had finished, "did I understand you to say as Dr. Beckett, as used to live hereabouts is in London now?"

Mr. Plunkett looked the speaker up and down, and then apparently satisfied with his scrutiny, replied that it was the same.

"Do you know where he lives in London?"

"Well, seein' as my son 'as bin his coachman for nigh twenty-five year, I ought to."

"THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY." Our New Serial will commence shortly.

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps you wouldn't mind tellin' me. I've something I wants bad to see him about."

"I dunno as I oughter; but I don't think as you can do 'e much 'aarm."

With the address in his pocket Nat Ross, old Joey Baretta's one time partner, prepared to tramp the sixty miles and odd to London.

"It ain't no 'arm to remind 'im or 'er of old days; an' me clean broke to the world. She's married, that's certain, but I don't think as she'll be fur away from the old doctor. Anyway I'll try my luck, for I've carried her in my arms 'undreds of times when she wer' fractious, an' old Joey didn't no more know what to do with her than a babby unborn."

* * * * * * *

It was a fashionable concert at St. James' Hall.

Scores of carriages were waiting in line to take up after it was over.

Hanging round the entrance in Regent Street, and closely scanning every lady's face that came out, was Nat Ross.

Earlier in the day he had just missed Ivy as she drove from Seamore Place, but managed to hear the butler's order for St. James' Hall.

For two hours or more he had patiently waited, unconscious that he was being watched by a pair of keen official eyes.

He would never have recognised her, of course, but for knowing which was her carriage.

"Lady Sandys' carriage!" shouted the commissionaire.

Up it dashed, and as its fair occupant put her foot upon the step, a voice spoke in her ear.

Frightened in spite of herself, for she was a brave little soul, Ivy gave a suppressed shriek.

At the same moment a heavy hand was laid upon the man's shoulder.

"What do you want with the lady?"

"Nothing."

"That's very likely."

"Let him go, policeman!" said Ivy, pleadingly. "He hasn't done me any harm."

"Very sorry, my lady, but this kind of thing's been going on for a good bit lately, and we've got orders to run the next man in."

It was all very unpleasant, for Ivy would have to appear at the police-court the following day and prosecute.

Before the case was called on, however, she was informed that the prisoner desired to see her. He was brought into a room, and the statement he then made was sufficiently impressive that upon Ivy's earnest appeal the magistrate allowed him to be discharged.

"I didn't mean no 'arm," he said, "I was starvin', and didn't know which way to look for a farthing. I thought as maybe you'd 'elp me, fur the sake o' old days. You an' me was friends. I was always staunch and true to yer father an' never wronged 'im of a penny."

Ivy was not one to conceal from her husband the fact of her mother's mésalliance; indeed, Sir Randall had no cause for complaint, seeing that his wife's mother was really Sir Miles Beckett's sister.

Fortunately, the circumstance did not get into the papers, so that no tongues were set a-wagging.

"Look here, my man!" said the General to Nat, the morning after his release from custody, "we want to do something for you. What would you like? You can either go down to my place in the country, and I'll find you a job there, or we'll set you up in something."

"That's it, sir," said Nat, "would it run to a little shootin' gallery to go round with? I could see my way to a good livin' that way."

"Very well, come up here to-morrow, and we'll see about it; meanwhile, go and get a lodging and something to eat."

"Randall," said Ivy, when the vagabond had gone, "I love you more than I did before, for you have helped an unfortunate to help himself, and, more than that, do not love me any the less because a poor juggler was my mother's husband and my father."

Ralph Enderby.

Your Editor Chats.

OLD readers of our little paper will remember a remarkably powerful serial story which ran some time ago, entitled "The Lost Lady Delia." It was from the pen of Louis Tracy, the great author who was responsible for the ever-to-be-remembered romance, "The Final War." Well, since that time I have been endeavouring to arrange for a new story by the same author, and have now succeeded in obtaining one entitled

"The Albert Gate Mystery."

The new story needs no further recommendation from me. Lovers of Mr. Tracy's works will know what they are going to get so far as interest is concerned, and those to whom he is yet unknown will have a very pleasant surprise in store. Next week I will tell you more about the new story.

MEANWHILE I would like to say a few words about

Miss Madge Morris' Marriage.

In a fortnight Miss Morris will be off on her honeymoon, and the big bride cake, about which so much has been heard, will have melted into a hundred pieces and scattered all over the country. Will you get a piece—for luck? I hope so; but, of course, you certainly won't unless you enter for the little competition announced elsewhere. If you can write a nice letter of congratulation, you stand a good chance of getting a piece of cake in return.

Several correspondents have written to say that they wish to send Miss Morris a little token of their respect on the occasion of her wedding, and wish to know if they shall address it to this office. While thanking such readers for their kind thoughtfulness, I regret to have to ask them not to forward any presents of any sort for Miss Morris. This is not said from any unkind motive; but circumstances into which we need not enter here prohibit anything of the kind. At the same time, Miss Morris asks me to thank most cordially all those who have expressed a wish to make her a little wedding gift, and she assures them that the receipt of a sincere letter will be appreciated by her as much as the most expensive present money can buy!

Those Gramophones!

BY the way, the first batch of Gramophones, now in the hands of the lucky owners, have brought me a shoal of congratulatory letters. The machines have given great satisfaction to everyone. They are well worth trying for—especially as the competitions in which they are offered are so very simple. Turn to page 659 and see how easily a brand new Gramophone may be yours.

Your Editor.

Result of the Second "Serial" Competition.

A GRAMOPHONE has been awarded to each of the following competitors:

LONDON.—A. Strike, 10 Jelf Road, Brixton, S.W.; A. Barnes, 24 S. Peabody Buildings, Stamford Street, S.E.

UNDER 100 MILES FROM LONDON.—W. Smith, 138 Tonbridge Road, Maidstone; E. Quaile, 83 Swallowfield Rd., Charlton.

OVER 100 MILES FROM LONDON.—Mrs. Bradbury, 547 Attercliffe Road, Sheffield; George Craine, 126 Buck's Road, Douglas, Isle of Man.

SCOTLAND.—James Scott, 111 North High Street, Musselburgh; J. Gillespie, 1216 Springburn Road, Glasgow.

IRELAND.—D. S. Jones, 69 Beechfield Street, Mountpottinger, Belfast; James May, H.M. Training Ship Black Prince, Cork Harbour.

The correct sentence ran as follows:

"He had questioned the railway porter, and the man had jerked his thumb in the direction of her employer." Page 486, col. 2, line 64.

Digitized by Google

THE STORY OF THE WEEK: See our Coloured Cover.

THE QUEEN OF HEARTS.

How a Pack of Cards Decided a Destiny.

I THINK very few girls in the world could have felt so lonely as I did when I left school to live with my father.

My mother had died long years before—mercifully for her, poor dear. I believe that even during the short time of her married life my father had contrived to break her heart; but my own recollections of her are very shadowy and dim, and I can only recall one picture of her with absolute certainty.

It is the picture of a fair, girlish face, worn with sorrow, white and weary with illness and misery; of a crown of golden hair, amongst which my childish fingers touched the silver threads, and of a voice broken with weeping.

But though the picture of her is faint, the words she spoke have remained firmly rooted in my mind for all time. She bent over my bed as she said them, and kissed my face with tender, lingering kisses.

"God guard you, my darling. Be a pure and noble woman, and never stoop to do anything your conscience tells you is wrong, even if the wrong seems expedient." Those were her words and sometimes I have wondered since whether, being so near to death, she foresaw something of what my future would be!

What a strange childhood mine was, after my mother's death. I wonder whether any other girl has ever known so varied and yet so lonely an existence.

As in a kaleidoscope I seem to see the shifting scenes of my child days fly past me.

Now we were rich, living in a big house with lots of servants, and a luxury that, as I look back upon it, strikes me as appalling in its lavishness.

Next we were in dismal lodgings in a London back street, waited upon by a grimy slavey, hard put to it to find the ordinary necessaries of life.

And finally would come a flying abroad, and a residence in one cheap Continental town after another, as varied in scenery as in language, and alike only in one thing, that they allowed unlimited gambling within their precincts.

For my father was a gambler, and in this lay the whole secret of my mother's broken heart, of my strange childhood, of our odd kaleidoscopic existence.

And then, when I was twelve, came a few brief years of happiness for me!

My father, being, I suppose, a little extra flush of money, and perhaps finding it a bother to take a child with him everywhere, sent me to school. For the first time in my life I enjoyed the society of other children; for the first time since my mother died I revelled in being cared for, watched over, and helped in tender, motherly fashion, and I was happy, oh! so happy, until the day came when my father arrived unexpectedly at the school, and——

It all happened so suddenly.

I was singing upstairs in the great schoolroom, when Miss Belmont, our headmistress, hurried in.

"Come downstairs at once, Di," she said breathlessly, "your father is here."

"My father?" I do not know why my heart sank at her words, excepting that the thought of my father brought with it a remembrance of those weary days of my childhood, and of my mother's lovely, heartbroken face.

Very slowly and reluctantly I went down to the drawing-room, where my father awaited me, and though I tried to feel glad, as a dutiful daughter should, I could not help shrinking a little when he kissed me.

Then he put me away from him, and a smile crossed his handsome, dissipated face.

"By Jove!" he muttered, "I never expected this! She'll do, she'll do, down to the ground."

I had no idea what he meant, though his words gave me again that odd sensation of fear and shrinking; but their meaning was to be made only too plain to me in the course of time.

My father talked to me for a few minutes in a rather scrappy, irrelevant fashion, looking very hard at me all the time, as though he were appraising my value, in the way a connoisseur appraises the value of a work of art.

Finally he said, with such suddenness that I nearly jumped out of my skin, "I have come to fetch you away, my dear. You must come home and keep house now for your poor old dad."

Did the dismay I felt show itself in my face?

I think it must have done, for he shrugged his shoulders, laughed a little acidly, and said—

"You don't seem overjoyed, but I can't help that. You will be a great help to me, and I want your help."

"My help? What can I do?" I asked, more puzzled than ever.

He laughed again; his laugh sent a cold feeling up and down my spine.

"Look in the glass, my dear," he answered with cynicism; "being a woman, you will perhaps find out there how you may be useful in entertaining your father's friends."

I was very young and very innocent in those days, and when I went to my bedroom to pack my box, I looked in the glass as my father had told me to do.

A slip of a girl looked back at me from the mirrored surface, a girl with wide, startled eyes, brown as a fawn's; with hair the colour of a ripe chestnut, falling in soft curling masses about a white forehead, and with a face on which the colour went and came in tints like the dainty flush upon a sea shell.

"I do believe I am pretty," I said aloud in an awestruck voice, and the laughing voice of one of my school-fellows exclaimed over my shoulder—

"Oh, Diana Meredith, you dreadful humbug! Don't you really know you are perfectly lovely?"

But I really had not known it until that day—truly and really I had not, and it gave me a sort of shock, half of surprise, half of fear. Well, I went home.

I found that home, at that moment, meant a fair-sized house, well, even luxuriously furnished, a staff of good servants, and all the surroundings of a gentleman of means and position. Who, indeed, would ever have guessed, on casually meeting my father, that the suave, courteous Mr. Meredith, who seemed merely a moneyed man of leisure, was really an adventurer, a gambler, a man living by his wits?

Even I did not take in the position at once. I fancied that my father had turned over a new leaf since my childhood days, that he no longer gambled, that he had made enough to pass the remainder of his days in affluence. Then the truth dawned upon me, and I felt more utterly lonely than I had ever felt in my life.

I gradually observed that no ladies ever came to the house; that our only guests were gentlemen, and those not of a kind with whom I cared to associate.

I knew absolutely no women; when I asked my father to take me to see his friends, to let me have some girl companions, he merely laughed, and said he had dropped all his lady acquaintances long ago, and that my business was to make myself pleasant to the people he brought in with him, and to make his house charming to them.

"Your face is my fortune as well as yours," he told me, with that dry cynicism which I had grown to dread.

He was kind to me in his own way, but I think now that it was chiefly because of what he wanted me to do for him.

Digitized by Google

He lavished lovely gowns upon me, bought me jewellery, insisted upon my making the drawing-room a perfect palace of delight, and yet—I was lonely and uneasy. I felt that something besides fatherly affection underlay all this demonstration. I disliked intensely the men who were brought in to dinner by my father evening after evening, and who seemed so glad to linger in the drawing-room and talk to me, instead of beginning their card play at once in the little room downstairs, and I had an intuitive feeling that I was being drawn into a net from which I could not escape.

One man I feared and disliked above all the others, and he, as ill luck would have it, was my father's chief friend. Michael Standish was his name, and in appearance he was a dark, saturnine man of perhaps forty years old. Handsome enough in a repellant fashion, his face nevertheless produced on me a most unpleasant impression; yet he was invariably polite—and more than polite to me.

Every evening saw him by my side; often in the daytime he would appear as well, and he and my father would take me out, either into the Park or to some entertainment. But the more I saw of Michael Standish the more I feared him.

The admiration in his dark eyes sickened me; the way in which he seemed to take possession of me when others were present, as though I were his special property, gave me a feeling of revolt and horror.

Night after night the same round of events took place. The excellent dinner, at which I was the only woman present; the adjournment to the drawing-room, when I had to listen to compliments I detested, or talk to men whom I loathed, and then the departure of my father and his guests to the card-room, where they spent the remainder of the night, and from which I heard my father come up to bed in the dawn of morning.

The monotony of my life, its loneliness, its hatefulness, were beginning to tell on me, when a gleam of light shone through the clouds.

One evening there came amongst the other guests a man I had never seen before—a man as different from the rest as an archangel differs from a fiend! Shall I ever forget how the blood rushed to my heart, and left my face white, when I saw Denis Strahan enter the drawing-room, when I saw the surprise that flashed over his face at sight of me, and the little look of admiration that crept into his grey eyes when they met mine.

He was tall and very fair—fair as a girl, but there was no girlishness in his face, only strength and purity; and I wondered, oh! how I wondered, what had brought him to the den of thieves I knew by this time my father's house to be.

Long, long afterwards I discovered that he had first been drawn to my father by certain similarities of artistic taste, and that, being also a keen whist player, he had been misled into supposing that innocent whist playing was the raison d'être of the gathering to which he had been invited.

But though I wondered that first night why he came, I rejoiced at his coming, for he seemed to bring a sane and healthy atmosphere with him. I felt a sudden safety in the very fact of his presence.

He stayed only a short time in the card-room; just as I was crossing the landing to go up to bed I heard a step on the stairs, and turned to find him beside me. His eyes were shining and angry, his face was very white.

"Why do you stay here?" he said eagerly, all conventionalities forgotten. "It is not fit that—or are you one of them?" he added abruptly.

"I hate it," I cried vehemently. "I hate it all, but I am my father's daughter. I must stay with him if he tells me!"

A great pity replaced the suspicion in his eyes.

"Poor little girl," he whispered, and I felt a lump in my throat. "I am sorry. I have come to say good-bye. I shall never——"

I put out my hand and touched his sleeve

"Oh! don't say it, don't say it," I exclaimed, "don't say you will not come again. You make me feel safe." A curious look swept over his face, half of doubt, half of pleasure, but as he looked at me the doubt died away, and he took my hand, saying:

"I believe you are as pure and good as you look. I will come again."

And then I knew that Denis Strahan had, for a moment, thought that I was willingly aiding and abetting my father as a decoy duck, but that the momentary doubt of me had given way to belief in my innocence.

And oh! indeed he was right. I was a very innocent girl, and only longed to make those words of my dear, dead mother, the guiding motto of my life:

"Be a pure and noble woman, and never stoop to do anything your conscience tells you is wrong, even if the wrong seems expedient."

Soon, terribly soon, I was to understand the full force of her words! One morning my father entered the drawing-room, his face blanched and lined, his hands trembling.

"I'm done for, Di," he said, "it's all up with me."

"What do you mean, father?" I answered, going quickly to his side, and seizing his shaking hand.

"That fiend Standish has me in his power, utterly in his power," he said, pacing the room feverishly. "I owe him more than I care to remember, and he won't give me time to recover the losses and pay him. He vows he will have payment to-morrow or ruin me utterly."

"How?" I whispered.

"How? The man is clever," my father laughed bitterly. "He will not only make me bankrupt and ruin me financially, he threatens to expose me all round, and show up this house for—for what it is," he eyed me uneasily.

"A gambling den," I answered quietly. "Oh, father, give it all up, dear; give it all up, and let us go away together and live quietly and happily. Let him do his worst, and——"

"Thank you, no, my dear," my father's usual coolness was returning, "his worst might be very bad indeed; one or two queerish things have happened here, things I should prefer not having dragged under the eyes of the law; things that would land me in one of His Majesty's convict establishments."

His coolness staggered me. I shuddered.

"Yes, Di, I am only speaking the truth," he went on, his face growing suddenly haggard. "God knows I've been a poor sort of father to you, but I don't suppose you want to see your poor old dad in prison, and only you can save me."

"I? Oh, father, what can I do? Tell me quickly; let me do what I can."

He came close to me, and put his hands on my shoulders, looking earnestly into my face. "Michael Standish will forego the debt, will keep silence about this house, will give me back every I.O.U. of mine he holds, if you will marry him?"

The words fell on my heart like molten lead.

"Father!" I cried, "it is impossible—impossible!"

My father's grasp on my shoulder tightened. "Di, for my sake," he said, and there was more tenderness in his voice than I had ever heard there, and it shook in a way that went to my heart.

After all, he was my father, and I could not bear to see him in trouble, it hurt me to look at his worn and haggard face

"Standish loves you, Di," my father went on, still in that pitifully shaking voice, "he loves you, he is a very rich man, he will do his best to make you happy, he——"

"I can't do it," I exclaimed. "I can't do it," and, beside Standish's dark, evil face, another rose in my mind, a fair face, and pure and strong as that of an angel. "Can nothing else be done, father? Will he not give you time to get the money to pay him?"

DON'T MISS
THE COMPETITIONS
ON PAGES 647 & 659.

Digitized by Google

"He will agree to nothing. He will have no compromise. I begged him for a week's respite, he will not hear of it. In a week I could borrow the money—in a week much might happen. He will expose everything if I do not pay him to-morrow, unless you will marry him. That is his final word."

I wrenched myself from my father's hand, and went to look out of the window, to where the sunset light played over the trees in the square, and a yellow sky lay behind the dark house opposite.

Marry Michael Standish? Marry the man I loathed and feared and despised, to save my father? Impossible—impossible! Sell myself to such a man even for a reason that might appear a good one? No, I could not do it, and yet—ought I to think of myself at all, when my father was in such dire distress? Was it perhaps sometimes right to do evil that good might come? Was——

My mother's words flashed into my mind. "Never stoop to do anything your conscience tells you is wrong," and I turned back to my father.

"I cannot marry Mr. Standish," I said firmly, "it would be a deadly wrong to him and to myself. I cannot marry him."

"Then I am ruined, utterly and for ever," my father replied; "ruined, and by my own daughter!"

* * * * *

The evening had come at last!

Ever since my final words to my father I had been in a fearful state of mind, wondering whether I had been right or wrong in my decision, half inclined to recall my words, yet sick with dismay at the bare thought of doing so; torn with a thousand doubts as I saw my father's haggard face, yet filled with unspeakable loathing at the very idea of marrying Michael Standish.

And now the evening had come, and Mr. Standish would have to be told my decision.

He and Denis Strahan dined with us, and the conversation was general, but during the whole meal I never lost the consciousness of those dark burning eyes upon me, never for a moment got rid of a nightmare of dread that hung over me.

I knew that Denis Strahan's eyes were often upon me too; I read the sympathy in his face, even though he did not know what was troubling me.

No word of love had ever passed between us, but I was sure that he loved me—because, oh! why is a woman sure of such a thing as this?

Not for one moment were he and I alone that evening; in some subtle way my father kept us apart, and presently the three men went to the card-room, leaving me alone upstairs. I could settle to nothing! My ears were strained to catch any sounds from below, and though I could not have told anyone what I expected to hear, I was not surprised when footsteps sounded on the stairs, and my father's voice became audible through the half-open door.

"She will not consent," he said, in low tones.

"I think she will." These words were in Mr. Standish's voice.

"You will never work it." My father's voice spoke again, but it was so low I could that not hear how his sentence ended.

Mr. Standish took up his parable. "Trust me, Meredith," he said, "you shall be free, and I will get what I want."

The grim significance to me of the last words made me cold with fear, and at that instant the two men entered the room, and I do not think either of them had the least idea that some of their conversation had been overheard.

My father looked nervous and shaken, but Standish looked triumphant, his eyes glowed.

"Miss Meredith," he said, "your father has told me of your decision; I need not worry you by telling you my feelings. I come to ask whether you can reconsider it."

I was on my feet facing him; his eyes, blazing with passionate admiration, looked full into mine.

"No," I said firmly. "I cannot alter my mind."

"You will not marry me, though I love you, God knows how dearly."

"I cannot marry you," I replied, "it would be a sin."

A curious smile crossed his saturnine face.

"A sin—to save your father?" My father glanced at me with a look I could not interpret. Was it desperation? Was it—could it be—amusement? I dismissed the thought, and turned to reply to Mr. Standish, when he continued:

"Miss Meredith, I have offered you and your father a—what I may call, a last chance. Mr. Strahan has heard of your father's predicament; he offers to pay the debt to me" (I started forward with flushed face, and clasped hands), "and I—refuse—excepting on one condition."

"Refuse?" How my heart sank.

"Yes, I refuse—excepting on one condition."

"And the condition?"

"I am a born gambler, Miss Meredith," he answered, his eyes gleaming strangely; "and I do not only want your father's money; I want you"—his voice dropped to a passionate whisper. "Now, I have a suggestion to make which will leave everything to the Goddess of Chance!"

I looked at him blankly.

"This is my proposal," he said. "Strahan and I will have a pack of cards dealt out to us, and whichever of us first turns up the Queen of Hearts shall win you!"

I started and nearly screamed, but he silenced me by a gesture, whilst he continued:

"If I turn up the Queen I free your father of all obligations to me and you agree to be my wife. If Strahan has the Queen you become his and he pays me the money your father owes me."

"I will never agree to anything so utterly humiliating," I cried, my cheeks flaming with anger; "how could you, how could Mr. Strahan dare to propose such a thing."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Very well, Miss Meredith! Then—I give you fair warning—I leave the house now, this instant. I shall insist upon receiving every penny from your father, and I shall report the nightly transactions carried on here to the police without delay."

A feeling of despair swept over me, to be replaced suddenly by one of hope.

Was it because I was a gambler's daughter that something in the idea of appealing to Chance appealed to me? Was it that far down in my heart I felt certain that Denis Strahan would never have agreed to anything that could truly humiliate me?

I do not know; all I know is that I turned sharply to Mr. Standish, saying:

"Come, we will see," and, sweeping out of the drawing-room, I preceded the two men to the cardroom downstairs.

Denis Strahan sat by the table, his head buried in his hands. He lifted it when he heard the rustling of my gown, and I saw that his face was deathly. He pushed back his chair and came towards me.

"It was the only way," he whispered; "God grant it may turn out right—my darling—my darling."

How my heart leapt at the tenderness in his words, and in his eyes, though I tried not to show what I was feeling, as my father and his hateful friend came in.

"Miss Meredith agrees," Mr. Standish said to Denis, looking at him with an evil triumphant leer; "whoever first turns up the Queen of Hearts wins her, and sets her father free."

Mr. Strahan nodded—he could not speak, and he sat down heavily at the table without a word.

Then I spoke, and I have no notion, to this day, what prompted my utterance:

"I agree," I said, "but if either of the two who are playing this

THE ALBERT CATE MYSTERY is the Title of our Thrilling New Serial which Commences shortly.

Digitized by Google

game cheat by the fraction of an inch, the question is settled for ever! My father is to be freed from his debts, and I shall be free to marry whom I will. Do you agree to that, gentlemen?"

"Of course," Denis exclaimed quickly.

"By all means," Mr. Standish said smoothly; "cheating on either side disqualifies the one who cheats from further action. I quite agree."

"So be it," I said, my spirits suddenly and unaccountably rising; "then give me the cards and I will deal. If I am to be the stakes, I will deal! Give me the cards!"

I stood beside the table and the men sat, one on either side of me, their faces set and strained.

But I? I laughed as I caught sight of myself in the long glass opposite, and saw how beautiful I was; yes, I laughed, and then I looked through the pack to make sure that only one Queen of Hearts was there, and after that I dealt the cards, and Mr. Standish never took his evil gaze from my face, and Denis' clear eyes met mine each time I laid a card upon the pile before him.

"I conclude that I begin," Mr. Standish said when I had finished; "I sit on the dealer's left."

"Begin, for Heaven's sake," Denis answered roughly; "let us get it done."

And I saw that his face was working with emotion as he looked at the cards that lay face downwards on the table.

"Begin at once," I repeated, and I looked at Mr. Standish and the smile died from my face.

His hands fingered his cards, and my eyes turned from his face and watched his hands. All in the flash of a second, he whipped up a card and flung it on the table between himself and Denis, crying:

"The Queen of Hearts!" But I laid my hand over his, and over the card, and said, in a voice that shook with righteous anger:

"You have cheated! That card was never dealt by me!" In a second both men were on their feet, and Mr. Standish put out his hand to sweep all the cards together, but I prevented him, and he swore under his breath.

"Wait!" I said, some strange new strength seeming to have come to me. The two men and my father all watched me silently; and under their eyes, I set aside the Queen of Hearts Mr. Standish had thrown down, and then I looked through all the pack I had dealt to the two.

And the Queen of Hearts lay at the bottom—the very bottom of the cards that had been dealt to Denis!

"We agreed," I said very coldly, "that the one who cheated would no longer have part nor lot in the matter, and that in such a case as this my father should go free—and I should marry whom I chose. Is not that so?"

I looked into Mr. Standish's evil sullen face.

"There was no cheating," he said; "I turned up the card."

"And how comes it there are two Queens of Hearts now, when there was only one in the pack before I dealt?" I asked.

"Very strange!" Mr. Standish sneered, looking hard at Denis, who stood motionless and silent; "either you or Strahan——"

"Neither I nor Mr. Strahan did anything unfair," I said quietly, breaking into his sentence, "and you know it. I saw you draw the second Queen of Hearts from the sleeve of your coat. I saw you take it and fling it on the table. My father is free of his debt, and I am free to marry whom I will; but it will not be you, Mr. Standish."

With another angry oath he strode towards the door, but my father caught and held him.

"Before we part to-night," he said, "I will see my I.O.U's. burnt in here."

And, to make a long story short, the wretched Standish disgorged from his pockets the various odd slips of paper which my father had at different times given him, and they were burnt before his eyes.

Then he vanished from our sight, and, I am thankful to say, he has never crossed my path again.

I married Denis Strahan, and I am the happiest woman in the world.

L. G. Moberly.

YET ANOTHER TEN GRAMOPHONES TO BE GIVEN AWAY!

We are again offering this week ten of our now famous Gramophones for competition among Short Stories readers. All you have to do is to go in and win, and when the prize is delivered at your door, call in your friends and, having placed in position one of the two records with which every instrument is provided, explain to them that you gained the wonderful talking, singing, and playing instrument they are listening to by the fact of your being a reader of Short Stories, adding that they might go and do likewise.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

As you will see by page 647, Miss Madge Morris is to be married on December 2nd. I want you to construct a sentence the initial letters of the words of which must form that young lady's name, M. A. D. G. E. M. O. R. R. I. S., in correct order, and the sentence must be in the form of a message of thanks for the services she has rendered to Short Stories readers.

The ten competitors who send in sentences which in the Editor's opinion are the best, will each be rewarded with a handsome Gramophone.

Attempts must be made on the backs of postcards only, marked "Wedding," and addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Postcards must reach us not later than first post on Tuesday, November 25th.

Result of the "Short Stories" Leaflet Competition.

A GRAMOPHONE has been sent to each of the following competitors who disposed of the fifty leaflets sent to them in the most advantageous manner:

Miss I. Graham, 12 Houston Place, Glasgow, S.S.

F. Locke, 16 Drayton Road, Sipson, Yiewsley R.S.O., Middlesex.

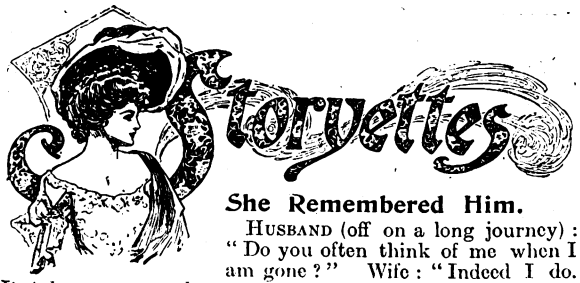
Miss L. Stevenson, 12 Armadale Street, Glasgow.

H. Barnes, 2 Vauxhall Walk, S.E.

D. Moscardini, 17 Herbertson Street, Glasgow, S.S.

PENCIL-CASES have been sent to the fifty competitors whose names appear below:

Miss M. Hamilton, 45 Regent Street, Blackburn; R. Pescod, Springfield Terrace, Low Fell, Gateshead-on-Tyne; G. H. Bloomfield, 55 Norman Road, Greenwich, S.E.; Miss L. Mays, 100 Beresford Street, Moss Side, Manchester; H. Kitching, 22, Grove Street, Mansfield; M. Gwynn, 21 Harrow Road, Newport, Mon.; J. Platt, 66 Prussia Street, Manchester; Miss A. Wonnacott, 156, Cathays Terrace, Cardiff; J. Price, Lower Wallop, Stockbridge; T. Molony, Church Street, Rathdowney, Ballybrophy; R. Jones, 32 Newark Street, Walton, Liverpool; F. Hobbs, 12 Elizabeth Terrace, Eltham; T. Forbes, Ballanton, Aberfoyle; Master O. Deacon, 4 Robin Hood Street, Newport, I. of W.; Miss B. Livock, Marion Terrace, Hill Street, Lurgan, Co. Armagh; W. Forsyth, 304 Morningside Road, Edinburgh; H. Bellerby, 2 Little Reed Street, Hull; N. Blomberg, 42 New Road, Commercial Road, E.; W. Romaine, 19 Richmond Hill, Brighton; J. Sheridan, 6 Austin Street, Northampton; E. Morley, Plumpton Green, near Lewes; L. Bruce, 4 Clarence Road, Handsworth, Birmingham; J. Rathbone, Leon Villas, Bight Pill, Stroud; Miss Wayschal, "Chesterfield," Warwick Road, Cliftonville, Margate; W. Ferry, 137 Olivia Street, Bootle, Liverpool; W. Shaw, 3 Bristo Port, Edinburgh; F. H. Taylor, 44 Francis Terrace, Carmarthen; E. Barrow, 4 Glebe Cottages, Whiteley's Estate, Hanworth; Miss H. Moir, 53 Dens Road, Dundee; M. Gilvary, Drumshanbo, Co Leitrim; J. Henderson, 3 Leddington Road, The Portway, West Ham; Mrs Decrievell, 8 York Road, W. Hendon; P. J. Carroll, Barrack Street, Granard, Co. Longford; F. Murray, 102 North Hill, Highgate, N.; H. Chamberlain, Portland House, Southtown, Great Yarmouth; A. Berry, 6 Malins Road, Buckland, Portsmouth; H. M. Alexander, 17 Eglinton Street, Belfast; C. H. Knight, 158 Killearn Road, St. Germains Estate, Hither Green, Catford; Miss H. Harding, 14 Whitmore Street, Hockley, Birmingham; S. Fenton, 6 Tib Place, Cast Street, Varley Street, Oldham Road, Manchester; C. Swan, 40 Felden Street, Munster Road, Fulham; W. Howchin, 116 Military Road, Colchester; H. Endeacott, 11 Cheap Street, Hunslet Road, Leeds; Miss K. Hughes, 50 Cathcart Road, South Kensington; J. McDevitt, 57 Barrack Street, Strabane, Co. Tyrone; N. May, 4 Park Terrace, Stoke-on-Trent; W. J. Davies, Evan Terrace, Dukestown, near Tredegar; J. Binyon, 21 Chevet Street, Sidney Road, Homerton, N.E.; T. McEniry, Morlestown, Caher, Co. Tipperary, Ireland; C. Beasley, 148 Cross Lane, Radcliffe, near Manchester.



She Remembered Him.

HUSBAND (off on a long journey): "Do you often think of me when I am gone?" Wife: "Indeed I do. It takes me a week to get the smell of smoke out of the house."

Pity to Waste the Light.

JACK: "You are the light of my life, May—and, taking that into consideration, I think I may turn down the gas."

Mamma's Opinion.

YOUNG HOBBS: "Mamma, what animal is the king of beasts?" Mrs. Hobbs (with a significant look at her husband): "Man!"

Obeying Orders.

MOTHER: "Clara, I can't tell you how shocked I was to see you kiss that scamp, Jack Manlay." Daughter: "Why, mamma, you told me to set my face against him."

What the Audience Thought.

CONTRALTO: "Only think of it! I was encored three times in my last song." Soprano (spitefully): "Yes, the audience recognised that you needed practice."

Quite a Different Bird.

MRS. FLASH: "Isn't it a duck of a bonnet?" Mr. Flash: "It's more like a pelican of a bonnet." Mrs. Flash: "What do you mean, dear?" Mr. Flash: "The bill is too long for a duck."

Why He Played.

SHE: "I shouldn't think such a Society man as you would care about football." He: "I have to keep in training as a matter of necessity. When I go to receptions it helps me to get down to supper first."

He Had Reason to Know.

YOUNG WIFE: "Yes, father always gives away expensive things when he makes presents." Husband: "So I discovered when he gave you away." (And then he went to the library to draw a cheque for the monthly millinery bill.)

Very Close.

MAUDIE: "Why should you think I'm engaged to him? If you had seen us together you would at once have seen there was nothing between us." Frank: "I did see you together, and, not seeing anything between you, at once concluded that you were engaged."

She Didn't Mind.

JACK: "My darling, I want to tell you something. I have deceived you. I am not rich, but utterly penniless. Will it make any difference to you, dear?" Ethel: "Not the slightest, Jack." Jack: "I am glad of that, dearest. Are you quite sure it will make no difference to you?" Ethel: "Quite sure. I can marry old Moneybags."

An Important Question.

"I WANTED to ask you something," he said, with a look of much anxiety on his face. "Yes," she replied, as a sudden smile illuminated her countenance. "I know what I am going to say may sound a little silly——" "I don't think it will, George." "Well, your father——" "He likes you very much, George." "Does he? Well, when he came home to-day, did he happen to say what was the winner? I came down in such a hurry that I didn't have time to look at the paper."

John Had His Doubts.

"I KNOW I'm a little irritable, John, but if I had to live my life over again, I'd marry you just the same." John: "H'm, I have my doubts about it!"

Girls, Beware!

"BE MINE!" he cried, in a voice surcharged with anguish. "If you refuse me I shall die!" That was forty years ago, and the heartless girl refused him. Yesterday he died. Girls, beware!

A Fatal Mistake.

"I HEAR that Jenks' rich lady-love has broken off their engagement." "Is that so? Why was it?" "You know he was always a bad speller, well, he headed a letter to her like this: 'My bony angle.'"

Testing his Imagination.

YOUNG HUSBAND: "I'm just about dead beat putting down this carpet." Wife: "The carpet is not heavy." "No; but I have to work in such a cramped position." "Nonsense. Just imagine you are on your bicycle."

Still Some Doubt.

MOTHER: "He is a very desirable match, Mary, and I think he loves you." Daughter: "I'm not so sure of that." Mother: "Why not?" Daughter: "He leaves me in less than an hour after bidding me good-night."

Sergeant Knew Her.

A PRIVATE soldier, walking arm-in-arm with his sweetheart, met his sergeant when about to enter a restaurant. He respectfully introduced her to him: "Sergeant, my sister!" "Yes, yes," was the reply, "I knew her long ago; she was mine once."

Brave and Brainy.

SWEET GIRL: "The man I marry must be both brave and brainy." Adoring Youth: "When we were out sailing, and upset, I saved you from a watery grave." "That was brave, I admit, but it was not brainy." "Yes, it was; I upset the boat on purpose."

Sleight of Hand.

FITZ-JONES: "Did you go to the pantomime last evening, Percy?" De Brown: "No; I attended a sleight-of-hand performance." Fitz-Jones: "Where?" De Brown: "I went to call on Miss Le Smythe, and offered her my hand, but she slighted it."

No Cause for Worry.

ELDERLY FIANCÉ: "I hope you are not impressed by the silly sentimentalists who hold that because you've married once you ought not to marry again?" Pretty Widow: "Don't let that worry you, dear; I've no such prejudice. My own dear mother was married three times, and I only hope that in all things I may follow her example." And she wondered why he looked sad.

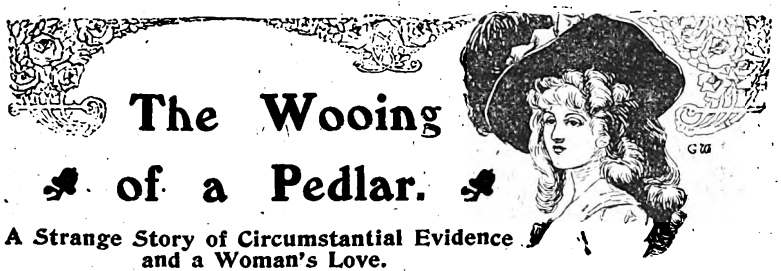
Brutal Candour.

JONES is frankness itself. Being at an evening party, he took occasion to compliment a lady, not otherwise remarkable for her beauty, on her small feet. "You can't mean what you say, Mr. Jones," said the lady, greatly flattered, as she still further, by a deft movement of the hand, exposed the members in question. "You are quite right, madam," said Jones, looking down; "I only saw half of them."

She Had Considered.

"I HOPE, Jennie, that you have given the matter serious consideration," said a lady to a servant who had "given notice," because she was to be married that "day two weeks." "Oh, I have, ma'am," was the earnest reply. "I've been to two fortune tellers, and a clairvoyant, and looked in a sign book and dreamt on a lock of his hair, and been to one of those asterrologers, and to a meejum, and to a palmist, and they all tell me to go ahead, ma'am. I ain't one to marry reckless-like, ma'am."

Digitized by Google



The Wooing of a Pedlar.

A Strange Story of Circumstantial Evidence and a Woman's Love.

"WANTS a job, does you?"

"Yes, if you have one to give me."

"Well, I am in want of a man, but I don't think as you'll know much about the work."

"I could soon learn."

"That's all very well; but when it comes to teachin' folk their business, an' payin' on 'em at the same time for doin' of it, it seems a bit rough on such as me, don't it?"

The seeker for employment was a tall, well set-up young fellow of twenty-six or so. Somehow he did not appear to be one of the sort who would be used to such work as he was applying for; there being a superior air about him, which he succeeded badly in disguising, while his clothes, shabby and travel-stained, were, it was obvious, of originally good cut and material. In addition he wore an evident wig, black and ill-fitting, his complexion, too, being unmistakably stained a darkish brown.

All this had not escaped the old cheap-jack's eye, and in his own mind he came to a conclusion, which after events proved to be tolerably correct.

He was a strangely eccentric creature, old Peter Hennig, and made still more so by the very nature of his occupation. Yet he was a just and kindly man, one indeed who, though he was keen upon the profits of his business, never, by any chance, took a mean advantage of any human being.

"Look a here, mister," he said at length, coming down from his perch on the top of the van steps. "I don't want to pry into no man's affairs, if I thinks as that man is straight and honest. So I ain't a-goin' to ax you no questions, but I likes the looks of you, an' if you cares to help me get rid o' the goods when I pitches, pickin' up from me what you can at odd times, why, th re's my hand on it, an' ten bob a we k an' your board an' lodgin'—in the van."

"That will suit me," was the reply. "And I'll do my best to suit yo."

"What's your name?"

"My name? Oh—er—Smith—Tom mith."

"Well, then, Tom Smith, you n' me's pals now, ti l one or both of us thinks different. Arter supper to-night, we're a-goin' to put the horses to, an' get along the road for Sevenoaks, where I'm due to-morrow."

"I just want to go back to the inn in the village and fetch a few traps I left there, and then I'm with you," said Tom Smith.

"Right you are, an' by the time you come back I'll have something ready to eat an' drink."

"You see, it is like this," said the new hand on his return, in answer to a hint of old Peter's. "I have not done anything wrong, but, all the same, I do not wish to run the risk of recognition in those places through which we shall be likely to pass; and as I am well known throughout the sout anyway, I have altered my personal appearance a bit."

"Which you have, an' no mistake, though I've never set eyes on you before in my natural," was the other's only comment upon the explanation.

The new man was a bit green at first, as was only natural, but it was wonderful how soon he picked up "cheap-jack" ways.

He had a fund of humour, too, far ahead of the master of the concern, so that before long old Peter began to take longer and longer spells of "time off," leaving the selling to his new partner.

Things went very well therefore, till one day Hennig announced his intention of going into Surrey, to the neighbourhood of Guildford, the county town.

Business had been very slack in the Kentish villages, and small towns, while Surrey was always to be relied on for brisk trade at that time of the year.

Hennig could not but notice that Tom Smith visibly started when Surrey was named.

"Near Guildford, did you say?"

"Yes, I've a big market round about there."

"You won't touch Leafield, I suppose, will you?"

"I generally puts up about two mile from there," replied old Peter, trying to get to the bottom of the other's evident disinclination to fall in with the proposed new route arrangement.

"Look here, mate," he said presently, "I don't want to force you to go into Surrey agen your will; so just say the word, an' we'll keep our present pitch till it's time to sample the Norfolk dumplin's."

"I shouldn't think of it," said Smith. "I'll only ask you not to talk about me anywhere near Leafield, and—but there, I'll tell you more later on."

"Right you are!" replied the old man. "I believe in a still tongue makin' for a wise head, and when I says 'mum' I means 'mum'; so don't you fear nothin', mate."

A week later Leafield was reached, and the van was pitched in a field belonging to a farmer, who had known old Hennig for years.

Tom Smith had stuck so close to business up to this, that it was the more noticeable now when he began regularly to absent himself of an evening. One night in particular this happened, and as there was not much business doing, Peter shut up the show, and took a stroll himself.

It was not a spying expedition that he was on by any means; but certain it was, that walking along the main road for about a mile, he came face to face with his partner—and a young lady.

Old Peter knew her, for he had seen her many a time in former visits to the neighbourhood—it was Miss Compton, of Plessis Park. The pair seemed on very good terms with each other, a fact which fairly flustered Hennig, who had suspected nothing approaching to anything of this sort.

"Ethel!" said Tom Smith, whom Peter saw was now for the first time minus his wig and complexion, "this is a dear old friend of mine—my master, in fact. Hennig, let me make you known to Miss Compton, who, when I set up by and by in business for myself, is going into partnership with me."

Ethel Compton was one of those women who always do the right thing and speak the right word at the right moment. So now she held out her pretty little hand and smilingly said. "I've heard all sorts of nice things about you, Mr. Hennig, and I am very pleased to know you."

"As I am to know you, miss," replied the old cheap-jack, with a low bow.

"Mr. Dorrington says you——"

"Not Dorrington now or yet, Ethel, just plain Tom Smith, please."

She laughed, said "Good-night" to Peter, and turned off with her companion towards Plessis Park.

Before they went to bed that night, Tom Smith told Hennig his story; or, at any rate, as much of it as made clear his position.

His real name, he said, was Dorrington. Basil Dorrington, and until just before he had joined Peter Hennig's travelling establishment, he had acted as private secretary to Mr. Compton, Ethel's father, at Plessis Park and Grosvenor Square.

Digitized by Google

It was not unnatural that, seeing much of the only daughter of the house, he should fall in love with her, and that she should reciprocate in kind. Unfortunately, there was another gentleman in the field, a cousin, whose suit was exclusively encouraged by Mr. Compton.

This cousin, one Bernard Peyton, would inherit property, that marched with the Plessis Park estate, a fact which, in Mr. Compton's eyes, made the match more than desirable.

True, the Peyton property was, through the anticipative extravagance of the heir in the matter of horse-racing and gambling, heavily encumbered, a fact, however, which, in the father's opinion, was no bar to the proposed union.

It can be easily imagined, therefore, that Basil Dorrington's chances of winning Ethel were very remote. Still, as the latter had a strong will, and the gift of exercising it, there was just a bare possibility that everything might have ended well and happily but for an altogether unexpected sensational development.

A cheque for a large amount, and purporting to be drawn and signed by Mr. Compton, was presented at the Leafield branch of the Capital and Counties Bank, and pronounced to be a forgery. Basil Dorrington was at once accused of the crime, the circumstantial evidence being so overwhelmingly strong against him, that if, to save a scandal, the matter had not been hushed up, he would undoubtedly have had to suffer a long term of imprisonment. Of course he had to give up his post, and to seek some other means of getting a living, as unlike his former occupation as possible.

"Do you think me guilty?" he asked Peter Hennig.

"No, I don't, lad! And I take it anything but kindly of you that you should ask me such a question."

"Well, I thought you would believe in me, for I tell you, Hennig, on my honour as a gentleman, that I did not forge that cheque, and more, that I have my own suspicions as to who did."

"Mr. Bernard Peyton?"

"The same."

"An' what be you a-goin' to do with him?"

"I don't know yet. I'll tell you perhaps to-morrow. Good-night!"

* * * * *

"Here's a letter for you," said old Peter to his partner the next morning. "'Name o' Smith?'" postman says. 'Yes,' says I. 'Letter for him,' he says. 'Right you are,' says I, 'I'll give it him.' Hullo, mate, what's up? Bad news?"

"Not exactly. Miss Compton tells me that Bernard Peyton has an idea that I am in the neighbourhood, and knows of our meeting place; she suggests, therefore, that the spot should be changed this evening."

"You're a fortunate man, Mr. Dor—; beg pardin'—Tom Smith. If I'd a had a gal like yours—no offence meant—I'd be a happier man to-day."

In the evening, about nine o'clock, Tom Smith went off as usual. He was never, as a rule, very late returning; but this night it was past eleven and no sign of him.

Old Peter sat smoking his short black clay, on the top of the van steps, for he was too uneasy to turn in until the other came back.

"Good evenin', boss!"

Hennig had not heard the soft footsteps upon the grass, the sudden salutation startling him so that his pipe dropped out of his mouth.

When he saw that it was a stranger, with a fairly-large pack upon his shoulder, he took him for a wandering member of his own tribe.

"Evenin'," replied Peter, when he had recovered himself. "Come fur?"

"A matter of ten mile or so—from Redhill."

He was a low-browed, round-shouldered individual, and Peter did not like the look of him.

"Um! Going fur?"

"I'm lookin' for a lodgin' in the village. But this pack o' mine's so precious heavy that I don't feel I can carry it another inch."

"Put it down a bit, an' give yourself a rest," said Peter.

"You look a good sort!" quickly responded the other; "will you take care of my bag for the night, so as I can get on quicker to the village, and I'll call for it in the morning?"

However much old Peter might dislike anyone, he would never refuse to do them a kindness.

"Right you are!" he said, "sling it up here, and I'll put it inside till you comes for it to-morrow mornin'."

He thought it a bit strange afterwards that the fellow never even so much as thanked him, making off in the direction of Leafield village as soon as he had got rid of his burden.

"Tired, I suppose," he said to himself. "Well, mebbe I should be the same."

Then Tom Smith came hurriedly up, looking annoyed and out of spirits, and Peter forgot all about the man and his bag.

"What's wrong, mate?" he asked.

"You're almost as wise as I am," returned the other moodily. "That letter—I don't know what to make of it. Ethel wasn't at the newly-appointed place, where I waited more than a hour, or at the old spot, where I subsequently went—though I'm not surprised at that, it being so late."

"Here!" said Peter, "are you sure as it's her writin'?"

"Oh, there's no doubt about that; the only thing I can think of is that either she is not well, or that she could not elude Peyton, who, as you know, lives in the house."

* * * * * *

"Is your name Peter Hennig?"

"Yes, it is; and I ain't ashamed of it."

"Well, I am a sergeant of police, and you are my prisoner."

"Prisoner! What for?"

"Burglary."

"Burglary! An' whose house as I bin a-burglin', pray?"

"Mr. Compton's, of Plessis Park."

Tom Smith, who was at breakfast with old Peter, started up, and demanded an explanation of the sergeant, vehemently protesting that the whole thing was a mistake and a blunder.

The officer, who was accompanied by two other constables, took no notice of the young man's protest.

"Your name, I take it," he said, "is Basil Keith Dorrington, alias Thomas Smith; and you are also charged as an accomplice of this man."

The sergeant, with one of the constables, then proceeded to thoroughly search the van.

"What's this?" said the former presently, as he dragged from under Peter's "bunk" the bag, left the night before by the stranger from Redhill.

"That!" replied the old cheap-jack, "that's somethin' I'm a-takin' care on for a friend o' mine."

"Oh, is it?" answered the officer. "Well, if you and your friend have no objection, I'll open it, and see what's in it."

Without any ceremony they forced the bag, and turned out upon the floor of the van a heap of plate and valuable jewellery of all kinds.

"Hennig!" said Tom Smith, half angry, half mystified, "what does this mean?"

"Mate," replied Peter, "I'm as much in the dark as you are."

Then while the police were bundling the stolen property up into the bag again, he related to his partner how it was the goods came there.

"Of course I believe you," said Smith; "but it is clear that the plot to ruin me has taken a fresh turn, and how to circumvent the scoundrel who is at the bottom of it all I am at my wits' end to think."

"Well, I've got an idea," whispered the old man, "that there letter 'll not only be the means o' clearin' this up, but 'll also put that other matter we know of straight an' true."

* * * * *

The result of the preliminary examination before a magistrate of Peter Hennig and his partner was a foregone conclusion; inasmuch as

WOULD YOU LIKE A PIECE OF MADGE MORRIS' WEDDING CAKE? THEN TURN TO PAGE 647.

Digitized by Google

a set of skeleton keys were found in the grass under the van; while a knife, known to be Peter's, and with his name scratched upon it, was picked up outside the window of the butler's pantry at Plessis Park.

The accused were, therefore, committed to the next Guildford Assizes; the bail, however, of the solicitor, employed by Ethel to defend them, being accepted for their appearance.

During the interval between the examination and the trial Basil Dorrington, to call him now by his proper name, did not once see Ethel Compton. He heard from her frequently through the solicitor for the defence.

The day before the trial he received a letter from her, which would have told him, even if he had not known it only too well before, that her love and trust were his more than ever.

"My dear," she wrote, "I cannot, for many reasons, exactly explain how, but all will come right. Do more than hope—be sure."

With unblushing effrontery Bernard Peyton sat in court at the solicitor's table to see and to enjoy his rival's degradation.

There were, however, two unpleasant surprises in store for him that day.

The first was when, at the bidding of the counsel for the defence, the usher of the court called "Ethel Compton" as a witness.

Without a trace of nervousness or false modesty, she admitted having written to Basil Dorrington, appointing a meeting at the usual place on the night of the robbery. This letter she gave to her maid to post. Mr. Dorrington did not keep the appointment.

Then the maid was called.

She said that on her way through the hall to post the letter Mr. Compton called her into the library. Throwing the letter on to the hall table, she found, on returning in less than five minutes, that it was gone.

She heard Mr. Peyton speaking to the butler, and pass out while she was engaged with Mr. Compton in the library. The time was eleven in the morning.

More than one person in Court now noticed that Bernard Peyton's face was white to ghastliness.

"Call Richard Drake!"

The witness, a low-browed individual, with a stoop, had evidence to give, which was certainly, though brief, to the point. He declared that he had been employed by Bernard Peyton to "crack the crib," and so dispose of the "swag" that the cheap-jack and his partner should have the credit of it. The knife he had picked up when Peter Hennig dropped it, during the heat of auction time, three evenings before, and had placed it where the police had afterwards found it. The set of "skeletons" were his, and he supposed he must have mislaid them on his night visit to Peter. They were not a "plant." Peyton was to have given him a hundred pounds for the job, but all he got was a "fiver" on account."

A couple of policemen had by this time placed themselves one on each side of the wretched schemer Bernard Peyton, who was in a state of complete collapse.

In the case of the two men at the bar, a formal verdict of acquittal was immediately entered.

Richard Drake, though arrested with his employer, was ultimately allowed to turn King's evidence.

Bernard Peyton, before his conviction and sentence to a long term of penal servitude, confessed that he had not only written the misleading letter, in imitation of Ethel Compton's handwriting, but had also forged the cheque which had been the beginning of all the trouble.

He hated Basil Dorrington, and was determined to stick at nothing to ruin him, and to lose him his sweetheart.

* * * * * * *

"And you did it all for my sake! What can I give you in return?" said Basil, still in Tom Smith's garments.

"Nothing," she answered him, "for I know I had your love long ago; and you have nothing better than that to give me."

* * * * * * *

Old Peter Hennig was an honoured guest at his late partner's wedding, which took place in the spring of the following year.

E. Ralph.

SOME THINGS TO . . . . REMEMBER.

REMEMBER

Pearson's

Xmas 'Xtra.

REMEMBER NOT TO FORGET

TO BUY IT.

REMEMBER TO REMIND

YOUR FRIENDS TO BUY IT.

ALSO REMEMBER.

That PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA costs One Shilling only. . .

That it is now on sale. . . .

That it contains sixty-four pages, thirty-two printed in colours. .

That its stories are bright and interesting. . . . . .

That its pictures are as charming as numerous. . . . . .

That its jokes are original. . .

If you remember these facts you will . . . not forget to buy it

To-day.

Digitized by Google

A FOE IN THE FAMILY

By NOWELL CAY.

(Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

A Plot to be Frustrated.

GEORGE ILDEN, Baron, of Ilden Castle, while staying with his uncle Jasper, at Pennybrook Hall, suddenly discovers that several suspicious events which have taken place during his stay at the Hall, point to the existence of a plot against his life. He has been shot at, poison has been placed in his pocket-flask, and other attempts, fortunately futile, have been made on his life. He confides in Cathie Hay, his cousin, and they agree that as many members of his own family would materially benefit by his death, the attempts must have their origin in that direction. They suspect Percival, Ilden's cousin. Ilden asks Cathie to marry him, as a means of circumventing his enemies' designs, but she has to refuse.

At about this time he meets Florence Courthorpe, the sister of an old college chum who was drowned while boating. She is very poor, and has taken a situation as governess at Witterby, a village not far from Pennybrook. In seeking to escape his foe, Ilden inadvertently settles down just opposite Florence's temporary home.

Late one night Florence sees a man attempt to enter Ilden's bedroom window with evident criminal designs. She leaves the house clad only in dressing-gown and warns Ilden of his danger. For this exploit her employer dismisses her.

She now has no home, so next day leaves Witterby to stay with some friends at Lallerton. Ilden accompanies her. Arrived at Lallerton, however, they discover that Florence's friends, the Despards, have left suddenly, and no trace of them can be found. Florence, of course, is greatly distressed.

Ilden, however, feeling that he is responsible for her position, and desiring to baulk his enemy, proposes to her, is accepted, and marries her secretly. An announcement in the papers informs his family of the wedding.

Shortly after their marriage Ilden receives a message urging him to return to Pennybrook, his uncle Rupert being dangerously ill. Leaving his wife at the apartments he has taken in London, Ilden leaves for Pennybrook. He is met at the Hall by Cathie, who informs him that his uncle is dead, and that he is again exposing his life to danger.

Cathie informs him of her belief that Guy Despard is in the plot, and insinuates that his own wife, being a friend of the Despards, is possibly implicated.

That night her fears for his safety are shown to be well founded. For in the middle of the night the alarm bell is violently rung, and as Ilden opens his door to ascertain the cause, an attempt is made to stab him. Ilden immediately gives chase to his would-be murderer, and, catching him, throws him down, and is half-strangling him when Grant appears with a light, the rays of which show Ilden's captive to be none other than his cousin Percival. Percival, however, declares that he saw Despard entering Ilden's room and thought he was stabbing at him. A search is made and Despard is discovered. He is locked in a cellar till he can be handed to the police in the morning, but someone lets him out during the night. Next day Ilden leaves the Hall to make inquiries regarding Despard at Lallerton, and finds that Despard has been there before him and knows of Lady Ilden's assumed name of Mrs. George and her hiding place at Sydenham.

(The above is a short synopsis of the opening chapters.)

Mystery Upon Mystery.

"How do you know my name?" he asked, his voice betraying none of the excitement which its mention had given him.

"Mr. Despard told me. I mentioned that you had come here expecting to find his sister at the cottage still, and I said how disappointed the lady had been at finding her friend gone. He knew at once who you were, and of course that is how I was able to write, sir. Before, I did not even know your name."

"You wrote to me?" he said, feeling not a little bewildered.

"Yes, sir, or rather to your lady, to return the little gold brooch she dropped here. We found it almost as soon as you were gone, and put it by in hopes that we should hear from you. I sent it off registered just a little while before you came, sir. If I had only known, I might have saved myself the trouble."

He remembered that Florence had spoken of the loss of the trinket on their journey to London, but she had imagined that it was left behind at Witterby. It had belonged to her mother, so she would be pleased to get it back, but it did not occur to Ilden even to thank the woman who had restored it.

"And to what address have you sent it?" he asked, and the disturbed wonder in his mind became greater when she answered promptly with the address at Sydenham, where on the previous day he had left his wife.

But his voice was still matter-of-fact.

"And how did you discover where I lived?"

"Mr. Despard told me, sir, as I have been saying, this morning. He said that he would be going to Sydenham himself to-day and would see Mrs. George, and he offered to take the brooch himself. But he seemed so strange in his manner, if you will excuse me saying so, sir, of a friend of yours, that I thought it would be wiser to send it by post."

"You were quite right," he said mechanically, and as mechanically felt in his pocket to produce the expected reward. His face had grown perfectly pale. In some way the assassin had discovered the secret of his wife's whereabouts which he thought so secure. No doubt he had been watching them all through the fortnight when they thought themselves so free from observation, and had only waited for them to separate to make an attempt on the life of each. That on himself had failed. But Florence, alone and defenceless!

Digitized by Google

How could he hope that she would escape from an enemy so irrationally implacable. The idea increasing in his mind that Despard was mad only increased his panic.

An agony of self-reproach mingled with his uneasiness. He ought never to have left her. If harm happened to her—he could not bear the thought, and he set his mind against it resolutely, afraid of the physical faintness which threatened to unman him. He needed all his strength and clearness of thought to get back and save her. He could not allow himself to think that it might be too late. The good fortune which had directed his steps to the inn could not surely desert him now.

He was inquiring whether he could have a vehicle of any sort to take him back to Shipton Gate, and there seemed to him a cruel irony in the situation when he found that the only one available was that which Despard himself had engaged.

It drove up, however, as he was speaking, but Ilden's relief at the fact was not unmixed. For the landlord who brought back the trap reported that he had used it according to the landlady's surmise to drive Despard back from Castledale to the station. He had caught a train which would take him to Rickerby in time to catch the London express there, if he were lucky.

Ilden cut short his story.

"When is there another train to the junction?"

"Not for a couple of hours, sir."

"And how far is it to the junction from here by road?"

According to the landlord it was barely ten miles, and Ilden's hopes rose. If Despard lost the express he might still overtake him.

He turned to the inn-keeper.

"I will give you ten pounds if you can get me to Rickerby within the hour."

Florence Vanishes.

THE tedious journey to Sydenham was, for George Ilden, one of those experiences which are calculated to turn a man's hair grey before its time.

He had reached Rickerby to find no trace of the man he was pursuing there, and could only conclude that Despard had managed to catch the express which was timed to reach King's Cross three hours before he himself could get there.

In three hours what might not happen. He could only hope that the would-be murderer, unconscious of his pursuit, would delay his actual journey to Sydenham.

And in any case he could at least send Florence a warning. It was not the time now for excess of caution, and he puzzled the telegraph clerk at the station by the message he dispatched.

But the fact that he had warned her did little to relieve his mind when he knew Despard's cunning. The man who had tracked them to Sydenham in spite of all their precautions could manage to follow her if she left the house.

From his conversation with the innkeeper on the way, he had become more than ever impressed with the idea that Despard was insane, but if so there was no doubting that his mania was united with the proverbial cunning of the maniac, and the thought only added to his nervousness. For the madman is restrained through no thought of selfish prudence.

It appeared that Despard had spent more than an hour at Castledale, visiting various people there, but to what purpose the innkeeper had been unable to make out, although it was apparent he had been curious enough.

With himself Despard had scarcely exchanged a word, but he had muttered to himself a great deal.

"It did not seem to me safe for him to be about by himself," the man had said to Ilden, and Ilden had smiled grimly as he answered that he was following the man to see him properly taken care of.

It was a grim smile, and it was the only one which crossed his face during the whole of his anxious journey from Lallerton to Sydenham. The delays seemed endless to him, making the journey one long-drawn torment of suspense.

In his telegram to his wife he had urged her to leave the house and await his arrival at the Crystal Palace Hotel, and his heart beat quickly with mingled hope and fear as he approached the rendezvous at last.

"No, there was no lady waiting for him there," and his heart sank like lead. If Florence had received his message, he did not doubt for a moment that she would have obeyed his wish, unless she had been prevented.

But he still buoyed himself up with hope, telling himself that the message must have miscarried, and that he would find her at home, unconscious that she had ever been in danger. Despard might come when he liked then, so long as he was at her side to protect her.

He jumped into a hansom and drove to their rooms; but, as he opened the door impatiently, his delusive hope sank; for the first thing he saw was his own telegram waiting on the hall table. Where was Florence, that she had not opened it?

He rang the bell furiously, and spread instant alarm into the mind of his landlady by his impatient inquiry for his wife.

"Oh! has she not been with you, sir?" she gasped. "I was hoping that she must have joined you when she did not come back. I should have communicated with you, but none of us knew where you had gone."

He leant back against the wall, overcome by a feeling of physical faintness. There was a singing, surging sound in his ears of which he had not been conscious since his delicate boyhood.

But he mastered the weakness which threatened him by an effort of self-command. He could not afford time to show weakness now."

"Tell me exactly what has happened," he said, speaking only a little more quietly than usual, and the landlady checked an inclination to become hysterical. But it was some time before he could get a connected story from her.

It seemed that almost immediately after he had left home on the previous day, a "young person" whom Mrs. FitzMorris Smith, the landlady, classed as a servant girl, had called at the house and asked to see Lord Ilden. On being assured that no person of the name resided there, she asserted that she had seen him several times entering the house with a lady and insisted on seeing the gentleman who was living there, whatever he might be calling himself. When she was told that Mr. George had left the house on a journey, she had demanded an interview with his wife.

"My heart misgave me from the first about her," said Mrs. Smith, beginning to sob. "But I thought it was only right to let Mrs. George know that she was here."

Ilden nodded.

"Of course. And what then?"

"Mrs. George had the woman shown in, and talked to her."

"Alone?"

"Yes. She asked me to remain, but the girl refused to say anything while I was there, and so I was asked to wait outside."

"And what did you hear there?"

Mrs. Smith was inclined to show indignation.

DO NOT MISS THE MADGE MORRIS WEDDING COMPETITION ON PAGE 647.

Digitized by Google

She had heard nothing, except once or twice the repetition of the name "Lord Ilden."

"And after that?" he asked.

"They came out of the room together, and Mrs. George dressed and went out with her. She did not tell me a word of what the girl had said, or where she was going with her, but when I asked her whether she would be back for dinner, she said 'most probably.' That, sir, was the last word I heard her speak, and the last time I set eyes on her. She never came back, and I had cooked a dinner special for her because I thought she might be a little down-hearted with you away."

"And she left no message for me?"

"No, sir, not a word. I am sure that she expected, when she left the house, to be back long before you were."

This was the whole of the story, and after trying in vain to extract any further detail of importance, Ilden left her to stride through his rooms, seeking the written message which she must surely have left for him somewhere. The artifice which had successfully decoyed her away must have been a marvellously cunning one to deceive her, when she was so completely on her guard and expectant; but however plausible the story told her had been, it was not like Florence, with her foresight and her thoughtfulness for him, to leave the house—with people who confessed themselves cognisant of her identity—without making some provision against a possible intrigue. He ransacked the rooms feverishly, seeking a scrap of paper from her, but in vain.

It was Mrs. Smith who interrupted him; she wanted to know whether he wished the cab to stay. Perhaps he had forgotten it.

As a matter of fact Ilden had forgotten its existence; but the reminder roused him to the fact that he must do something, and he went back to the hansom to be driven to the office of a private detective in town.

The time for secrecy had now gone. The publicity which he had hated to think of, the honour of the family which he had been so anxious to preserve, all these seemed insignificant now and not worth a thought. The only thing that concerned him was that his wife was gone, and that he must find her.

"The Albert Gate Mystery,"
Our Splendid New Serial, will Commence Shortly.

The only thought that frightened him was that he might find her too late. His heart sickened at the possibility. He had told himself confidently that Despard had attempted his own life first and would return to attempt that of his wife.

It seemed to him only too possible now that he had taken her life first.

If only he had known that when they stood face to face at Pennybrook.

From the office of the celebrated detective he was brought back in feverish haste by the delusive hope that Florence might have returned in his absence.

When he found the hope unsatisfied a sense of great desolation came upon him.

As he wandered through the deserted rooms, everything reminded him vividly of the girl-wife he seemed to have lost, and brought back the happy week they had spent there together to compare with his utter loneliness.

She had been embroidering a tobacco-pouch for him, and the work still lay on the table where she had last laid it down.

With a passionate rush of tenderness he raised it to his lips and kissed the work of her fingers.

"Little wife, little wife, come back to me. I want nothing in the world but you," he cried with a sob in his throat.

And he had wondered—how strange it seemed to him now—whether he loved her

A Carefully Planned Decoy.

MEANWHILE Florence had passed through emotions as poignant as those which tore the heart of her husband.

The visit of a stranger who knew Lord Ilden's name had filled her with an instant apprehension which was a little modified by the young woman's appearance.

It was difficult to associate danger or intrigue with the rosy-faced country-girl who stood before her excited with her mission. And she agreed with little reluctance to see her alone, as the girl wished.

"I want to see Lord Ilden," said her visitor abruptly, as soon as the landlady had left them, and Florence flushed uncomfortably. She had never practised subterfuge in her life, and it seemed necessary now.

"And who is Lord Ilden?" she asked, and the girl looked at her in surprise and something that looked like pity.

"What, hasn't he even told you his right name? Well! I do call that a shame."

There was something in her voice that made Lady Ilden proud and thankful to think that her ignorance of the man was only pretended.

She scarcely made an effort to keep up the pretence.

"And suppose I knew this Lord Ilden, may I ask why you want to see him, and what you have to say to him?"

The girl hesitated for a moment, and despairing of her ability to soften the blow, delivered it bluntly.

"I want to tell him that his wife is dying and ask him to come to her, poor thing."

She was surprised that the blow did not appear to hurt. The beautiful lady for whom she had been feeling some compunctions of pity only looked at her in bewilderment.

"Then I am sure that you are making a mistake," said Florence quietly. "I have reason to know that Lord Ilden's wife is quite well, and that she saw him quite recently."

"Meaning yourself?" said the girl, and went on without waiting for an answer. "I was afraid that you must be thinking yourself his wife when I saw you coming in and out here together, not to speak of your being with the gentleman at Lallerton. But if there is any worth in a marriage at the registrar's his wife is my poor mistress, who lies dying to-day because he has broken her heart."

"I am sure that you are making a mistake," said Florence again, her voice quite confident. "But you speak of Lallerton. Would you mind telling me who you are?"

She seated herself as she spoke, for the maid's assertion had tried her nerves, although she knew that it must be false, and she felt her limbs trembling beneath her.

"My name is Clara Wimple," said the girl, "and I followed you to Shipton Gate that day when you went there with his lordship, and him pretending that he did not know where his wife had gone to, although he had her letter telling him all the time. That is how I was so certain that it was you and Lord Ilden when I saw you coming in here. And if he has been deceiving you like he has deceived my poor mistress, I shall never forgive myself for warning him that day. He deserves all he gets if the master does meet him, and I am sure it was more for the poor master's sake than his that I tried to keep him away, knowing what I know, and having seen the master wandering round by his old home only that morning."

She was evidently debating with herself the morality of a past action, but on Florence the words were wasted. The tumult of thought bewildered her.

She was calming herself to ask a question.

"You say that Lord Ilden married your mistress. What is her name?"

Digitized by Google

"Lady Ilden, ma'am, although she and I are the only people that know it, and he won't admit it, and for his sake she keeps it a secret and keeps her maiden name."

"But her maiden name?" asked Florence impatiently.

"Was Miss Despard, ma'am. I was her maid at home and when she came here she sent for me and engaged me again."

Florence had known it before she spoke, and she drew her hand over her brows in a pathetic effort to think clearly.

It was false, of course, to say that George had been married when he met her—that she was not really his wife. She had laughed at the assertion in her heart, feeling that it was a trick intended to make her distrust him. But Daisy Despard could not have joined in a trick. She was the one person whom she believed in as completely as her husband. It was very strange. If Daisy said that George had married her——but it was impossible. He did not even know her. Of course when she spoke to her friend she would discover how the strange mistake had arisen.

"Miss Despard is a great friend of mine," she said. "I was very sorry when I found that she had left Lallerton without letting me know her new address. If you can tell me it, I should like to see her."

"I can take you to her at once," said the girl. "She is living quite close."

"Then I will come now and see her," said Florence.

The thought that this might be a trick did not suggest itself, and she put on her things impatiently.

It was not until they were out in the street that something the girl had said recurred to her mind.

"You spoke as though your mistress were ill. I hope that you were exaggerating."

"Oh! no, ma'am. I wish I were. But the doctor himself says that she has not strength enough to pull through. He doubts whether she will live through the night, and that is why I made up my mind to come and beg her husband to see her. You see, ma'am, something she saw in the papers last week gave her a shock when she ought to have been careful with her health, and now that it is over the doctor says she has not strength to pull round again. I don't know whether I am doing right in taking you to her."

"She is my greatest friend," said Florence. "I am sure that she will be glad to see me. Have you not told her that you have seen me."

"And his lordship? No, ma'am, I daren't; but it came over me this morning when I saw her asleep, that if her husband were to hear that she was dying, he might come to see her, and perhaps let her die happy by saying something kind. And to think that you and the mistress were friends!"

Something of the dramatic tragedy of the coincidence seemed to touch even her rustic imagination, and she lapsed into silence.

Florence did not break it. That she had found her friend, only to hear that she was dying, was in itself sufficient to occupy all her mind, apart from this strange, incredible story which connected her with George. The latter was, of course, some strange misunderstanding. She would not let her mind dwell on it, or even admit to herself that she wished to question her friend about it.

The rooms which the Despard's had taken on their flight from "Chez-nous" were, as Clara Wimple had said, quite close by, and the journey took only a few minutes.

Florence, walking as in a dream, realised that they were stopping before one of the tall houses in the next avenue, which she and George had passed all unconsciously on the previous day. She was conscious of no emotion beyond expectation. Something was going to happen. She waited for it breathlessly.

Her guide was opening the door without a key, and started back with a little cry of surprise and fear.

"The master is back again," she whispered to the silent figure following her.

(Continued on next page.)

BILE BEANS CURE A LONDON CHEF.

TESTIMONY FROM CHELSEA.

LIVER COMPLAINT, RHEUMATISM, AND DIZZINESS ENDED.

Mons. Etienne Sewry, of Shirley House, Gertrude Road, Chelsea, chef at one of London's most fashionable West-end hotels, tells an interesting story of how Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness cured him of liver complaint, rheumatism, and dizziness. It was told to a representative of the "Weekly Budget." Said M. Sewry:—

"The kitchen is not the healthiest of places, and biliousness is inseparable from the life of a chef, unless he is in perfect health. I suffered from biliousness and dizziness for a considerable time.

"It was all due to my liver being disordered. The attacks would come on me in the morning, together with a kind of dizziness. At times I was so bad I did not know what to do. The sourness in my stomach was very unpleasant. What was more, rheumatism attacked me, and was so severe in the shoulders that I could not put my hands behind my back.

I tried all kinds of medicines, but nothing did me any lasting good, and I was beginning to despair, when I read an account about Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. I sent for a box, and when I had taken it I was astonished at the result. The Beans acted marvellously. The dizziness and mists before the eyes disappeared, and I felt better in every way. I persevered with the Beans, and in a short time was completely cured. I have not been troubled with biliousness since, and the rheumatism has also been banished. I am feeling in perfect form now, and it is a treat, I can tell you."

Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness have achieved a world-wide reputation as a certain cure for rheumatism, dizziness, all liver and kidney disorders, indigestion, constipation, female ailments, loss of appetite, fulness and belching after eating, piles, palpitation, neuralgia, and as a preventative of influenza. Bile Beans may be had of all chemists, or direct from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of price, 1s. 1½d. or 2s. 9d. per box (2s. 9d. box contains three times 1s. 1½d.)

The Bile Bean Manufacturing Company will send you a free sample box of Bile Beans if you forward this coupon to their Central Distributing Depôt, Greek Street, Leeds (Yorks.), along with full name and address and a penny stamp to pay return postage.

Free Sample Coupon

BILE BEANS.

Short Stories, Nov. 22nd, 1902.

Digitized by Google

Florence had taken it for granted, in so far as she had thought of Guy Despard at all, that in seeing Daisy she would also meet her brother. In her knowledge of them they had always been together, and she wondered at the girl's surprise.

Despard was standing in the hall, and she was conscious that a great change had taken place in him even in the short time since she had travelled with him from Pennybrook to Rickerby. He had looked haggard and wild-eyed then. But now his face was ghastly in its hollowness and pallor. He was unshaven too, and his hair which he had always worn unconventionally long was unkempt and disordered.

He seemed to have been watching for the maid's arrival and addressed her sharply before he noticed that she was not alone.

"What right have you to leave the house, when your mistress may wake and want you? Go to her at once."

He caught sight of Florence as he spoke, and his face, which had been dark with anger, changed suddenly. It seemed to her that he was pleased as well as surprised that she had come.

"I have just heard that Daisy is ill and that you are living quite close to us," she said, holding out her hand. He appeared too agitated, however, to think of any conventional greeting, and her hand remained unnoticed. "It seems strange," she ran on, "that you should be so near me all the time that I have been trying to find you. I was so anxious to see Daisy and know what had become of her."

Clara Wimple stood hesitating near, as if anxious to speak and yet afraid to. Despard turned to her angrily.

"Go to your mistress."

Then, as the girl obeyed with evident reluctance, he turned to his unexpected visitor, his strange face fiercely eager.

"I am glad that you have come. But where is your husband? You say that you are living near here?"

The question seemed to her to lift a sudden weight from her mind. The girl must have made some ridiculous mistake. Mr. Despard had heard of her marriage, and accepted it. It was well that she had given no attention to the maid's words.

"Yes, we are in Woodborough Avenue," she said, "at Selwood House."

"And Lord Ilden is there now?"

"No, he has just gone back to Pennybrook. He received word this morning that his uncle, Rupert, is seriously ill—possibly dying—and wishes to see him. It is our first parting."

Despard smiled curiously.

"And will be your last, I hope. But you are anxious to see Daisy. You will find her very much changed. She was unconscious when I left her just now. If she should recognise you, there is no need for you to tell her that I have been here. I have just returned from a journey, and have to start again at once."

She looked at him in some surprise.

"You are leaving your sister when she is so ill! I understood that her case was critical."

His face was working convulsively, and made her feel vaguely alarmed.

"I am going for her sake. I shall have good news for her when I return. She will live to hear it."

She was too disturbed herself to notice fully the strangeness of his words and manner. But insensibly it prevented her asking any of the questions which were ready on her lip, questions about the strange assertion that Clara Wimpole had made.

Despard was taking her up to his sister's room, and left her at the door. He seemed restless and impatient.

"You are starting at once?" she asked, and he nodded with the strange eagerness in his wild eyes again.

"At once. I have lost too much time already."

Inside the room she found a professional nurse as well as the maid seated beside the bed on which her old schoolfriend lay unconscious.

She lay so still and her face was so thin and worn that it seemed to Florence as if it must be the unconsciousness of death. Her heart filled with a great pity, which drove from her mind every thought except that this was the friend she loved, the one woman who had been kind to her in her days of adversity. She sank on her knees by the side of the bed and touched the worn face with her lips.

"Daisy, dearest, it is I, Florrie. Don't you know me?" she cried, but no response came from the unconscious figure on the bed, and Florence's eyes filled with tears.

"She has been like that for hours now," said the nurse, her matter-of fact voice sounding to her strangely out of keeping with the solemnity of the room. "The doctor says that she may pass away like that, or she may be conscious for a little while before the end. It may come at any time now. Won't you sit down, ma'am. You don't look strong."

She sat down crying silently.

"You will be the friend that she has been asking for so much," said the nurse. "She was always calling for 'Florrie' when she was delirious, or for her husband."

"Her husband?" Florence repeated the words questioningly, and the nurse lowered her voice.

"Or the gentleman who ought to be. I suppose that it is him she calls 'George.'"

Florence started. For the moment she had forgotten, and the name brought it all back. Daisy's maid had told her an impossible story connecting the two.

It must be a mistake, because her husband had never met Daisy. She knew it from his own lips. And yet—it seemed as though some mocking spirit outside herself, whispered the words in her ear—he had gone to Lallerton to see her. The conversation in which her friend's name was first mentioned between them came back vividly. "Has Miss Despard ever spoken about me?" George had asked her, and had seemed very eager for her answer. It was only when she showed her surprise at his knowing her friend that he told her they had never met.

She tried to silence the voice. It was disloyal to her love to listen. Daisy would come back to consciousness and tell her that the maid had made a mistake, and she directed her attention to the figure on the bed again. Would her friend ever wake again to silence the mocking voice that derided her, reminding her that after all she had known her husband only for one short fortnight.

"THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY,"
Our Splendid New Serial, will Commence Shortly.

"Lord Ilden is My Husband!"

"Don't you think that her husband ought to see her before she dies?"

The words roused Florence from a reverie. She could not tell how long she had been sitting there, lost to all that passed around her in the concentration of her mind on the dialogue that seemed to carry itself on there without her will.

Her heart cried out again and again that nothing could make her doubt her husband's goodness and love. He had proved them so fully in the little while that they had been together. And still the mocking voice gave its answer, and all her mind went to the silencing of it. And now she seemed roused as from a dream by Clara Wimple's hushed voice. The nurse had left the room. She had not noticed her departure, nor the fact that the maid had returned to take her place.

"Her husband?" she repeated, starting.

(Continued on page 671.)

Digitized by Google

ASTHMA

WHY ? ? is it generally thought that there is no cure for

ASTHMA, CHRONIC BRONCHITIS,

SHORTNESS OF BREATH, EMPHYSEMA, BLOOD-SPITTING, HAY FEVER, and other Lung Complaints.

BECAUSE ! ! the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE.

Sufferers will receive post free, particulars of the famous WEIDHAAS HOME TREATMENT when applying to THE PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, 16 T.A. Buckingham Rd., Brighton.

FREE OF CHARGE,

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the Treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had then practised it for over 19 years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over 40 years have been cured by his Treatment (in some instances even at the age of 70 or 80 years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.

No interference with daily occupation. Send description of complaint, and mention if you suffer from COLD FEET. Read the following Testimonial, one out of thousands received:

A SEPTUAGENARIAN CURED OF CHRONIC BRONCHITIS.

Mrs. INKPIN.)
(From a photo.

"For over thirty-seven years I suffered with Bronchitis, with wheezing, rattling in my chest, heavy breathing. I got so weak from constant coughing, and the difficulty of breathing increased. If I went out walking, when I returned I would cough for an hour before I could get any relief, or if I went upstairs I was sure to cough. I could not do my domestic work, and I was afraid to eat anything. I tried everything my friends recommended me, but of no avail. My doctor told me that I should never be cured. I have been in my bed three months at a time, and for weeks could not lie down. My feet were always cold, and I have had to fight for my breath. I bless the day I wrote to Mr. Weidhaas. I had not been under treatment long before I began to find relief, and I persevered, and am happy to say I am quite cured. I can now do my domestic work, and I am seventy-three years old."

Lindfield. Mrs. S. INKPIN.

(Full address on application.)

The Director is prepared to pay to any Charitable Institution if the above is not a genuine extract from the patients' own letters. The originals may be seen at the Paul Weidhaas Hygienic Institute by any bona-fide enquirers.

£1,000

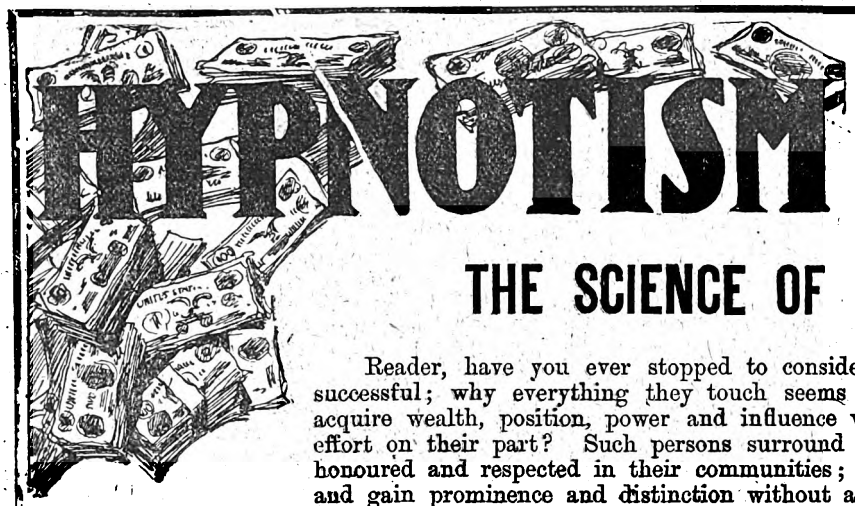
CURABLE

KSR . KSR . KSR .



HYPNOTISM

THE SCIENCE OF SUCCESS

Reader, have you ever stopped to consider why some persons are so successful; why everything they touch seems to turn to gold; why they acquire wealth, position, power and influence without any seemingly great effort on their part? Such persons surround themselves with friends, are honoured and respected in their communities; are sought after in society, and gain prominence and distinction without apparently trying. Have you ever considered these things? Do you know why?

WHAT BRINGS SUCCESS

Not hard work, for the poor work harder than the rich. Not birth, because many of our successful men are of lowly parentage. Not luck, for many a lucky man dies friendless and poor. We will tell you why. The secret of success in life is personal influence—the ability to make others think as you do; to win their confidence and friendship and get them to help you. There is a secret power by which you can wield an irresistible personal influence; by which you may overcome all obstacles, charm and fascinate whom you will; by which you may cure every known disease and bad habit without the aid of drugs, medicines or the surgeon's knife. It is called personal Magnetism or Hypnotism. It is the basis of success in every business and calling.

A GOD-GIVEN POWER

It is a God-given power that is the heritage of the poor as well as the rich. It is truly the wonder science of the age. Consider what it means to be able to convince a man that your goods are the best on the market, that your services are invaluable to him, that you are offering to him a good investment, that he needs what you have to sell, that your opinion is correct, that he should act upon your advice, and a thousand other things of this kind. Consider what an advantage such a power would give you. If you wish to secure a good paying position, obtain an increase in salary, or add to your present income in any way, a knowledge of hypnotism will prove invaluable. In hundreds of instances it has been the turning point in the lives of people who were ready to give up in despair—for whom the future seemed to have no hope.

LEARN AT HOME FREE

We have just issued the most remarkable book of the century, which explains all about hypnotism, personal magnetism, magnetic healing, etc., in language so plain that a child can understand it. The book was written by Dr. X. La Motte Sage, A.M., Ph.D., LL.D., the most eminent and renowned hypnotist of modern times. It tells of new secret instantaneous methods which enable any intelligent person to learn this mysterious science at home in a few days and use the power on his friends and associates entirely without their knowledge. We absolutely guarantee success or forfeit $1,000.00 in gold. Many persons are now making from $2,000.00 to $5,000.00 per year from what they learned from this remarkable work, while some have grown immensely wealthy.

Dr. Sage, the author of this rare book, has determined that all the people shall now have the mysterious secrets which have been so jealously guarded for ages. He has determined that the poor shall have an equal chance with the rich.

A BOOK OF RARE SECRETS GIVEN AWAY

He has sold the copyright of his book with the understanding that Ten Thousand Copies shall be distributed to the public free of charge; and this agreement is now being complied with. Anyone can get a copy absolutely free, postage prepaid, simply by addressing penny post-card to the

NEW YORK INSTITUTE OF SCIENCE,

DEPARTMENT VA29, ROCHESTER, N.Y., U.S.A.

"This great work is worth more than gold. It is full of wonderful secrets and startling surprises. Its teachings are next in value to those of the Holy Bible. I advise everyone to obtain a copy."—REV. PAUL WELLER, Gorham, N.Y.

Digitized by Google

"Lord Ilden. It does not seem right that she should die without seeing him. I thought that, if you knew where he was, you would send for him, now that you see for yourself how ill the poor mistress is. I did not dare to ask you before, because of the master being here; but I have just been asking, and they say that he has gone away again by train; so that there could be no harm in his lordship coming for an hour or so. You will send for him, won't you? I think the poor mistress would die happy if she could only see him once, in spite of the way in which he has treated her. She would never believe that he really meant to desert her. Perhaps I ought not to be talking like this to you, ma'am, being as you think that he is your husband too; but you can't love him like the poor mistress does."

Florence kept her voice steady and dignified.

"I am sure that you are making a mistake. Lord Ilden has never met Miss Despard. He told me so himself."

"As I suppose he would, ma'am. Men seem all alike to me. There's no believing them. Whether they are lords, or just plain, ordinary men, they are just the same to women."

Florence interrupted her.

"But what makes you think it was Lord Ilden who married your mistress?"

"She told me so herself, ma'am; and besides, I was with her the first time that she ever met him. It was in the Castledale woods early in the summer, and Miss Daisy was making a picture of the old ruins. I had gone with her to carry the luncheon basket. Lord Ilden had been fishing and lost his way, and he asked us to direct him how to get out of the woods. He said he was staying at the inn at Castledale. I thought then that he must know his way well enough, and had only made an excuse for stopping because Miss Daisy was so pretty. But she did not seem to think of that, and she took him herself as far as the path, and they talked a good deal, and I knew that she liked him. And when we went home she asked me not to speak about the meeting to anybody for fear of Mr. Guy hearing of it. He was always so queer if she made a new friend.

"And the next day his lordship was at the ruins again, and the next, and I suppose a good many days after. But Miss Daisy said that there was no need for me to carry the basket, and I only knew from her face when she came home that she had met him. Indeed, those first three days were the only time that I ever saw his lordship till he came to Lallerton with you. He took good care to keep out of the master's way. Miss Daisy had told him, I suppose, that her brother didn't like her having friends.

"Mr. Guy himself was working hard at a picture, and thought she only went to Castledale for the sketching; and then he went to London to see the galleries, and while he was away Miss Daisy went away too, for a week, and when she came back she told me that she was married to Lord Ilden, but that I was not to tell a soul, because his lordship had important reasons for wishing the marriage to be kept secret for the present, and she did not dare yet to tell her brother. Not that she told me at once, till I had begun to suspect it. His lordship had gone away then, and she wrote begging for permission to tell her brother. But he said that it would spoil everything. She showed me his letter—a cruel letter it seemed to me—so that I should see how important it was to keep silence. He said that it might never be possible for him to acknowledge her unless she kept their secret a little longer.

"And then her brother found out. But she kept her promise, and would not say that she was married. I told him myself, but she denied it for her husband's sake, and she sent me away because I had told him Lord Ilden's name.

"I think that it turned Mr. Guy mad. He had always thought so much of his sister. He went about after that trying to find his lordship. By that time I believe the mistress had ceased to get any letter from him. She used to write to some address he had given her. He would never have the letters sent to his own home, Ilden Castle.

"Miss Daisy—or rather Lady Ilden, as I ought to call her—was afraid that her letters must have miscarried; but she would not disobey him even then, till she found what Mr. Guy was doing, and then she wrote to him where he was staying with some friends in Yorkshire. She saw it in the papers that he was there. I believe he told her then that they weren't really married.

"She has talked about it when she was ill. But I am sure it was a real marriage—Miss Daisy wouldn't have been deceived. And if he knew that his wife was dying and that you knew about her, I should think he would come, if he has any heart at all. You will send for him, ma'am?"

Florence shook her head.

"I would send for him if I thought that it were true. But I cannot believe it. Your mistress will tell us that you have made a mistake, that it was not Lord Ilden she married. Lord Ilden is my husband!"

(The result of this strange interview will be told next Tuesday.)

"DEAREST KITTY," wrote a young lady recently, "I've turned over a new leaf, and broken all engagements but two."

"MISS SYBILLE JONES is going to travel under an assumed name." "Whatever for?" "Well, you see, she gets married next week, and she's going on her honeymoon."

UNSOPHISTICATED PARENT: "Hallo there, nurse, what's that baby yelling like that for? I can't read at all." Nurse: "He's cutting his teeth, sir." U. P.: "Well, see that he doesn't do it any more, or you lose your place."

FLOSSY: "Come, Johnny, let's play we's married." Johnny: "Very well, Flossy." "Come in, den, come in to dinner. How do you like de dinner to-day, my dear?" "It is a good dinner. A very good dinner, indeed." "Oh, you mustn't say dat, you must say dat it ain't wuf a dash. If I couldn't cook a dinner better than dat I would bury myself in the back garden. That's the way papa talks."

The NEW STANDARD book
On CONJURING is

The Modern Conjurer

By C. LANG NEILL.

With an introduction by . .
CHARLES BERTRAM.

Explaining and Illustrating Tricks by

J. N. MASKELYNE — FRANK KENNARD
TREWEY — PAUL VALADON
CHARLES BERTRAM — H. DE MANCHE
T. NELSON DOWNS — L. GRAHAM LEWIS
MLLE. PATRICE — ELLIS STANYON

and others.

With over 500 Illustrations from Photographs of Actual Tricks.

Demy 8vo, cloth. Price 6s.

Professor Bertram, the greatest drawing-room conjurer of the present time, concludes his introduction as follows:

With the greatest possible pleasure I recommend these fascinating pages to amateurs and experts as the finest and most reliable work upon Modern Conjuring and Feats of Dexterity that has ever been produced.

At all booksellers, and Hamley Bros. Limited, 231 High Holborn and 35 New Oxford Street, or of the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

How to Congratulate.

SURELY, "ADA," it is not necessary for you to ask me how you should congratulate a very dear friend on her engagement? You certainly do know how to write a letter, if the one you have written to me is a specimen. Write to her just as one girl should to another—a letter expressing your pleasure at her engagement, your hopes for her happiness, and any little confidential advice or comments you may be in a position to offer her. Above all, don't be formal or stiff in such correspondence. A genuine letter of congratulation between friends should be natural and not based on any mere form.

The Usual Parent.

"LENA'S" father absolutely refuses to allow her to marry "EDWIN." "EDWIN," however, presses her continuously to continue to be his sweetheart. Should "LENA" oppose her parent's wishes, and agree?

* * * *

Perhaps you had better accept your parent's decision for the time. By remaining true to "EDWIN"—if you love him—in course of time your father must see that it is futile to stand in your way further. Many fathers have been brought to consent to their daughters' engagement if they have seen that their interference is of no avail.

The Unready Lover.

"CAMALLA" has been receiving attentions from a man, but as yet he has made her no definite proposal, but only hinted at marriage. He has professed his love for her, but has lately grown less effusive. He is going to America next year. How is "CAMALLA" to let him know that she loves him very deeply?

* * * *

I cannot understand your difficulty, "CAMALLA." He professes that he loves you, and has suggested marriage. Perhaps he cannot make a definite proposal yet, owing to his prospects. As he is going to America, perhaps it is not possible to make you an offer until he returns. Wait until he does so, in the meantime making him as sure of your love and constancy as you can.

Must He Marry?

MUST a man get married, even if he has not yet met the woman of his heart? "TWENTY-EIGHT" has had one or two love affairs, but none of them have made him the happy possessor of a wife. Now he is no longer in the first flush of youth he is beginning to speculate on the future. As a bachelor, he tells me, he is perfectly happy. His father and mother are living, and he has a comfortable home. He has no present fancy for any particular girl. What he wishes to know is, "should he look for a wife?"

* * * *

If you are perfectly happy, "TWENTY-EIGHT," that is a state which cannot be improved upon. You have, it seems, a good home, a father and mother. You are not in love with any girl. Why then bother your head about matrimony? If your nature is one which pines for the solace of a wife, those one or two love affairs you speak of will in all probability be repeated as time goes on, and you will meet some other woman. Wait till she comes your way, which she must, sooner or later, if you are an ordinary man, of susceptible disposition, and not of the family of woman-haters.

Trapped!

WHAT can a man do when he has been entrapped into a proposal? "LESLIE" feels he has made a fool of himself. Having been thrown very much into "ADA'S" society, he overstepped the bounds of flirtation by saying in a half joking manner that he would like to marry her. He does not know why he said it, but the girl took it quite literally, accepted the proposal, and announced it to her friends. Everybody now looks upon them as engaged, yet "LESLIE" really had no such intention. How can he get out of it?

* * * *

Explain to the girl that your remark was not intended seriously. Ask her to act in an honourable way and release you from any engagement. If you think she really believed you when you proposed, and acted in good faith, you can scarcely break off the engagement without laying yourself open to social censure, or even a breach of promise action. This being the case, I should advise you to accept the situation, but refrain from any further visits to her. If a man has been the victim of a trap—such as, apparently, you have—while he is outwardly pledged to marriage, it is his own affair when to consummate it, and the law cannot compel a man to marry any woman. Absent yourself, after explaining to the girl the facts of the case, and leave it to time to put things in order.

A Dilatory Admirer.

"DAISY" two years ago met a man of whom she became very enamoured. For a long time he wrote to her in very friendly terms, but never breathed a word of any idea of serious intentions towards her. Now "DAISY" has met another man, by whom she is not so much attracted, but who appears to be very fond indeed of her. Should she listen to the attentions of the latter, or wait until the former makes some definite proposal.

* * * *

The first man, "DAISY," has had ample time in which to make any proposal. As he has not done so, it would be better for you to assume that he has no serious intentions towards you, but values you only as a friend. You should not be bound by the shadowy idea that he may suddenly alter his attitude. Meanwhile, you are yourself the best judge as to whether the new admirer is a desirable suitor for you. Certainly do not take up a stiff attitude towards him. Try his companionship for a while, and see how your feelings develop. You may in time get to regard him with affection. Possibly you are not one of the "first sight" lovers, and require time to know where your affections lie.

Accepting a Compliment.

"E. S. S."—Thank you so much for your sweet letter. The little affair has now, I hope, been forgotten, as I am sure few readers would wish to accuse me of sowing discord between husband and wife. When you are introduced to anyone, and they venture to say they would "like to meet you again," it is more usual to bow and accept the compliment in smiling silence. If, as you say, you really do wish to meet the individual in question again, why not say, in reply to his wish, "I daresay we shall," adding that you have been "much interested" in his conversation, or pleased with the way he dances, sings, or plays. Some such nice little return compliment should be passed. If, however, you are unable to pass any such compliment, it would be better to accept his remark with a simple bow.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

CHRISTMAS

No more generally acceptable Christmas Gift can be found than some little piece of Jewellery—a BROOCH or PIN, a WATCH or CHAIN, a BRACELET or LOCKET, RING or CHARM, or something more generally useful in the house—ELECTRO-PLATE or CUTLERY.

OUR CATALOGUE (Illustrated),

which we send free of all cost to anyone sending their name and address, will be found a perfect gold mine to all who are wanting to make presents this Christmas. It contains, besides Jewellery, Electro-Plate, and Cutlery, hundreds of charming things—Cameras, Phonographs, Opera Glasses, Musical Instruments, Organettes, Furniture, etc.—practically everything that the present-seeker is likely to want, and all at FIGURES CONSIDERABLY BELOW USUAL PRICES. Send at once for this valuable Book of Reference.

If you cannot pay all at once for the article chosen, we shall be just as pleased to supply you on terms whereby you can pay a little at a time, monthly.

J. M. DRAPER,

(DEPT. 366), Northern Emporium, Higher Audley St., Blackburn.

PRESENTS

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 23lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 196 Oxford Street, London, W.

HERE'S MONEY.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1902 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—

NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE Delamere Crescent, London, W.

Many will tell you that "Tatcho" is the only remedy they have found serviceable after years of trying.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back. Puts the hair right. Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

The Hon. Mrs. GORDON—

"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit from 'Tatcho.'—8 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, August 28th, 1902."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account. — Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find 'Tatcho' excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Colonel PERRY—

"My dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the World, in Bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

A 4/6 full size Trial Bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

CADBURY'S Cocoa

"A Perfect Food."

It has stood the TEST OF TIME.

"FIRST and FOREMOST."

'Cadbury's'

Is COCOA and the BEST COCOA only.

Points from the Press.

"The perfect purity of CADBURY'S Cocoa—a strong point with the makers—constitutes its firm hold upon the public confidence, and the secret of its universal popularity."—Health.

Strength, Purity, Nourishment.

ROBIN

The New

Starch

Makes LINEN GLOSSY, STIFF & FLEXIBLE

Does not Stick to the Iron.

Made by the Manufacturers of the celebrated Reckitt's Paris Blue.

A DAILY LUXURY.

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Creamy, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a wholesome, delicious article of diet for daily use. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

AS AN ARTICLE OF DIET

BIRD'S CUSTARD

is unrivalled for nutriment and delicacy of flavour.

BIRD'S CUSTARD is the one thing needed with all Fresh, Stewed, or Tinned Fruits. Practical housewives always keep a supply ready at hand.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

SHORT STORIES

SPECIAL PRIZES FOR SCOTCH READERS.

Tartan Cover No. 6.—Macdonald of Sleat.

No. 726.] Week ending November 29th, 1902. [Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

"LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery"

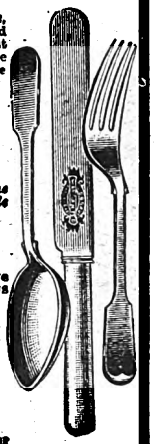
THE "ENTERPRISE" . PARCEL . 25/-

Household Cutlery & Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white "Ivorette" Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 Mustard Spoons, 3 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist-Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of 'Columbian' silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.



HOW TO PAY.

Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if the Goods are not perfectly satisfactory in every respect.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No. Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

TIGER PACKET OF POSTAGE STAMPS, 2D.

POSTAGE 1d. EXTRA.

This is a special offer and only costs 2d. with 1d. extra for postage. There are 50 different stamps including Perak (tiger's head), Selangor (tiger), Pahang (tiger), Hoi hao, Shanghai, Trinidad (Britannia), Nyassaland (giraffe), Corean Post, Philippines, New S. Wales, Cape Colony, Roumania, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, New Issue Turkey, &c.

& FREE, with each packet, a rare set of 2 new issue oblong Malaysia, with pictures of Tigers. Most handsome stamps. Only one packet supplied to each person. Postage 1d. extra.

We send free our beautifully illustrated price list of Foreign and Colonial stamps, albums, &c. Best value anywhere. Send now. Address in full:

A tiger who came from Malay,
Saw this ad. in a paper one day,
Said he, "This is good
For it comes from E. Wood,
He's giving the stamps away."

ERNEST WOOD & CO.,
CHORLTON-CUM-HARDY, MANCHESTER.

Order
E. & T.
PINK'S
JAM
Undoubtedly the Best.
PURE.
No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

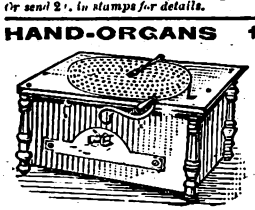
EVERY LADY
should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 59 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2½ in stamps for details.

HAND-ORGANS from 20s.



Made in 3 sizes, ebony and gold case. With 6 fine tunes. Full organ tone. Plays songs, hymns, dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, can be paid 4s. monthly. Write for terms, price list and tunes. ATLAS CO., 184B High St., Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Rd.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.
PHONOGRAPHS, 10/6 MUSICAL ALBUMS, 10.6.

DON'T COUGH for
KEATING'S LOZENGES
EASILY CURE
THE WORST COUGH.
One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1½d. tins everywhere.

Genuine Testimonials on application.
PRIVATE 'XMAS CARDS. Printed with your own wording in Gold. From per 1/6 doz.
SAMPLE BOOK SENT FOR APPROVAL.
THOMAS BROS. & CO., THE PRINTERS, 34, 36, & 37 EVERTON ROAD, LIVERPOOL.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henriette Street, London, W.C.

Short Stories.

No. 726. For the Week Ending November 29th, 1902. One Penny.

FASCINATING NEW SERIES. BEGIN TO-DAY.

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

LORD REGINALD DAVENANT. Another of Belinda's suitors.

LADY HONORIA. The Duke's sister.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister, who is staying at Cairo.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

HOW LADY PEGGY FINDS BELINDA.

Lady Peggy undertakes, for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, to chaperon Belinda, and to marry her to a son of some old and titled family. Staying at the same hotel in Cairo are the Duke of Eastacres and his mother, the Duchess. Lady Peggy and the Duchess agree that nothing could be better than a union of the Duke's title and Belinda's millions; everything is therefore done to bring this about. One evening, under the guidance of a fine looking Bedouin, they all go to witness a religious festival. Some dervishes are dancing when suddenly Belinda, excited beyond all self-restraint, throws herself into the midst of the fanatics and tries to imitate their weird dance. Her enthusiasm is misinterpreted. Instantly all is confusion. The guide, however, snatches Belinda from danger, and hurries them away. Belinda is profuse in her thanks, then suddenly with a cry of: "It is you, you! Lady Peggy, he's not a dragoman at all. He's David Carr," throws herself into his arms.

The dragoman is dismissed, and back at the hotel the Duchess of Eastacres takes Lady Peggy to task for the occurrence. Lady Peggy retorts that not long ago she saw the Duchess' own daughter Honoria in the arms of a real Egyptian. The Duchess is furious, calls Honoria, and after storming at her, is slapping her face when Belinda rushes in, rescues Honoria and takes her to her room. Shortly afterwards a fearful shriek is heard, followed by an impassioned appeal for "Help!" The voice is Belinda's!

Rushing upstairs, we discover that Belinda has just prevented Honoria from poisoning herself.

Another suitor now appears—Lord Reginald Davenant, at one time in love with Mrs. Murchison Lee, who is also at Cairo. The slighted Mrs. Lee, or "Midge," as she is called is furious, and threatens violence to Belinda. Lady Peggy checkmates her, however, by robbing her of her morphia (to which she is a slave) and her hypodermic syringe.

That same evening, Lady Peggy suddenly discovers the Duke of Eastacres and a new comer, Stanley Forbes, about to fight a duel. Realising the possible disastrous consequences to her matrimonial plans for Belinda, Lady Peggy rushes forward and places herself between the two men.

All rights reserved.

Belinda Receives Her First Proposal.

"My dear Duke," I cried, paying no heed to Stanley's evident annoyance, "wherever is Belinda? I've been looking for her this hour or more!"

"You must have overlooked her in your haste, Lady Peggy," interrupted Stanley; "the young lady was in the courtyard of the hotel five minutes since."

"Oh, no," I said, shaking my head, "that was not Belinda. She and the Duke went off this morning to explore the desert. I expected them back some hours ago. Indeed, I've been quite anxious at their non-appearance."

Then turning to Eastacres. "Where is she, Duke? You ought not to have left her."

"Indeed, Lady Peggy, I parted from Miss North only a short distance from the Mena, she can't have come to any harm."

"Harm," I repeated; "you little know Belinda. As likely as not she's started off on an expedition to the Bedouins, or gone for a ramble up the Pyramids. She's so impetuous."

"I don't think you need worry yourself. Still, if it will relieve your anxiety, I'll go and look for her."

Digitized by Google

"A good idea," said Stanley, "I'll join you in the search. We shall shortly return with the lost sheep, Lady Peggy; until then——" He paused and moved towards the Duke.

"Oh, no," I cried, "that won't do at all. It's foolish for both to look in the same direction. You go towards the hotel, Eastacres. Mr. Forbes and I will search about here."

Thus appealed to, Stanley could not very well refuse.

"I'll see you later on at the Mena, Duke," he called after the other's retreating figure. Eastacres gave a gesture of compliance and walked rapidly towards the hotel.

Stanley, with an air of great politeness, offered me his arm and suggested that if we were going to search we'd better begin.

"I'm at your disposition for an hour," he said, "after which time I'm afraid that I must leave you." He smiled as he spoke, and I knew he had seen through my manœuvre—Stanley and I had had more than one passage of arms in the days gone by—I knew also that unless I took decisive action he would yet meet the Duke that night. I had only delayed, not prevented, the scene.

"Do you know why I interrupted you and Eastacres?" I asked him abruptly.

"My dear Lady Peggy, you are a woman of such infinite resource that it would be the merest vanity on my part to attempt to fathom any of your reasons."

"I'll tell you," I said, gazing at him steadily. "I did it for your sake. I know why you wish to speak in private to the Duke. I guess all that you wish to say to him. But"—I laid my hand upon his arm—"but you must not speak to him until I have told you what I have to tell."

"It's very nice of you to interest yourself on my behalf, Lady Peggy."

"You think I'm playing with you, Stanley? Talking to gain time. Well, I'll prove you are mistaken. Listen! You wished to ask the Duke to-night for news of Sheila Kenwyn?"

The shot went home. His face grew tense, his eyes flashed, he gripped me tightly by the arm.

"Where is she?" he asked hoarsely. "Where is Sheila?"

"I cannot tell you now," I answered steadily.

He fell back, suddenly, swiftly, self-controlled once more.

"Supposing I did intend to question Eastacres on this particular matter. Why should you try to stop me?"

"Because," I came quite close, looking up at him with earnest, pleading eyes, "I feel for you, as a woman of my age can feel for a man of yours. Because I'm sorry for you, and regret the brilliant future you have let slip by. Is it so difficult to believe in my sincerity?"

"You are more than good," he said courteously.

I threw out my hands with a gesture of appeal. "You make it very hard for me, Stanley. Surely it is not more difficult for a woman of fashion to do a kindness than an injury?"

"Come," he said smiling, "let us be more definite. Why am I not to see the Duke to-night?"

"You suspect him of being concerned in Sheila's disappearance," I returned. "Once let him know your suspicion and he will do his best to thwart you. Leave it to me."

He stopped me with a gesture.

"The thing is impossible," he said sternly; "I think we had better drop the discussion." He gazed at me with keen scrutinising eyes and I felt myself turn cold. For the moment I was at a loss what next to do. It was evident unless I played a bolder and stronger game, I should make no impression upon Forbes. He would meet the Duke, a scene, a scandal would result, and then——

Suddenly an inspiration seized me. I took a desperate resolve.

"Stanley," I cried, "you doubt me, doubt my sincerity. I'm going to prove it beyond the shadow of a doubt. You suspect that Eastacres induced your cousin to leave home. I don't suspect—I know."

I faced him in the moonlight, watching him with half fearful eyes. He was so strong, so keen, so ruthless an examiner that I had need to fear. I was no match for him in fence of tongue.

"You know it?" he turned upon me fiercely.

"I swear it," I answered trembling, and shrank before the agony upon his face.

He turned aside with a muttered oath. The news had given him quite a blow, and he reeled under its force.

"The hound, the cur," he cried, and his arm instinctively shot out. "God, that a thing like that——" He paused. I think the image of the fair young girl, the Sheila whom he had so fondly loved, stayed the words upon his lips. The truth came home to him with crushing force. The truth that she in whom he had believed, as men believe in God, was after all unworthy. Pity he had for her, the victim of a sensualist's vanity, the dupe of a base man's art, but, for the moment, pity was swept aside. His shrine was empty, his idol fallen to the ground; he was immersed in sorrow for himself.

"You know where she is to be found?" he said at last.

"I do."

"Then tell me." And he flashed a look stern, and compelling, at my face.

"Not now," I answered. "No," as he made a gesture of impatience, "I'm not to be moved in this particular. If I give you her address to-night, what will happen? Indignation will work upon you, until in a sudden rage you fall upon the Duke."

"That," he replied, "will take place in any case. To-night's as good a time as any."

"I beg your pardon, it would be the worst possible time. You must have some consideration for me, Stanley. I cannot give you the source of my information. I must not, I dare not. Were you to insist on seeing Eastacres to-night my name would inevitably crop up. Besides, there's another and a stronger reason. Eastacres could easily put you off the scent. He could cable to your cousin to leave her present address. A few kind words would even now bring her to his side."

"No more," he said fiercely, "you have said enough on that score. Now tell me, if you please, exactly what you know about my cousin?"

His emotion had cooled down; he was once more the cold, stern, legal expert, trained to weigh each word. He had the reputation of being the most invincible cross-examiner at the Bar. Small wonder therefore, that I felt my courage oozing from me. I simply could not stand the ordeal of a rigid cross-examination.

For the moment I felt a hysterical desire to confess that I know nothing, that I had been fooling him all the time; anything was better than this awful strain. The next, however, I had pulled myself together.

"If you don't mind, Stanley," I said softly, "I'd rather not. It goes against me to talk about the poor girl. I am too sorry for her to care to speak about it. After all, the chief thing you want is her address. She will tell you her own story, when she sees you. That address," I caught my breath as I uttered the tarradiddle, "that address I will give you in the morning, on condition that you will not seek an interview with the Duke to-night."

"Very well, I will let him alone until to-morrow. You will not fail me; whatever happens I shall have the address?"

"You shall," I answered strangling an incipient scream. Heavens! what an awful predicament was mine, if, after all, the Duke was innocent of Sheila's disappearance!

If I had been mistaken and he did not know the address—I shuddered at the prospect, and conjured up visions of the K.C.'s wrath should I fail to keep my word.

Still, it was more than likely Eastacres was the man. Intuition told me so, and intuition is a very valuable guide. Even if my scheme miscarried I should have made a brave bid for success. As time went on, I grew more and more anxious to arrange a marriage between Belinda and the Duke. The horrors of a penniless old age pressed heavily upon me. My health was not so good as it had been, the loss of my fortune had made inroads on my strength. If only I could succeed in getting the girl off my hands securely tied up to a title I could face the future with equanimity.

Digitized by Google

I was fighting almost for dear life. I could not be expected to be nice in the choice of weapons.

Stanley and I returned in silence to the hotel. He thanked me gravely for my assistance, and arranged to see me next morning at nine o'clock.

It was now close on half-past ten; only the matter of an hour or two before I went to bed, and in those two hours Sheila Kenwyn's hiding-place must be discovered.

The Duke greeted me in the vestibule of the hotel.

"The truant has returned, Lady Peggy," he said, laughing. "Miss North withstood the temptation of a visit to the Bedouins and is here."

"My dear child," I exclaimed, embracing Belinda with effusion, "you have given me an awful fright. Come upstairs and tell me where you've been." I slipped my hand in hers, hoping to get her out of the way without attracting Stanley's notice.

As I might have guessed, however, he was too quick for me.

"If I'm not much mistaken," he said, advancing to Belinda, "you're Hardy North's daughter? I thought so," as she eagerly affirmed the statement. "I know your father quite well, Miss North. I met him last year in the States. He'd run over to New York on business. Did he not mention my name—Stanley Forbes?"

"Of course," Belinda cried. "He said lots about you. Please come and tell me all about the time you spent together."

Nothing loth, Stanley followed the girl into the billiard-room—Belinda eschewed drawing-rooms and other places where women most do congregate on the ground that they depressed her!

It was an annoying thing to have happened. Stanley was the last person whom I should have chosen to hear Belinda's confidences, but to interfere would serve no end. Stanley would not be ruled by me twice in an evening.

I seized the occasion for a talk with Eastacres. We settled ourselves by the window in the blue drawing-room, overlooking the Pyramids. The room was a large one; sheltered by the curtains—imagine curtains in the desert!—we could have our talk out undisturbed.

I motioned him to a seat beside me on the couch. Then without sign or warning launched a bombshell at his head.

"Duke," I said abruptly, "where is Sheila Kenwyn?"

Not by so much as a quiver of his pale, smooth face did he betray surprise. He answered calmly in his usual level tones, "I really cannot tell you, Lady Peggy."

His assumption of innocence would have delighted me on any other occasion. This evening it merely served to irritate me.

"As to that," I returned, "I know better. Let me tell you, Duke, this is no smiling matter. I must ask you to hear my questions with respect. The issue is a grave one, it affects you deeply. How deeply you will understand when I tell you that on that issue hangs your engagement to Belinda."

He gazed at me somewhat mystified.

"My dear lady," he said quietly, "if you would be just a little more explanatory. What has Miss North to do with—with the young lady you mention?"

"A very great deal," I returned brusquely. "Are you aware, Duke, that you have narrowly escaped a most unpleasant scene to-night? Do you know what Stanley Forbes would have said, and done, had I not come between you?"

"You speak in enigmas," he repeated. "Forbes and I went out for a stroll and a chat. Your arrival interrupted our conversation. That's the history of the whole matter, so far as I'm concerned."

For a moment a wild, an awful fear, clutched at my heart. In the face of the Duke's demeanour it seemed impossible to doubt his innocence. No actor, however accomplished, could maintain such a calm, unruffled front, knowing all that was at stake. Fear, however, nerved me to another effort. I must discover Sheila's whereabouts. Who but the Duke could tell me?

"I have heard your version of the affair," I said, "now hear mine. Stanley Forbes suspects that you are responsible for his cousin's disappearance. I had it from himself. He is prepared to go to any lengths to prove your complicity, will stick at nothing to show your guilt. Only one thing will avert a scene, a scandal between you. And that is"—I paused—"that is Sheila's address."

I watched him closely as I spoke, seeking to read his secret in the calm, unsmiling face. But I was baffled—the narrowest scrutiny gave me no clue. And yet, and yet he must be guilty. In Heaven's name he must be guilty.

"No one dislikes a scene or deprecates a scandal more than I," he said at last; "but if Forbes forces an interview upon me, I cannot decline it."

At that I lost my patience. At this rate I might beat the air for hours and be no nearer what I wanted.

"You can and must," I said emphatically. "The interview will terminate in a scene, the scene will result in a scandal. The scandal"—I laid my hand upon his arm—"will put a stop immediately to any thought of marriage between you and Belinda."

I sat back as I finished, and had the satisfaction of seeing the Duke's face change at my words.

I had stung him at last and to some purpose. He rallied quickly, and returned once more to the charge.

"You set me an impossible task. Consider, how am I persistently to elude this man? If I don't see him here I shall meet him in Cairo. It is only postponing the evil day, how can it be put off for ever?"

I gazed at him steadily.

"By giving me the girl's address," I answered quietly. "Once he has that, all thought of taking vengeance upon you will leave him, provided you are out of sight. Listen," I bent towards him, whispering in his ear. "Forbes knows you are the man, to-morrow he's bent on wresting the truth from you. Your chance, your only chance, is to give me the girl's address to-night. To-morrow early you must start for Cairo. I will see Forbes and send him off to Sheila. Do this and I will help your marriage with Belinda to my uttermost. Refuse——" I stopped significantly.

And then there came a pause—a pause that set me on the rack, midway between hope and fear. I waited in an agony; his next words would clinch the issue one way or the other. At that moment a curious look came into his eyes; he stroked his fair moustache, and seemed to hesitate. It was as though——

"Duke," I said softly, "give me the address. I don't want to know any details of the business. I don't care whether or not you are responsible for Sheila's disappearance—that's beside the point. It doesn't matter what you've done so long as people don't suspect it."

"What do you promise me—in exchange," he said slowly. "Supposing——"

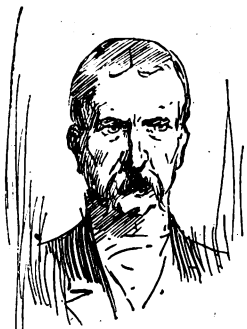
"Have done with that," I cried excitedly. "Answer me 'yes' or 'no.' Have you the address?"

A second he wavered, then low but distinct the answer came.

"I have."

With a sigh of relief I sank back wearily against the cushions. The battle was over, I had won!

Digitized by Google



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

After a pause he took a card from his pocket-book and scribbled an address.

"She was there a month ago," he said carelessly, "and as I haven't heard I suppose she's still there."

I glanced curiously at the card. It contained the name of a villa in a small village in Italy, hidden away among the Alps. The name sent my thoughts into the past. I recalled the fair, sweet Irish girl as I had first seen her. A tall slip of a girl, with big dark eyes and a lovely Irish smile. It was a pity, yes, a cruel pity. I turned my eyes upon the Duke. Serene and undisturbed, no memories of the poor girl grieved him, no thought of the girl whose life he had ruined troubled him. It would, I thought, have been more decent could he assume a little shame. At that moment I felt that I disliked him. But after all it was no affair of mine. The girl had only paid the price of her own foolishness. Still I was sorry.

The Duke broke in upon my musing.

"I understand I am to leave for Cairo about eight to-morrow morning," he said, smiling. "It's an early hour, still I'll contrive to manage it. Forbes you are going to tackle by yourself—awfully good of you. And now"—he glanced hard at me—"what of Belinda?"

"Belinda will go with you," I said. "She will revel at the prospect of an early morning ride. Once you are at the Continental, the Duchess, I am sure, will take my place and chaperon her until I return. I shall be back in the evening. Duke"—I tapped him lightly on the shoulder—"it's time something definite was settled between you and Belinda."

"It's a little early to speak yet, I think," he returned.

I shook my head.

"Under other circumstances, perhaps, but as we are placed delay is dangerous; at any moment some interfering woman with a garrulous tongue may come and tell Belinda fairy tales about your past. And such tales would take effect. You must speak to her to-morrow evening. If you win her consent freely so much the better. If not——" I paused. "Girls are foolish!" I murmured. "Belinda is no wiser than the rest. She is tender-hearted, and if you are distressed she will say something kind—you might put a more favourable construction on the words and——"

Our eyes met. Under his fair moustache his thin lips curled with a smile— a cruel, cold smile, that augured ill for Belinda.

"And now," he said, "one other question. Have you gathered anything as to Mr. North's intentions as to his daughter's dowry?"

I smiled.

"There'd be no difficulty as to that," I answered. "Whatever his prospective son-in-law likes to ask the Australian will be glad to grant. A duke can name his own price."

"A thousand thanks. And now, perhaps, I'd better say good-night?"

I cordially agreed with him; it would have been folly to risk a meeting with Stanley. I was just about to follow the Duke's example and retire myself when a really terrible thing happened.

With dress disordered, face haggard, and eyes fearful to see, so wild were they, Mrs. Murchison-Lee staggered across the threshold of the room.

In a second I realised what had happened. I had been so engrossed in my conversation with the Duke that Midge had slipped from my mind. It was now some hours since I had abstracted the hypodermic syringe, and she was suffering for the lack of it. I saw at a glance that unless she had an injection of morphia immediately the consequences would be serious, if not fatal. She had all but reached the limit of human endurance, her agony was distressing to witness. She seemed unable to breathe, a leaden pallor overcast her face, from which all look of youth had vanished. She was a wreck, mental, moral and physical, such a wreck as morphia maniacs eventually become.

She walked unsteadily to the middle of the room, with feverish glances left and right. Catching sight of me she strove to speak, but only a hoarse murmur came from her lips. Then, with a sudden collapse, she fell, and lay inert and helpless upon the floor.

Immediately there was a hubbub. The women gathered round the unfortunate Midge cackling like a lot of geese, far more concerned to look at than to help her. As for me, I flew upstairs and did not pause for breath until I found the syringe and the morphia. Grasping them tightly in my hand I re-entered the drawing-room. Time was flying, minutes were precious, each second of delay was dangerous. For one heart-sickening moment I thought I was too late. I had delayed too long; she would die for lack of the drug.

The room swam before me, my hand shook, I was within an ace of giving way. The sight of Stanley and Belinda, who had just come upon the scene, gave me courage. He was a strong man used to handle crises with decision.

"Get these women out of the way!" I said hurriedly. "She is suffering from want of morphia. Clear the room, lock the door, and I'll give her an injection."

In a minute the room was silent; empty, save for Stanley, Belinda and Lord Davenant, who, poor boy, was standing terror-stricken at Midge's side. She was looking more than ever ghastly, and at sight of her the sense of apprehension at my heart was like a heavy weight.

Trembling I slipped up her sleeve—the round white arm was already disfigured with innumerable punctures—and just above the elbow inserted the needle; and then, breathless, waited the result.

What if she should die—if the victim of this fashionable form of drug-taking should pay the penalty of her habit? What if it should be discovered that I had abstracted the morphia?

A thousand thoughts and pictures hurried through my brain. And through them all the white face of the girl—she was but little more—rose before me. Here in my hand was the secret of her wonderful vivacity, her flow of spirits, her brightness and her charm; the leaden pallor, the look of age, the torpidity of nerve and will, each was part of the price she had to pay.

The blue eyes suddenly opened and gazed into mine. I gave a sigh of relief and rose quickly to my feet. After that the morphia quickly took effect. Her face grew fair and round once more, the pretty pink flooded her cheeks, she was again the dainty and bewitching Midge.

But though her looks recovered tone, her nerves did not so quickly respond to the action of the drug. Catching sight of Reg she started to her feet, and, with an hysterical cry, clasped him by the arm.

"Reg," she cried piteously, "you have been so unkind to me! I've suffered cruelly, all because of you." Then, as he made no response, she fell to crying, weeping with the ease and unrestraint of a little child. "Say you're fond of me," she insisted. "Tell me you care more for me than anybody else." It was awkward for young Davenant, and under the circumstances he behaved very well. He soothed her as far as she would permit herself to be soothed, and strove to quieten the terrible sobs that choked her utterance. But for all that it was easy to see he was putting constraint upon himself. The scene filled him with disgust; her tears, which once would have plunged him in distress, annoyed and irritated him. In brief, he was no more in love with Midge. Belinda had commenced, and morphia had finished his disillusionment.

With a woman's intuition Midge realised this was so. She turned furiously upon Belinda.

"You've done this!" she said. "You've taken him from me, you cruel girl!"

Digitized by Google

"Don't be absurd!" replied Belinda promptly. "I don't care that for Lord Davenant!" and she snapped her fingers inelegantly but with emphasis in Reggie's face. "You wouldn't either, if you had any sense," she continued. "Come," she put her arm protectingly about the other's waist, "I'm going to take you to bed. You'll feel better in the morning."

Yielding to persuasion, Midge allowed herself to be led away, and the strangely-assorted pair—the young girl and the flighty matron—went off together.

"It's awful!" groaned Reggie, as the door shut behind them. "I shall never forget it. How can a woman make such a spectacle of herself?"

I shrugged my shoulders in reply. Most Society women use morphia nowadays, as Reggie knew quite well. Few are such fools as to give themselves away, as Midge had done.

Before I went to bed that night I arranged for Belinda to accompany the Duke to Cairo the following day. As I expected, she was charmed with the idea, and I had the satisfaction of seeing the two start together as arranged just before eight o'clock next morning.

They were still in sight when Stanley Forbes presented himself. I handed him Sheila Kenwyn's address without more ado.

"You will start at once, I suppose?" said I.

"After I have seen the Duke," he returned.

I smiled and drew him to the window.

"You'll need to hurry if you want to overtake him, Stanley. Look!" and I pointed to the specks against the sky-line—Belinda and Eastacres—fast vanishing from the horizon.

"Who's the girl?" he asked laconically.

"Belinda North," I answered. "She went with the Duke this morning. At her own request, not mine," I added, reading the question in his eyes.

"There's no suggestion of marriage between that fellow and Belinda?" he asked incredulously.

"That's for Belinda to decide—no one else will have a voice in the matter," I said earnestly. "Her father gives the girl her own way absolutely."

He seemed to hesitate, then with a shrug turned from the window.

"If that's so," he said, "it's all right. Belinda's not likely to be taken in by a man like Eastacres. If I thought there was the least danger I'd follow her now and warn her. As it is I needn't trouble; she can take care of herself. I shall start at once for Italy; the Duke can wait till I come back."

With a smile I wished him all success. I was most relieved to see the last of him.

I returned to Cairo by myself; the rest of the party were remaining at the Mena for a day or two. I arrived at the Continental about eight, and slipped quietly upstairs to my sitting-room. There was a sound of voices within—the Duke's and Belinda's. With some dexterity I noiselessly turned the handle of the door, opened it, and gazed into the room.

And what I saw therein filled me with great rejoicing!

The Duke who had just finished speaking, was gazing earnestly into Belinda's face. Her head was drooping, her face flushed. To any other girl I should have applied the epithet "shy" in describing the state of her feelings, but Belinda, I believe, was a stranger to the sensation.

Turning towards Eastacres she spoke few words in a low voice—words that I did not catch. Then with a charming gesture—a gesture of encouragement—stretched out her hand and laid it in the Duke's. He pressed it closely, stepped forward—and the next instant clasped Belinda in his arms!

[This series of articles has already created a great sensation amongst readers of SHORT STORIES. The insight which it gives into the manner in which those in the "Smart Set" spend (and often waste) their lives has amazed those who are fortunate enough to belong to the great Middle Class. Although names have for obvious reasons been altered, the facts are absolutely correct, and the statements made are in no way exaggerated.—Ed. S.S.]

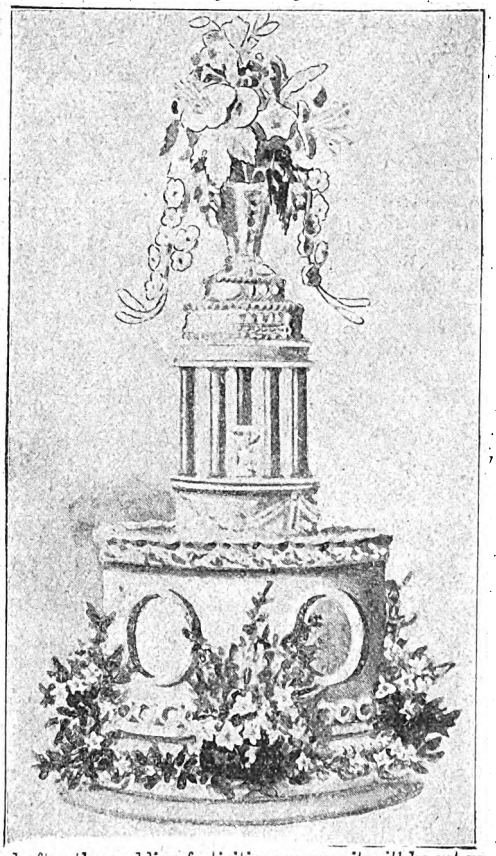
THE BEAUTIFUL BRIDE-CAKE

that we shall divide amongst 101 readers.

The lovely ornament at the top will go to one reader—perhaps you.

Miss Madge Morris will be married on Tuesday, December 2nd.

We shall purchase a big wedding-cake for Miss Morris,



and after the wedding festivities are over it will be cut up, put into boxes, and sent to certain readers of the paper.

Altogether, a hundred delicious pieces of cake will be sent out.

Moreover, the beautiful centre ornament from the top of the cake will also be offered as a prize.

The conditions under which you will be entitled to receive a piece are as follows:

All you have to do is to sit down and write a short congratulatory letter to Miss Morris on the auspicious occasion of her marriage. The reader who sends what Miss Morris considers to be the best letter will receive the beautiful centre ornament from the top, and the senders of each of the next hundred best will receive a piece of the cake.

Send your attempt to Miss Madge Morris, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., marking the envelope "Wedding" in the top left-hand corner, to arrive not later than Monday, December 1st.

Digitized by Google

THE CAPITULATION OF CELIA.

A Tale of a Quarrel.

"Did I tell you that I had asked auntie to come here, Len?"

"No, you certainly did not," replied Leonard Vancourt, his forehead lowering into a frown, as he helped himself to a second piece of toast. "Might I inquire which of the two is going to afford us the delirious delight of her presence. Clarissa the saturnine, or Amelia the magpie imitator?"

"Len!" The delicately-traced eyebrows were raised in indignant expostulation. "I think that it is particularly unkind of you to speak in that manner of my relations. You used to say that aunt Amelia was a shrewd business woman."

"I would be the last to deny her that qualification, Celia," remarked Vancourt grimly. "It was positively a stroke of genius the way the old reptile—ahem—lady, palmed off on to me that property in Southwark. Fifteen houses, my dear, with only rudimentary drainage and a hungry County Council waiting on me to render the same effective. Aunt Amelia ought to have been a company promoter. Egad, she would have made her fortune at the game, my respected aunt-in-law has it in her bones. Where is the Daily Express?"

Celia's lip commenced to quiver.

"I think that you are horrid, Len," she vouchsafed at length, glancing reproachfully at her husband, who suddenly became immersed in the money market column of the paper, which he had discovered under the table.

"I must say that I think you are particularly unkind to speak of my relations in the way you always do! You should not forget, dear, that aunt Clarissa has been more than a mother to me, and brought me up since I was a tiny tot; the first time you ever met me, Len, was at her house."

"I know," replied Vancourt casually. "But if it hadn't been for Gus Harrington taking me to Rutland Gate I should never have seen either of you. I remember the evening well. I took an instinctive dislike to your respected, more than a mother of an aunt! A feeling incidentally which has intensified ever since."

"You used to say that you were very fond of her—before we were married, Len."

Vancourt coughed, drily.

"I was diplomatic, Celia," he said quietly, as, laying aside his paper, he buttered a piece of toast. "You see, as I could only see you in her house, I was obliged, in a sort of way, to hold the candle to the—your aunt."

"She was very fond of you, Len." Celia Vancourt's eyes were bent reproachfully on his.

"Ahem! That was very kind of her, dear. You see, Celia, I had shekels; in London Society I was considered rather a decent match, at the time I married you." His accent was irritatingly sardonic.

"Do you mean to insinuate that aunt Clarissa liked you because you were well off and had a house in Park Lane?" demanded Celia, her face flushing an angry pink.

"Aunt Amelia did, anyway," smiled Vancourt unfeelingly. "My spare cash made her Southwark property boom in a manner which brought a smile to her face! She had me on toast, Celia."

She rapped her knife impatiently on the immaculate damask. "Leonard," she remarked with dignity. "I would have you remember that you are speaking of my relations."

"I have no desire to rob you of their ownership, dear," remarked Vancourt; then added, as he commenced his breakfast in real earnest, "I wish to goodness that you would manage to see that we get bacon for breakfast that is not salty enough to skin the inside of one's mouth. I don't believe that the tradesmen would dare to sell such abominable meat to anybody else but us."

Celia's face grew tearful looking, as she poured herself out a cup of tea; then, glancing across the table at the sombrely annoyed features of her husband, said irritably:

"I never met such a growling man as you are in my life! The moment anything puts you out, you quarrel with your food. Goodness knows, I am fanciful enough, but I don't find this bacon a bit salty."

"Of course not! It is quite sufficient for me to say that it is for you to declare the contrary," said Vancourt angrily. "I never met such a contradictory woman as you are in the whole course of my existence. I am just about sick of it!"

"And I am tired to death of you and your grumbling," retorted Celia, flushing with anger: "Everything that I do is wrong. I can't make out what on earth made you marry me!"

"Because I was a victim to the throes of drivelling lunacy, that's why," said Vancourt savagely. "I wish now that I had never set eyes on you. Why, ever since my marriage I have never known what it is to have a decent breakfast! If I don't get a high egg, I get salt bacon which a sailor would kick at, and if I get neither of those two things I have a piece of fish which would disgrace an East End cook shop put in front of me!"

He sniffed indignantly, as, turning in his chair, he picked up his discarded paper and, flattening it out angrily, commenced to read its contents.

"Very well, Leonard," said Celia, dignity struggling with tears for mastery in her voice. "Since you are as sorry to have ever met me as I am to have ever come across you I will ask aunt Clarissa when she comes here——"

"I tell you she isn't coming here!" interrupted Vancourt peremptorily. "I won't have the old cat in the house—so there! I'm master here, kindly remember."

"And I am mistress!" retorted Celia. "So aunt Clarissa shall come and——"

"What?"

"And when she does I—I—shall tell her that—how unkind you are—and—and ask her to take me away," continued Celia in a faltering voice, unheeding his interruption. "I—I never—want to see you again—I hate you!"

"Oh, very well, then." Vancourt rose with as much dignity as he could assume. "As such is the case, and since I am not allowed to be master of my own house, we had better separate amicably. I, for one, shall be very pleased to be freed from a nagging woman!"

"And I, from a—brute!"

"That is a question of opinion," remarked Vancourt easily. "I have been asked by Carstairs to go for a cruise, and as his yacht leaves Southampton the day after to-morrow I may as well go with him, until I have decided what I will do. Of course, I shall leave you the house—I will clear out." He crossed the room to the door, adding, as he opened it, "There will be enough money paid into your account to satisfy your requirements." Then, without awaiting a reply, he closed the door behind him, Celia gazing half disconsolately, half defiantly, at the vacant chair on the other side of the table.

Vancourt had not been gone long, before he returned, dressed in faultless style, a Raglan over his arm and a bowler in his hand.

Digitized by Google

"Well, I'll say good-bye," he said lightly, extending his hand to his wife. "I've told Job to pack up my duds and to bring them to me at the Carlton. I shall be stopping there till to-morrow morning, when I shall leave for Southampton."

"I see."

"We shall be cruising about the Mediterranean for about two months," he continued, eyeing his wife covertly as he spoke. "After which I may go to South Africa for a few months to do some big game shooting."

"You will enjoy yourself, I hope," said Celia, placing her slim hand in his. "Of course, if we ever meet in Society we need not be dead cuts, need we, Leonard?"

Her deep blue eyes were raised almost wistfully to his.

"Of course not," he said with a strained laugh, as, pressing her cold hand in his, he went towards the door. "Addio, little woman, it is a pity that we could not get on better. However, it is best that we should go our several ways, don't you think so?"

"Yes, it is! Good-bye." Her voice faded away into a whisper, adding quaveringly to herself as the door closed behind her husband, "he might have kissed me before he went. I don't think that—he minded leaving me and I—I—oh, I don't care!" she cried angrily, dashing away the tears which had gathered on her lashes. "If he had tried to kiss me, I'd have slapped his face for him! I hate Leonard, and now that I am free I shall be as happy as——"

The harsh clang of the hall door below caused her to stop abruptly. For a moment Celia stood silent, then, sinking on to a sofa, she buried her fluffy head amid a bevy of cushions, and cried as if her heart would break.

"He's gone!" she muttered in a strangled voice, broken by sobs. "And—I made—sure that he would come—back."

Meanwhile, outside in the street, Leonard Vancourt hailed a hansom, and, stepping into it, was soon bowling in the direction of the Carlton. "I am afraid that I have made a fool of myself," he soliloquised. "I made sure that she would have stopped me before I left the house; of course, it's all most unearthly rot to think for a moment that I could live without my little Celia. A day would be bad enough, but two months—I have half a mind to turn back and say that I was only bluffing, only I should look such an ass if I did. I might have kissed her before I left, though! Poor little girlie, she half raised her face to mine when I said good-bye and—oh, I am going to chuck this fool's game and shall toddle back, and she can stodge me with high eggs and salt bacon as much as she jolly well likes if she will only take me on again, Cabby, I——"

His sentence was never finished, for, as he pushed open the trapdoor above his head, the pole of a brewer's dray crashed into the side of the hansom.

* * * * *

When Leonard Vancourt came to his senses it was to find himself swathed in bandages lying in bed in a darkened and familiar room, whilst curled up beside him on the immaculate counterpane, sat Celia, her slim fingers cooling his fevered brow.

"Hullo, girlie," he exclaimed, with a weak attempt at hilarity. "I haven't gone after all, you see."

"Are you sorry, Len, that such is not the case?" she queried gently, nestling her tear-stained cheek against his.

"Would you mind, dearest—I mean—Celia—if I said that I was glad?" he asked slowly.

"Mind! Oh, Len, you are the dearest boy in all the world!" she cried, impulsively. "I thought that you would have come back, and when I found that you did not I just sat down and wrote to the Carlton to ask you to, dear."

"And I hoped that you would call me back, Celia," he said delightedly. "And when I found that you did not, girlie, I thought that I would just come back and say that you might do any mortal thing you jolly well liked, if you would only take me on again, Celia."

She passed her hand caressingly over his cheek.

"Call me girlie," she whispered happily. "You know, dearest, how I hate Celia."

"I don't," Vancourt replied fondly. "I love her better than the whole world! Kiss me, girlie."

H. Morton Baird.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

November 25.—If the birthday falls on this day the next twelve months will be favourable for business and speculation; good for literary people. Girls will find love affairs run smoothly; a good year to marry.

The day is promising for buying and selling, dealing with professional men, writing letters and signing agreements.

A child born to-day will be generous, cheerful, and fortunate. Would do well as a broker, in the church, or any profession.

November 26.—A mixed year; health will need attention; some annoyance in business. Good for young people, but not for the aged.

Girls will have many crosses in love affairs, and need care against deceit.

The day is evil for most matters. Don't ask favours; defer doing business with farmers, landlords and elderly people.

A child born here will be changeable, over cautious, but will possess good mental abilities.

November 27.—Give attention to business through the next year; avoid quarrels and law. Bereavement is likely.

Young girls will have more than usual attentions from opposite sex, and if engaged they marry.

The day is favourable for asking favours; dealing with shipping agents, drapers, and those in authority. Beware of mishaps.

A child born here will be cheerful, active and proud.

November 28.—An active year, but not very promising for business and financial matters. Avoid speculation and too much pleasure. Girls will find love matters slow and dull.

The day is not good for making changes; better to sell than buy; go quietly.

A child born to-day will be unfortunate in most things. Will be active and ingenious, but too free with money.

November 29.—An active and prosperous year is shown to be in store for those whose birthdays fall to-day. Pleasant events in domestic circle.

Girls become engaged or marry.

The day is good for most things; write letters and sign agreements; marry, visit, and make new friends.

A child born to-day will be affectionate, generous, and clever, perhaps too fond of pleasure and society.

November 30.—An active and fortunate year for business and finances; beware of heavy colds, and keep the temper under control.

Pleasant events for girls in courtship; if engaged they will have opportunities of marriage.

A child born here will be fortunate, though the health will need some care in early and latter years. A happy marriage is promised.

December 1.—A year of change and uncertainty; avoid speculation; insure against fire and accident. Be cautious in business.

Girls need care in love affairs; those born near 10 p.m. meet with deceit and anxiety.

The day is one on which to let others make the first move. Beware of mishap in the early morning. Place little faith in promising speculations or news.

A child born here will be rash, unsettled, and will travel much. Will be liable to accidents.

Asturel.

Colonel Jim.

What a Man Did for a Woman's Sake.

It was the smoke-room of the "Cosmopolitan" Club in Piccadilly.

I had strolled in for the want of something better to do, and without any thought or idea of anything or anybody.

There were only about half a dozen members present, to one only of whom—Charlie Maxwell; in his pre-nuptial days an inveterate globe-trotter as I myself still was—I was personally known.

I just nodded to him, as I saw that he was engaged in conversation with an individual whom I never remembered to have seen at the club before.

Though he was sitting back in the depths of a big armchair, I gathered that he was tall and athletically built. His hair and heavy moustache were snowy white, yet his features had that look of perpetual youth about them which some men retain to the close even of patriarchal life.

But it was not so much the wonderful youthfulness of the man (I reckoned him to be at least sixty years of age) as the almost womanly expression of tenderness in his eyes that attracted me. It did not detract one iota from his manliness; it simply supplied the one thing necessary to make that manliness perfect and complete.

I was on the point of leaving when there entered the room a man for whom I, in common with most of the club members, had an unmitigated dislike.

Coarse of speech, ostentatiously vulgar in his manner, and, in fact, an absolute "impossible" from the social point of view, it was a perennial source of wonder with everybody how he could ever have been admitted to "Cosmopolitan" membership.

It was rumoured that he was the millionaire son of a deceased East-end "ready-made" tailor of Semitic descent, and that he owed his admission amongst us to the largely exerted influence of a certain impecunious peer, his great friend, and one of the original promoters of the club.

The truth of this could not be exactly proved, although after events showed that for once rumour did not act up to its reputation for lying.

Almost immediately after this very estimable individual's entrance—his name, by the way, was Marcus Dischman—my friend Maxwell came across to where I stood looking out of the window into Piccadilly, and shook hands, asking me to excuse him for ten minutes, and saying that he would have a chat with me on his return. Complete silence reigned in the room after Maxwell's departure, broken only by the rustle of newspapers or an occasional cough.

Then I was suddenly startled by the voice of Dischman, raised in loud altercation.

I turned sharply round, and saw that he was standing, straddle-legged, in front of the white-haired gentleman's chair, wagging his head and forefinger in time to a stream of angry abuse.

"You've monopolised that paper ever since I've been in the room, and for how long before, goodness only knows! Do you think you've bought the place, just because you've been in the Army!"

The occupant of the armchair rose up out of it to his full height of well over six feet, and calmly laid down the paper he had been reading on the table beside him.

It was then that I noticed for the first time that his right sleeve was empty, indicating the loss of his arm.

"Sir," he said, with quiet irony, "it is evident to me that you have not been in the Army, inasmuch as the officer invariably implies the gentleman."

The retort might have been injudicious, but it was certainly richly deserved.

Furious with passion Dischman extended his arm, and violently shook the empty sleeve pinned up to the lapel of the other's coat.

"You dare to taunt me! You!" he shrieked. "How came you by this? Not in battle! No! Do you think I have not heard of a certain gentleman's little affair with a certain young lady? The motor-car ride to Brighton!—too much champagne!—a spill!—and a smashed arm? Do you think I don't know? Bah! you got your deserts, Mr. Officer and gentleman!"

The rest of us thought it high time now to interfere, for the wretched cad was evidently contemplating further violence.

The matter, however, was suddenly taken out of our hands.

Unseen by me, Maxwell had come into the room, and had heard the frantic speech of Dischman's.

As the last word left the bully's mouth Maxwell's hand was on his collar, and his knuckles pressing uncomfortably upon his collar-bone.

Swinging the fellow round, he didn't speak to him, but summoning a waiter, bid him call the club secretary.

Held securely in Maxwell's grip, Dischman looked the picture of vulgar discomfiture.

"Mr. Shaw," said Maxwell to the secretary when he appeared, "I take the responsibility of demanding from you this man's instant expulsion. He has not only grossly insulted Colonel Fergusson, resorting even to personal violence, but by so doing on the club premises has insulted also every member of it. If you do not accede to my request, I, and I think every right-minded, and self-respecting member will immediately send in our resignations."

Maxwell slightly loosened his hold while addressing the secretary, enabling Dischman to shake himself free.

With one glance of scorching hate at his late captor, Dischman, not waiting for the secretary's decision, walked out of the room, and of the club, which latter he has never again entered since that day.

Colonel Fergusson, far from being upset or disturbed by what had occurred, had quietly resumed his seat and his paper.

"Talbot!" said Maxwell, "allow me to introduce you to Colonel James Fergusson, D.S.O., late Dragoon Guards; but known to all who love him as 'Colonel Jim.' Colonel, my old friend Archie Talbot, whom I haven't seen for all the years he has been wandering about the earth."

"Mr. Talbot, pleased to know you; though I warn you to take everything Charlie Maxwell has to say about me with a very large grain of salt."

If the man when silent was attractive, in conversation he was delightful. What I subsequently learnt about him from Maxwell, especially concerning one particular episode of his life, did not in the least surprise me; it simply served to perfect the picture of the noblest man and truest-hearted gentleman that it has ever been my lot to meet.

It was one evening—after a bachelor dinner at Maxwell's house—his wife being in Scotland on a family visit—that my friend told me the true story of the incident, in the course of which "Colonel Jim" had lost his arm, and as a result of which, he had to retire from the Service in the heyday of a most distinguished career.

"Perhaps you don't know," said Maxwell, "that Fergusson and I were in the same regiment. He was full Major when I joined as Second Lieutenant.

Digitized by Google

"Though there was a good fifteen years difference of age between us, we became staunch friends. Without being grand-motherly, Fergusson kept me from all sorts of tom-fooleries, such as hot-headed young officers are so apt to indulge in.

"Our Colonel was Harvey Fane, now a Major-General and a K.C.B., with a large family of daughters, and his house was an attractive centre for bachelor officers, eligible and ineligible.

"It was not long before I discovered that Beatrix Fane was more to me than all the other girls of my acquaintance.

"Very soon, too, I was successful in getting her assurance that I, in like manner, was the veritable 'fairy prince.'

"Of course, I confided in Colonel Jim, who, though sympathetic, advised a wise waiting until at anyrate I succeeded to the property, which I inherited six years ago.

"Attached to the regiment was a certain Captain Holroyd, who was said to be connected in some way with a monster firm of East-end clothiers. Anyway, he was very unpopular with all ranks.

"Quite accidentally I heard, the day after the recent affair at the Cosmopolitan, that Holroyd was Dischmann's cousin, hence the fact of the former's knowledge of what I am going to tell you about 'Colonel Jim.'

"This man Holroyd was an inveterate gambler, and nearly always won. It so happened that when I came into the Wharton estate there was a large accumulation of ready money which I immediately proceeded to spend in right royal style. Holroyd, ever on the scent for a pigeon to pluck, suddenly became very friendly with me, and one day invited me to pass a week with him at Brighton. Glad of a change, and having easily obtained leave, I left Aldershot with Holroyd without acquainting 'Colonel Jim' of my intention.

As a matter of fact, I knew perfectly well what would be his advice, and, therefore, I evaded it. I did not even tell Beattie, but wrote her on my arrival at Brighton.

All went well until the third day, except that I lost heavily at bridge to Holroyd, when, after a dinner to which Holroyd had invited two or three other men, we all adjourned for an hour's stroll on the pier.

"Whether it was that, being unused to excessive indulgence in wine, I had taken too much champagne, or whether I was seized with sudden illness, I cannot exactly say. I only know that by some unaccountable means I managed to fall from the pier into the sea, getting a nasty smack through coming into contact with one of the iron cross-girders.

"I remembered nothing more till I found myself alone in my Brighton lodging, wretchedly ill, and very much ashamed of myself.

"The doctor who attended me, a splendid fellow, told me that Holroyd had returned to Aldershot without troubling to find out my real condition.

"That night late, a further surprise was in store for me. Beattie, accompanied by Colonel Jim, the latter with a seriously injured arm, arrived at my diggings in Warrior Square.

"It was soon apparent that Colonel Jim was in a bad way, my doctor, after a brief examination of the injured arm, declaring that immediate amputation was necessary.

"All the time I was in absolute ignorance of how the accident had happened, or how it was that Beattie had come to Brighton in Colonel Jim's company.

"It was not until the operation was over, and Mrs. Fane who was wired for at once, had arrived to look after her wandering daughter, that I learnt the whole story from Beattie's lips.

"As some little explanation of what took place, let me say that both Colonel Fane and Colonel Jim were ardent motorists, each possessing a 12-horse-power Panhard, which they were eternally pitting the one against the other.

"Colonel Jim always drove his car himself, but Colonel Fane, not being so expert, employed a French chauffeur at fabulous wages.

"Well, it seems that the day before I recovered consciousness, my landlady, who, up to then, had no clue to the whereabouts of my friends, came across a letter of Beattie's while getting some clean linen for me out of my portmanteau. Without staying to think who the writer might be, she at once wrote to her, and, as it afterwards appeared, gave a very exaggerated account of my condition.

"When my landlady's letter arrived the Colonel's motor was waiting at the door for him on his return from parade.

"Without pause or thought, my foolish, loving little girl imperiously ordered the driver to set off for Brighton there and then, silencing his objections with threats of her father's displeasure if he disobeyed her.

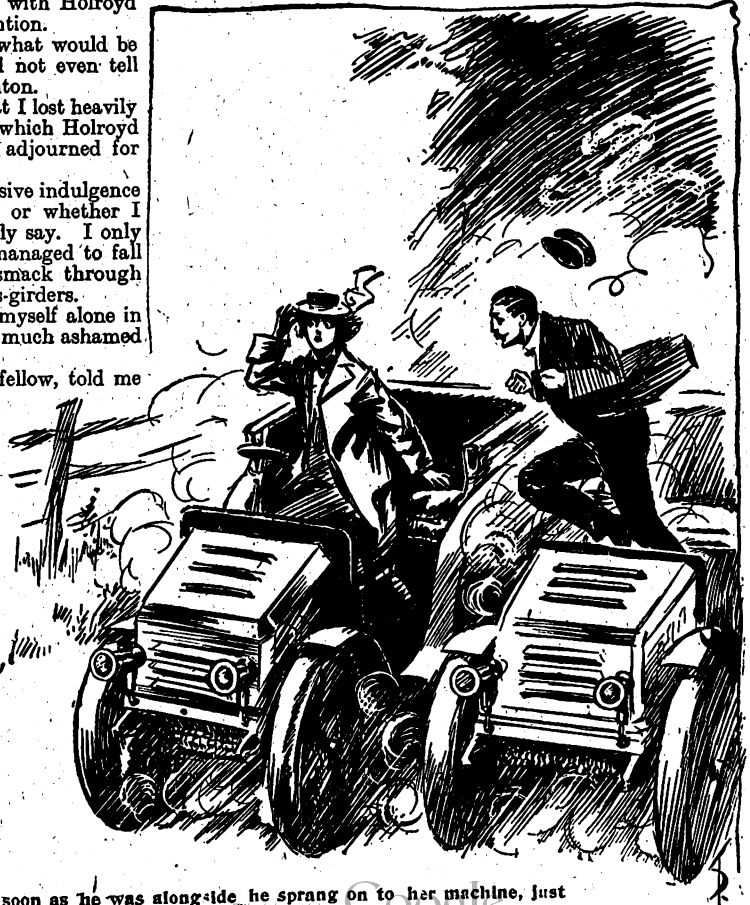
"Was there ever such a mad journey, a journey, too, at which her social world would hold up its hands in holy horror.

"On through Guildford, Tunbridge Wells, Horsham, till the outskirts of Lewes were reached. And there the trouble began.

"The chauffeur had insisted more than once on descending at certain inns, and refreshing himself with brandy.

"By the time Lewes was in sight the man was in a state of semi-intoxication, and was quite incapable of controlling the machine.

"Chancing to turn her head at this point, Beattie saw coming up behind them at racing speed half a mile or so



As soon as he was alongside he sprang on to her machine, just in time to avert a catastrophe.

Digitized by Google

astern, another motor, which, even at that distance, seemed strangely familiar to her.

"Nearer and nearer it drew, the stupefied Frenchman in charge of the leading car becoming more and more unable to steer it.

"It was at a bend in the road that the catastrophe happened.

"On the right hand was a high bank, and into this the driver made to run Beattie's car.

"By a miracle of mercy he could not turn the steering-wheel, overbalancing himself, and falling out under the wheels in front, which passed over his body.

"Though bewildered and panic-stricken, Beattie caught hold of the gear with both trembling hands, and tried to keep the car straight. What would have been the result of her efforts it is hard to say, though it is almost morally certain that in the streets of Lewes she would inevitably have come to grief.

"Now for Colonel Jim's part in it.

"Putting on the pace for a final spurt, he raced alongside of the runaway, managed to stop his own machine at the same moment leaping on to the other one.

"Seizing the steering-wheel with his left hand—his right arm was broken on the leap—he wrenched it round, and brought the car to a full stop.

"Then appeared the representative of the law, who, running back, discovered that the chauffeur was fatally injured.

"The rest you know, though there is one little thing more which I will tell you in confidence, as it renders, from my point of view, all that Colonel Jim did that day the more heroic.

"Beattie told me, more than a year after we were married, that some words that escaped her rescuer's lips as he reached her side in the flying car, convinced her beyond all doubt that he loved her, and that he risked his life for the sake of a woman whom he knew had given her heart to another man.

"How Colonel Jim came to follow after Beattie was owing to a servant at the house, who overheard her orders to the chauffeur, telling him, as he drove up in his own machine almost directly afterwards and inquired for her. He knew that her action would compromise her with her friends and society, and, in her interests, decided to persuade her to come back.

"Of course the dear old fellow had to leave the Service, though he has since got his step on the retired list. Now, what do you think of him, Talbot?"

"Think of him?" I said, "Why, that for a man among men, I never expect to meet another like 'Colonel Jim!'"

"As you certainly never will!" said Maxwell, raising his glass. "Here's to Colonel Jim, and God bless him!"

Ralph Enderby.

"I NOTICE that you always sit at your wife's left, Mr. Meggs." "Yes," frankly returned Mr. Megs; "that's the side her glass eye is on."

CLARA: "I suppose you have heard that Charley Bigrolle and I don't speak, haven't you?" Maud: "Why, no. What was the trouble?" Clara: "It was all my dress-maker's fault. She forgot to take the pins out of my waist-band."

ANXIOUS MOTHER: "I wish, Susan, that when you give baby a bath you would use the thermometer so as to ascertain whether the water is at the proper temperature." Susan: "Oh, don't you worrit about that, ma'am; I don't need no 'mometers. If the little one turns red, the water's too hot; if it turns blue, it's too cold; that's all there is about it."

MISS PASTELLE: "It's too bad! I love you, and I've promised to marry you, and yet there isn't a bit of romance about it. You have never even once saved my life." Adorer: "I haven't, eh? Don't you remember the time you first saw me?" Miss Pastelle: "Yes; I was walking down the avenue, and you passed me on your bicycle." Adorer: "Yes, and I rang the bell for you to get out of the way, didn't I?"

SPECIAL OFFER TO SCOTCH READERS.
See below.

Have You Won a Gramophone Yet?

No! Then Why Not Try To-day?

We are extremely anxious that a goodly proportion of our readers shall become possessed of some substantial reminder of the little paper which comes out every Tuesday, and, perhaps, no more amusing and entertaining gift could be made than that of a Gramophone.

The award of a Gramophone is particularly appropriate just now, as the season of Christmas parties is so close upon us, when the instruments would prove a refreshing variation to the usual indoor games.

With each instrument is given two records, and any reader who has been lucky enough to win one will tell you that they are prizes well worth the winning.

What You Have to Do to Win One.

You must construct an anagram from the words, "The Albert Gate Mystery," the title of the splendid new serial story which commences in a fortnight's time in this paper. That is to say, you must construct a sentence of the letters contained in that title, using every letter, but not more often than the letters appear in the title.

All attempts must be made on the backs of post-cards, which should be marked. Albert Gate, and addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Gramophone will be awarded to each of the ten competitors whose sentences are the best in the Editor's opinion.

TO SCOTCH READERS.

FIVE Special Gramophones will be given to the five readers living in Scotland, whose attempts are considered the best of those submitted by Scotch readers. These will be EXTRA prizes.

All attempts must reach us not later than the first post on Tuesday morning, December 2nd.

Result of Third "Serial" Competition.

In the above competition a Gramophone has been awarded to each of the following:

London.—Miss Herrtage, 1 Banbury Road, South Hackney; H. L. Brooks, 55 Foxberry Road, Brockley, S.E.

Under 100 Miles.—B. L. Hammond, 11 North Road, Brighton; F. E. Buckner, 55 London Road, Grays.

Over 100 Miles.—A. Sillito, Amington, Tamworth; W. Pearson, 46 Victor Street, Holderness Road, Hull.

Scotland.—J. Stevenson, 12 Armadale Street, Glasgow; W. Shand, 62 Kirkland Street, Glasgow.

Ireland.—S. Nairn, 51 Denzille Street, Dublin; D. Wallace, 83 Upper Meadow Street, Belfast.

The correct sentence was as follows: "'I have been very uneasy about you,' she said frankly, as he sank into an ample arm chair."—Page 520, column 1, line 3.

Digitized by Google

Little Jenny.

A Romance of Love and Music.

"WHAT is it, Jenny?"

A kindly hand was laid on the shoulder of the weeping girl, crouched in a corner of a doorway in a fashionable south coast seaside resort. She looked up, after hastily wiping away the tears that obscured the deep blue eyes, and gazed wistfully, wearily, into the face of him who had spoken.

She was a girl of little more than sixteen; her figure was frail and wretchedly clad, her face was wan and told of privation. So much he could see in the moonlight. And he could also see that the face, now soiled by tears, was full of the promise of loveliness; she would be a beautiful woman, he thought, with an involuntary sigh of admiration.

In her turn she saw a tall, dark, handsome young man of twenty-one. He, too, was but shabbily dressed. He carried a violin under his arm, and he seemed tired.

"What is the matter? Can I do anything for you?" he asked, looking at her with a benevolent and pitying expression. "You seem to be in trouble? Ah, me! I fear that this is a hard world for those upon whom Dame Fortune frowns. My name is Philip Atwood, and I am a violin player; perhaps you have heard of me? I play in the streets now, for a living."

"I have not heard," she replied, shaking her head. The touch of bitterness in his voice had escaped her. "I was trying to earn a few pence, to obtain food and a little comfort for my mother, who is old and lives in the country. It was a last resort. Mother says I have a good voice, so I tramped here, where rich people come to spend their money and enjoy life, and I tried to sing. I waited till dark, that they should not see my rags, but I forgot that the hotels have big lights in front. I felt ashamed and I broke down almost at my first note. I tried twice, but I was too nervous and they laughed at me!"

She began to weep again. Somehow, the sight of her grief chased away his own bitterness and he became buoyant in his charitable effort to encourage.

"Oh, that is nothing!" he exclaimed cheerily. "I can tell that you have a sweet voice, and you ought to earn lots of money from these rich people. Never fear! You will be able to take quite a small fortune home to your mother, little one!"

He took her hand and lifted her to her feet.

"Sing something to me!" he said, "and let me be the judge. You are not afraid of me? Come!"

It was a curious scene in the dark street—the girl standing before the youth and, encouraged by his cheeriness, singing a plaintive love-song in a rich, musical voice. Philip stood enraptured as, gaining confidence in the darkness and solitude, she sang with the full sweetness and strength of a voice that was already marvellously developed.

"Ah!" He drew a long breath as she finished. "It is a voice that should bring you a fortune! Go to the hotels and sing! Forget that you are in front of strangers, and think of your mother. Then you will sing with your heart and the money will come! Go! No!" he added immediately, as a thought struck him. "First come with me and have some coffee to refresh you and a piece of cake to give you strength. You will sing better."

"You are very good, Philip!" she replied, calling him by his Christian name in innocent gratitude. "But I cannot take your money; you want it for yourself."

"Nonsense, Jenny!" he responded, calling her by the name he had bestowed upon her when he first saw her. "You can repay me one day, if I want it! You have not told me your name, but I shall call you Jenny. I like it, and we shall meet now and then."

So she went with him to a simple restaurant in a side street, where he made her sit opposite him and partake of the coffee and cake. During the short time the simple repast lasted, he was full of gaiety, making her laugh and befitting her for the task she had before her.

"Now go and sing!" he said, as they parted outside. "I shall see you to-morrow, since you say that you will be here in the evening. Tell me if you notice many rich people there."

He watched her as she went with hesitating steps in the direction of the promenade.

"We might make some money if we could go together, but that would make talk and I cannot play well enough now that my hand has been hurt. No! I'll fiddle away in the daytime and give her the best chance—after dinner, people always feel more generous!"

Jenny took up a position in front of the hotel and, after a moment's hesitation, she began to sing in a rich voice. The air was plaintive and suited her mood, so she rendered it exquisitely. The visitors were attracted; only two or three were listening when she began, but at the end of her song, there was a small crowd.

"Bravo!" shouted some of the men, while the women signified their approval by applauding. If Jenny had been more experienced, she would have walked past and among them with her little cup before singing again, but she was pleased with her reception and treated them to some simple ditties taught to her by her mother.

"Capital!" said one man to another. "She would make a good actress. She was totally different in appearance in the two parts; she looked the embodiment of sadness and pathos during that first song, and now she is quite different—a mischief-loving country girl. Here she comes with her cup. Drop a piece of silver into it for me and we'll square up later."

The result of Jenny's first open air performance was decidedly encouraging, and she trudged back to the hovel with five shillings. It did not occur to her that she might be robbed, and she probably owed her safety to the fact that no one saw exactly which way she went. She was inclined not to sing on the following night, but she reflected that she would not get so much in future, as her voice would not be a novelty, and she had to remember that they were terribly in arrears with the rent, her mother in need of nourishment, and the winter was coming. And—this was important—she expected to meet Philip!

"I must repay him; it will not do to remain in debt!" she said to herself. But in her heart she vaguely felt that it was not only the propriety of repaying a debt quickly that made her wish to see Philip so soon. She half blushed as she experienced that undefined feeling, a kind of delight at her heart, and she turned her thoughts in other directions.

Somewhat weary after the walk of six miles, Jenny's heart gave a bound of pleasure when she espied the figure of Philip at the spot where he had first seen her.

"I thought that I should find you here!" she cried, and she wondered how it was that she had nearly said "I hoped" instead of "I thought!" "I can repay you for the refreshment yesterday, but"—with a look of intense gratitude—"I can never repay you for your words of encouragement!"

"Perhaps you will be able to do so one day!" he rejoined gaily. His face had been sad till he saw her coming. "You did well yesterday, eh? And there are stylish people at the hotel? Well, sing 'Home Sweet Home' this evening. That always appeals to people!"

He raised his violin to his shoulder and she, narrowly watching him, saw that his left hand was partly crippled so that he had difficulty in manipulating the strings. Yet he played the song with such effect that the tears came to her eyes.

"I have had no home since my dear mother died," he said softly. "If you feel as I do, you can sing that song in a way that will win favour for you from the people at the hotels. They may be in the midst of luxury and may not miss their grand homes while enjoying themselves at this fashionable seaside town, but the song will touch them all the same. You try it!"

"I should break down!" cried Jenny, with a lump in her throat.

"You mustn't!" he cried energetically. "And you won't if you throw yourself into it and forget everything. Come, let me give you a lesson; sing it as I play!"

He began again, and, after an effort, she followed. He stopped her two or three times in order to correct her where he thought she had not caught the true note or where she had not placed sufficient expression on the words. It was a quaint lesson, but when it was over she felt more confident of her powers. Then they parted and she went to sing to the rich people.

Jenny took up her position and sang "Home Sweet Home" with all the pathos of which she was capable, and she startled her hearers.

All declared themselves delighted, and it became the custom to look for Jenny every evening.

Day after day the girl kept up the practice, trudging backwards and forwards to the town from the sick bed, and bringing home the where-withal to make life less irksome and the winter less to be dreaded. She saw Philip every day and she pitied him for his lot in life and loved him for his generous heart and sterling qualities.

He was the son of poor parents, who had been dead for some years; his father had taught him the violin, and he loved music; he was just getting on well, when he injured his hand and thus his hopes were blighted. His mother had died soon after this, and Philip adopted street playing as a method of gaining a living.

As the days wore on, Jenny left home a little earlier, so that she might spend more time with Philip. He met her outside the town and they walked in together, sweetly conversing. So the old story ran its course and they awoke one evening to the knowledge that they loved.

"I have realised it for the first time this evening, Jenny," said Philip, clasping her in his arms, "because I must leave here!"

"Leave!" echoed Jenny, all the joy dying out of her heart.

"Yes, dearest!" he answered, trying to be gay that she might not be sad, as he always did. "I cannot earn much here, because—well, for various reasons," he added hastily. "So I am going away. I shall travel about and I shall earn money, so that I can come and claim you. You can always write to me at old Peter's, and I will write to you."

"But can I not help you?" she inquired wistfully. "You said I might be able to do so."

"Oh, we could not earn sufficient, you know! But we shall be together soon, never doubt it! You can sing your best to-night, for I shall be listening, and it will be the last time for a while!"

She said nothing, and they journeyed towards the town. Suddenly he stopped and took her hands in his, laying his violin on the ground for that purpose.

"Jenny, you are mine, mine alone! Let me give you this in token of our love!"

He took from his pocket a small ornament—a red stone shaped like a heart, with a little ring or eye of gold at the top through which a chain could be passed.

"I have no chain to give you, and the only chain worthy of being used is a chain of gold!" he said lovingly pressing it into her hand. "Keep it for a token of our betrothal and remember that we belong to one another so long as you retain my heart."

HAVE A PIECE OF MADGE MORRIS' WEDDING CAKE? Turn to page 677.

He pressed her to his breast and imprinted a kiss on her lips with all the passion of his ardent nature. Jenny returned his embrace with equal fervour.

"It requires no chain to bind us together, Philip!" she cried. "A silken thread will serve."

He folded her in a final embrace, but he did not tell her that he would not see her after the singing; that might have unnerved her. So he listened, and she sang the old song—sang it for him; and then he slipped away.

Jenny looked eagerly for him as she walked away, but could find no trace of her lover. The red heart was placed securely within the bosom of her dress, near her own heart, and she longed to tell him how she loved him before they said "Good-bye." But Philip was gone, and she had to wend her way homeward without a parting word.

She was walking swiftly along the silent road, deep in thought, when she was startled by a rush of feet and she found herself confronted by three men, who demanded her money.

"It's no use saying that you haven't got any," said one of the ruffians with a leer. "We know that you had a haul this evening!"

They seized her and, in mortal terror, she drew out the money and gave it to them.

"This isn't all!" shouted the foremost rascal. "I want more!"

"Then take it!" shouted a voice, and the three men had to release Jenny in order to defend themselves from the vigorous onslaught of two men who had come to the rescue of the girl.

The newcomers were armed with stout sticks, and they laid about them so lustily that, despite the difference in numbers, the robbers thought it good policy to take to their heels.

"Phew!" panted one of the rescuers, a man of over fifty and tolerably stout. "It's a good thing I asked you to come with me and that I haven't quite got out of form. But I'm nearly done up, what with trying to overtake the voice, and then fighting. Oh, my dear, here you are! Not hurt, I hope? They didn't spoil your voice?"

The question seemed so ludicrous that his companion laughed outright, and Jenny was forced to smile through the tears that had welled to her eyes at the loss of her money.

"No, they have not hurt me, but I don't understand!" said Jenny wonderingly. "But they have taken my money and——"

"Bother the money!" snapped the man. "I can give you more, and put you in the way of earning lots, lots! Lloyd, keep still and don't laugh! I want to hear her sing. My dear, I heard the last portion of your song as I came up, and I tell you that you have the voice I've been trying to find for ages, ages!" The little man, in spite of his inclination to portliness, simply danced about the road in his excitement. "As soon as I could understand where the singer was, I came out to find you, because I must have you. Oh, it's no use saying you can't come!" Jenny had said nothing. "I must have you and that settles it! They told me you had gone this way and we followed; Lloyd came also, because these roads are not safe! Now you know!"

"It was very good of you to help me and drive those thieves away, but they got my money unfortunately," said Jenny, rather illogically. "But I must hurry home——"

"Not if I know it!" cried the little man fiercely, planting himself directly in her path. "What! Let you go! Never! Lloyd, come here and help me to stop her!"

Lloyd burst into another fit of laughter, and the little man smiled.

"Of course, I am much agitated, my dear!" he explained. "But here is the whole secret. You have a voice such as I have been trying to find for a long time; with a little training it will be superb. You must join my party and become prima donna in a little while. It will bring you lots of money and fame. Let me hear you sing now, to make sure that I was not mistaken!"

Digitized by Google

Jenny protested, but the little man spoke to her in a kindly manner, soothing her and listening to her story, crowning all his efforts by forcing a gold coin into her hand to more than replace what she had lost. Jenny at last acquiesced, and sang.

The little impresario's face was a study during that song, could it have been seen distinctly. He was enraptured, and could hardly be persuaded to let Jenny go home on the promise to see him to-morrow at the hotel. It was with the greatest reluctance that he allowed her to depart.

Mr. Lucas Harrison, for that was the name of the impresario, waited with impatience—it might almost be said with feverish anxiety—for Jenny to come to him on the following evening. She had positively declined to come during the day on account of her ragged clothing. The girl appeared in due course and Harrison's brow cleared. There was to be no more singing outside the hotel; she was to intrust herself to the wife of his tenor, Lloyd, and to be under the training of the impresario himself; better clothes were to be provided, and a weekly sum sent to the sick mother to keep her in comparative comfort and pay for the necessary help. Jenny saw visions of happiness in the near future which surpassed her wildest dreams, and she consented.

The operatic company conducted by Mr. Lucas Harrison stayed one week in the fashionable resort, and then left for another part of the country. The girl wrote a glowing letter to Philip, and hoped that he might still be there to call and see her, but he came not. Harrison kept her quite secluded, not allowing her to appear on the boards, but working hard to develop the marvellous powers which he detected in the girl.

For nearly four years the company travelled from place to place in England and on the Continent, and during the whole of that time Jenny never heard one word from Philip; she wrote to him many times, but her letters never reached him apparently. Some came back, marked with the legend that the addressee was not to be found at the address mentioned; she wrote to old Peter, only to learn, weeks afterwards, that he was dead. From the badly-written letter penned by a neighbour, she gleaned the fact that some of her letters had been sent on to Philip's address, the last one they had. That was all, and Jenny hoped against hope that she would see him unexpectedly in the theatre one evening. During the short return visit to England, she sang the old song which she had sung to him, and earned frantic applause. But she knew only that he was not there and that "home" was a thing to be yearned for but impossible of realisation without him. She sang the song from her heart.

"When are we to spend a week in the old place?" she would ask Harrison. He would make a droll grimace and shake his head; there was not enough money to be made in that town—that is, not nearly so much as elsewhere, strange as it might seem.

At last her ardent desire was granted, and the impresario announced that a very good engagement had been offered in the South Coast resort. Jenny clasped her hands in her joy; she felt that she would see Philip.

Her first duty was to visit her mother, now recovered from her illness and spending her days in comfort. Then came the evening of the first concert.

The fame of the company had spread everywhere; they came with a great reputation, and Jenny was the greatest of them all. She was greeted with a storm of applause; some of the audience had seen her in other parts, while some remembered her as she sang in the street four years previously. She sang, and the audience was wild with delight.

"You must go on again, my child!" declared Harrison, jumping about in his excited style. "You must, or they will never leave off clapping!"

She appeared again and sang, but the demands for more were just as great.

"You must give them another!" said the impresario. "After that, they must have somebody else!"

Jenny went to a corner and arranged something in her dress; when she turned, the company saw a red heart, just a little one, hanging from her neck by a silken thread and resting on her bosom. She went on, and sang the old English song. But Philip was not there!

"Is he dead or—has he ceased to love me?" she asked herself. No, he was not dead, she felt certain! "I feel that he is near; I have never had that feeling before! I must find him!"

Her turn in the concert was an early one: she had asked that that it might be so. She slipped away to a dressing room, which was empty, and there she donned a garb which was in strange contrast to the beautiful dress that had graced her lovely figure before the audience. Throwing a rich cloak over this attire, she made her way out.

"It is superstition, Harrison would tell me," she murmured, "but I know it will serve to bring me to him or him to me. The old dress will bring me luck!"

She made her way through the lighted promenade and then into the darker streets; here she took off her cloak and carried it in a roll. She hurried on to the house where old Peter had lived. As she came within a few yards, she started and listened; the strains of a violin fell upon her ears.

"It is he!" she gasped. "Why did he not come to me?" She passed her hand over her brow.

"I will soon test his love, and if it is dead——"

She shivered; then boldly approached the door. Here the tones of the violin became audible once more, and this time the air was "Home, Sweet Home."

"He loves me!" she whispered.

"Philip, it is I, your Jenny!" she cried, entering the room.

Philip, for it was indeed he, dropped the instrument and sprang to his feet. Before him stood the prima donna in her gorgeous cloak.

"Away!" he cried feebly. "Such as you are not for me! Forget the past as I have tried to do, and leave me in my——"

"You swore that you would love me and come for me one day!" said Jenny unsteadily. "I have the token of our betrothal. Have you ceased to love me, Philip?"

"No, no!" he cried, at the sound of her pleading tone. "My love is unchanged, but I would not drag you to my level. You are rich, admired! I foresaw it when I had your first letters, and I would not answer. I love you still, but you must give that token back to me and forget me!"

"I cannot! Philip, I cannot! I would rather return to the old life with you! See!" She threw off her cloak, and he saw her in the ragged dress of four years ago, with the little heart resting on her bosom and hanging by its silken thread. "I will come to you as I was four years ago rather than lose you. Philip," she whispered softly, tenderly, as she went up to him, "play the old song, as you were playing it just now, and I will sing it as I sang it on the stage—for you!"

Under the spell of her beauty and intreaties, he picked up the instrument and began to play. As the last notes died away, she stooped and kissed him, for he had sunk into a chair.

"Philip," she whispered, "you encouraged me and helped me when I was in despair! Now that I am able to return it, you must not hesitate to accept."

Philip was a prey to a great inward struggle, but he was conquered when the soft arms incircled his neck.

There was another faint attempt at rebellion on his part. How could he take his place by her side, how could he agree to share her wealth? But she stopped him by a kiss.

"Love levels all!" she whispered again. "If you make me happy, if I cannot be happy without you, then you bring to me something that is worth more than gold."

There was a merry wedding two months later, when Jenny, the celebrated singer, was married to Philip Atwood. Quite a romantic love story, said the gossips; nobody knew exactly what the love story was, but they were sure that it was romantic because no one had ever heard of the husband before, and Harrison said it was romantic!

George Day.

Digitized by Google

AN ACROSTIC AND A COINCIDENCE.

Also a Meeting on the Bridge.

REGGIE BLAKE was a bank clerk in his working hours, and a poet in his moments of ease. The stern realities of ledgers, pass-books, and trial "balances" had been unable to quell the nascent fire that glowed in his youthful soul, and it was not very long before the local paper of the little town of Baymead began to quiver with Reggie Blake's effusions.

He had been drafted to Baymead from the head office of the bank, and he found life unutterably lonely in the small market town. But for the diversion afforded him by the spinning of rhymes, he told himself he would have drifted into acute melancholia, and whilst this view was perhaps unduly pessimistic, there can be little doubt that existence at Baymead was dull enough after the exhilaration of life in London.

One evening, after a particularly heavy day's work, he was sitting in his dingy little lodging when the maid entered with a letter. The missive was from Mr. Bloxam, the editor of the Baymead Argus, and it ran thus—

"MY DEAR SIR.—I have been much pleased with the poetry that you have been kind enough to contribute to this journal and shall be very glad to receive further metrical contributions whenever you feel inclined to forward the same.—Yours faithfully,

"JOHN BLOXAM."

"Come, that is a trifle more encouraging," thought Reggie, as he smiled and re-read the communication, "I never could have believed that an editor could write in cold blood to a man and ask for verses. I'll knock off something fresh at once."

Drawing his chair closer to the table, the young man seized a pencil and plunged into thought.

"Now, what can I write about?" he pondered. "'That is the question,' as our friend the melancholy Dane would say."

For nearly twenty minutes he sat with a perplexed look upon his brow, until at length an inspiration darted into his brain.

"By Jove, I have it!" he murmured. "I'll write something to be called "A Face in the Crowd." Brown was saying this morning that every face in a crowd held beauty for some one, and the idea is worth celebrating in verse. Here goes!"

After manifold erasures, alterations, and all the other efforts that go to make up the writing of a poem, Reggie produced the following somewhat feeble effusion, which he flattered himself, however, was "rather good." It ran thus—

"Dear face that looked to mine, and then departed,
O, tell me, shall we ever meet again.
Rich was the joy that thy dear smile imparted,
And thro' my soul thy image beams again.
When on thy charms my raptured fancy ponders,
Entranced I stand in worshipful delight,
Stricken with love my memory vaguely wanders
To that sweet hour when first thou metst my sight.
Wheree'er thou art I send thee this love token
In proof of what my heart would fondly say—
Call me thy knight, thy slave, with faith unbroken, Kindred in souls though strangers for alway."

"The final line isn't quite clear," he thought after a short interval of reflection, "but it doesn't matter. A touch of vagueness often helps a poem considerably. If people don't understand it, they fancy it must be abnormally clever. I shall let it stand as it is."

Fortified by this brief converse with himself, the poet made a neat copy of the sentimental sonnet and inclosed it to the editor with a short letter, thanking that gentleman for his note. Then he went out and posted the communication, and having returned to his lodging and consumed a frugal supper, betook himself soberly to bed.

* * * * *

On the following Friday afternoon, the Baymead Argus made its appearance, and on column four of the fifth page Reggie Blake's poem, quoted above, was duly published.

It bore his initials at foot, and the young man beamed with delight as he scanned the lines.

"Upon my word, it looks even better than when I first wrote it," he pondered. "It's wonderful how print improves the whole aspect of literary composition!"

Three days passed, and Blake was sitting in his room, hammering out a further poem for the Argus, and endeavouring to find a rhyme for the word "cupid," without employing the word "stupid," when the postman's knock resounded through the house, and presently an envelope bearing the handwriting of Mr. Bloxam was handed to the scribe.

"Wonder what he's writing about now?" he murmured, as he tore open the flap, and then Blake's eyes assumed a puzzled expression, for the editor had communicated nothing, but had merely inclosed a letter which was addressed—

"To R. B., author of 'A Face in the Crowd.' c.o. Baymead Argus, Baymead."

"Great Scott, it's a girl's hand!" cried Reggie excitably. "Upon my word, this is interesting, and no mistake!"

With trembling fingers he drew forth the letter. It bore the address—"Campion Villa, Baymead," and was in this wise—

"DEAR SIR.—I fear that I am behaving wrongly in writing to you, and that you will think me a fast and forward girl, but I cannot help thanking you for your really beautiful acrostic on my name. How you came to discover it I do not know, and I am also at a loss to call to mind what crowd it was in which you saw me, for this reason—I have only been to one flower-show, and then, owing to the rain, there was hardly anybody in the grounds. Perhaps, however, you have taken what is called a 'poet's license' in using the title in question, and in any case, let me congratulate you on your beautiful poetry.

"Thanking you once more for having selected poor me as the subject of your acrostic—I am, yours very gratefully,

"DORA WESTWICK."

"P.S.—Do you ever walk in Campion Park towards twilight? I do sometimes.—D.W."

Reggie Blake read the letter half-a-dozen times, and then sat down to think.

"Well, of all the extraordinary misconceptions in the world," he muttered, "this is quite the most wonderful. I haven't written a single acrostic since I was a kid. That sort of poem has gone out of fashion. Anyhow, I'll just acknowledge the note, and pretend to understand it, though for the life of me, I can't make head or tail of this business."

Half an hour later, the following note was on its way to Campion Villa—

Digitized by Google

"DEAR MISS WESTWICK.—Allow me to thank you very sincerely for your kind and appreciative letter. I also walk in Campion Park in the half-light, and shall be there to-morrow evening. If you happen to be on the bridge over the lake at about seven-thirty, I trust I may have the pleasure of seeing you.

"I hope that you will not be annoyed by this proposal, and, meantime, remain—Very sincerely yours,

"REGINALD BLAKE (Author of the Acrostic)."

There was little sleep for our poet that night. He lay upon his couch in a fever of anticipation, asking himself a thousand times what Miss Westwick would be like. Perhaps she was a spectacled old maid, of a sentimental cast of mind, who dabbled in poetry herself. He hoped with all his heart that such might not prove to be the case, and, presently, he fell into a fitful doze, wherein all sorts and conditions of ridiculous dreams concerning his unknown correspondent held the high place.

Next day he contrived to perform his duties at the Bank without perpetrating more than a dozen blunders, and when at length the hours of thraldom were concluded, he rushed home, consumed a hasty meal, arrayed himself in his most gorgeous raiment, and sallied forth to Campion Park, a picturesque little demesne on the borders of the town.

He approached the bridge with swiftly-beating heart. Standing by the parapet was a tall, graceful girl, with wonderful dark eyes and comely cheeks.

Some instinct seemed to rise up in Blake's heart and proclaim to him that this was Dora Westwick, and an instant later he was bowing and holding out his hand—

"Miss Westwick, I think——"

"Yes. That is my name. And you are—Mr.—Mr. Blake. I—I hope you don't think very badly of me for writing!"

To this day Reggie is unable to recount with any degree of exactness what he said and did in the exquisite moments that followed that meeting on the bridge. The girl's beauty took immediate possession of his heart and brain, and when, an hour later, he bade her adieu, he began to think that he was very much in love.

"I suppose I ought to have told her that she was under some misconception as to that acrostic," he reflected as he walked home, "but I was so delighted to find that she wasn't a spectacled old maid after all that the incident passed completely out of my mind. Anyhow, it doesn't matter much one way or the other."

* * * * *

In the weeks that followed, Miss Dora Westwick and Reggie Blake were constantly together, and in the fulness of time he was invited to Campion Villa, where Dora's aunt, a benevolent old lady with whom the girl resided, took an instant fancy to the poetical bank clerk and made him exceedingly welcome.

"I am very, very fond of you literary people, Mr. Blake," she said graciously, "but don't you think you were just a trifle bold when you addressed an acrostic to a young lady to whom you had not been introduced?"

"We poets often do bold things," he replied evasively, "and I think Dora—er—Miss Westwick, I mean, has forgiven me by this time."

"I have," returned Dora promptly, and then changed the subject by offering her admirer some cake.

The inevitable happened in due course. When Reggie Blake was promoted to the position of assistant-cashier, and was notified that a substantial increase in salary would accompany his new dignity, he "took his courage in both hands," as our Gallic friends would say, and asked Dora Westwick to be his wife.

"You know that I have loved you ever since that evening on the bridge?" he said, as he took her hand in his.

Dora pouted deliciously.

"Only since then?" she whispered. "I—I thought it dated from the hour when you saw the 'Face in the Crowd'?"

"Oh, ah, yes, of course," stammered Blake, turning scarlet. "That remark about the bridge was a clerical error, as we say at the bank. But, darling, we can afford to ignore such trifles now, for I—I want you to be my wife."

The hand that lay in Reggie's palm twined lovingly round it, and he knew that he had gained his heart's desire on that summer night.

Throughout the halcyon days of the engagement period that ensued, Reggie Blake had resolved time after time to tell his fiancée the truth regarding the poem, but the words died unspoken on his lips, for he could not bring himself to voice the syllables of disillusion, and to inform the girl of his heart that he had written no acrostic in her honour, and that she was under a complete misapprehension in thinking so. In fact, it was not until they had been duly married at Baymead Church, and were enjoying the first days of the honeymoon beside the sea at Jersey, that he found courage to speak.

They were sitting in a remote corner of the pier, hearkening to the strains of the band as it discoursed pleasant melodies from San Toy. Presently Reggie observed in a low voice—

"Darling, I want to tell you a secret. I meant to have told you long ago, but somehow I had not the—the courage!"

She looked up with a quick glance.

"A secret?" she echoed. "Nothing very shocking, I hope?"

"Well, it depends entirely on the point of view. To me it seems trivial enough—it may appear otherwise to you."

"Oh, Reg, how mysterious you are! Have you been robbing the bank, or what?"

He laughed lightly.

"No. I haven't aspired yet to criminal honours," he replied, "and my secret has nothing whatever to do with the Bank. It concerns you—and—and the acrostic."

"Me and the acrostic?"

"Yes. Dora, you'll think me all sorts of bad things when I tell you that I have written no acrostic on your name, or on anybody else's. The verses headed 'A Face in the Crowd,' were addressed to an imaginary person."

"An imaginary person? Oh, Reggie, what nonsense! You are only trying to tease me."

"I assure you, dearest, it is the living truth! I was awfully puzzled at the time when you wrote and said that I had composed an acrostic on your name, but you were so—so charming and sweet that I had not the heart to disillusion you."

"But I don't—I can't understand. See, here is the poem. I have carried it in my little purse ever since. Now look at the initial letters of the lines, and see if I am not right."

She handed him the cutting from the Baymead Argus as she spoke. Reggie Blake stared at the poem beneath the yellow light of the pier lamp, and then gasped out—

"Great Scott! You are right. Well, of all the extraordinary, mysterious, and inexplicable coincidences, this is the most extraordinary, the most mysterious, and the most inexplicable. 'Dora Westwick!' Of course! By Jove, I see it all now, and the mystery is a mystery no longer!"

There was a long pause. Reggie was sitting in amazed wonder, asking himself what unknown power had guided his hand to trace this unconscious acrostic, whilst Dora was regarding him with eyes that held similar astonishment.

"It seems far more like a fairy-tale than real life," she said at length.

He threw his arm round her waist, drawing her nearer to himself.

"Yes," he replied, "just like a fairy-tale, and the good fairies who brought us together were Chance and——"

"And the acrostic," whispered Dora with a satisfied smile.

"God bless the acrostic!" said Reggie fervently, and never was blessing more heart-felt—more sincere.

P. Beaufoy.

Digitized by Google

"Provided Always."

The Story of a Will—and a Woman.

"PROVIDED always, and I do hereby declare that if my son, Clement Hugh Heaton, or his issue, lawfully begotten, do not within ten years after my decease, appear in England and claim the said estate called Rexholme, or if my said son Clement Hugh Heaton be dead, and such issue, if more than one, shall die before attaining the age of twenty-one years, then in either of the said events happening, I give the said estate called Rexholme, unto my second son, Jasper Leigh Heaton and his heirs for ever."

The young lawyer laid down the will, in which occurred the above clause, upon the table, and looked steadily across at the gentleman who sat opposite him.

"You see, Mr. Heaton, that it would be a very risky thing for any client of mine to advance you fifteen thousand pounds upon the security of an estate, which, at any time during the remainder of the ten years after your father's death, may be claimed by a child or children of your brother—or, for that matter, by your brother himself, whose death has not been absolutely proved; at least to my satisfaction."

"Then you refuse to negotiate this loan for me?"

"Yes, undoubtedly, on the security of Rexholme. If you have no better than that to offer, I am afraid that you will have some difficulty in raising the money."

"Well, then, give me the deeds of the two estates, Rexholme and Havilands, and, though he will charge me a ruinous interest, I will go to Abrahams to-morrow and get it from him."

"Mr. Heaton," said Robert Morley, "the legal business of your family has been in the hands of our firm for more than three generations. Now, I do not want, just after succeeding my father, to break the link; but if you go to Abrahams, who is more money-lender than lawyer, I give you definitely to understand that I will leave no stone unturned in order to establish the fact of Clement Heaton's being still alive, or at any rate that he married, and has, living to-day, child or children, who inherit his claim to the Rexholme estate."

"The deeds, man, the deeds! As for your threats I treat them as the ravings of a madman."

"Well, sir—there are the deeds—I have no power to withhold them from you. If Mr. Abrahams lends you the money, all I can say is, that the ruinous interest to which you referred, and which he most certainly will exact, will be a tacit admission on his part that the Rexholme title-deeds are undoubtedly bad security."

"Thanks for the opinion. Good-day!"

"One moment, Mr. Heaton. I have this morning received a communication from Richard Dennis, of Rexholme Port, requesting me to ask you for the two years arrears maintenance money, on account of your ward, Elsa Hanbury. As it is your business, and I know nothing whatever about the matter, I beg to hand you the letter, with which, no doubt, you will be able to deal."

"The blundering idiot!" muttered Jasper under his breath; then, with an airy nonchalance, addressing the young lawyer, "didn't you know I had a ward? Oh, yes!—but, thank goodness, she's nearly of age, and then my responsibility ceases. An old friend's daughter!—I will deal with the matter. Good-day, Morley!"

Had Robert Morley seen the scared, evil expression on Jasper Heaton's face as he passed along the passage into Bedford Row, he would have had ample confirmation of certain vague suspicions which had been aroused in his mind in connection with the (practically) threatening letter of Richard Dennis, ex-gamekeeper, and now the shady proprietor of a tenth-rate public-house on Rexholme Quay.

As it was, the thing remained with him, with the result that he determined to pay a visit to Rexholme without delay.

"Reed!" he shouted to a clerk in the outer office, "bring me a Bradshaw!"

"Guv'nor's got something on—bet it's about that black-looking Heaton chap!"

"Oh, Reed!" said Robert Morley, running his finger down the Great Eastern main line departures, "I'm going to Rexholme—may not be back before to-morrow night. Send the boy in a cab to my house for my emergency Gladstone; it's packed ready. And should Mr. Jasper Heaton call during my absence, you know nothing—understand?"

"Very good, sir."

"Tell the boy to take my bag to Liverpool Street; he'll find me in the booking-office."

"My dear Mr. Jasper," he added to himself, "I have long suspected you of underhand dealing; but I rather think that I am now on the verge of discovering you to be at the bottom of a very pretty piece of serious villainy."

* * * * * *

When Robert Morley walked unannounced into his friend Blythe's private office, the Rexholme lawyer welcomed his brother professional with more than ordinary effusion.

"My dear fellow!" he cried, "you could not have come at a more opportune moment—for me!"

"I shall be glad if I can be of any service to you, Blythe; but what is it? I'm down on a bit of important business myself, and don't want to lose more time than I can help in doing it."

"All right, Bob! You know Dennis, old Sir Frederick Heaton's ex-gamekeeper?"

"Yes, yes!—the very man I am come to make some inquiries about."

"No!—well, we'd better have Dobbs in—that drunken old clerk of mine, you know—for once his drinking habits are likely (unless I am very much mistaken) to lead to the righting of a great wrong. We'll have him in, and you shall hear his story."

Touching a bell on his writing-table twice, Mr. Blythe added, "If all he says be true, it's the most extraordinary case of judgment on the wrongdoer that I have ever known. Dobbs, Mr. Morley isn't a stranger to you; I want you to tell us all that you told me this morning."

Dobbs, who even then had the evidence of surreptitious

Digitized by Google

refreshment about him, coughed nervously, and nodded to Robert Morley.

He was an undersized, thin man, with wispy grey hair, and a hesitating manner.

"You must let me tell it, gentlemen," he said, "in my own way. While old Sir Frederick was alive, you know, of course, that Mr. Clement and Mr. Jasper quarrelled—what about nobody knew—Whatever it was, it resulted in the elder brother going abroad, to be no more heard of from that day to this. Mr. Clement Heaton has never been seen since.

"Sir Frederick's favourite son, the old gentleman, as you are aware, while feeling almost sure that he was dead, before dying himself, made provision by will, in case Mr. Clement, or any child of his, should be alive, that they should have the Rexholme estate, if claimed within ten years of the testator's death. The ten years is up next month; Mr. Jasper comes into all that he hasn't lost by mortgage, and cent-per-cent loans; which brings me to what looks like the final situation, gentlemen, of the Heaton family mystery. I was coming from the Lamb and Flag hotel late last night, and on my way had to pass the Anchor, Richard Dennis' house. Half way up the narrow lane which runs up one side of it, I saw a man I know—Tully, the messenger at the bank—with his ear glued to the closed shutters of the little side window. The house had been shut a quarter of an hour, but through the two holes at the top came a light which showed that the room had occupants. Tully beckons to me, the moment he spots me, and putting his finger to his lips motions me to listen at the shutters."

"Well, what did you hear?" queried Robert Morley eagerly.

"I'm coming to that, sir. I first raised myself up on the sill, and looking through one of the shutter-holes, saw Mr. Jasper Heaton, and Dick Dennis sitting one on either side the table. I was just in time to hear Dennis say that he wouldn't move a step in the business, unless the two years' money due for the keep of a girl—was paid down on the nail. Mr. Heaton tried to soften Dennis down, protesting that he had no money, but might have some in a day or two, when the claim should be paid."

"Yes, and then?" interrupted Morley.

"Then, sir, Mr. Heaton said the girl was an obstacle; and that if he, Dennis, would help him to remove it, he would make a man of him for life."

"The murderous scoundrel!—well?"

"'You would!' said Dennis. 'Yes,' replied Mr. Jasper, 'I'd give you three thousand pounds!' 'What is it you want me to do?' said Dennis then. 'I have a letter here from a man offering to advance me a large sum of money. The girl is the only obstacle. Should she be taken ill, and die within the next six weeks the money will, on that event being satisfactorily proved, be advanced at once.' Then Dennis said 'What you mean is, if I kill Elsa, I shall have three thousand pounds—I'll have nothing to do with it.'"

"And what did the other villain say then?"

"He reminded Dennis that the death of a fellow gamekeeper, while both were in Sir Frederick Heaton's service, had never been satisfactorily cleared up; adding that he, Jasper, had met him on the night of the occurrence under very suspicious circumstances. 'One murder more or less won't heckle your conscience, man,' he said, 'besides I might say something awkward for you about the first, you know. Dennis then asked when it was to be done. 'Within six weeks,' was the reply. 'Give me another glass of whisky, and I'll do it in six days—six hours, if you like!' Seeing that he had gained his point, Jasper Heaton prepared to depart, just saying that he would call again the following night and arrange everything. Tully and I then thought it time to shift our quarters. This, gentlemen, is true, every word of it; and if you, as I believe you can, will put two and two together, Mr. Jasper Heaton has not only nearly reached the end of his tether, but the 'provided always' of Sir Frederick's will, is likely to come into active operation."

"I quite agree with you, Mr. Dobbs," said Robert Morley, gravely, "and you may rest assured that your evidence——"

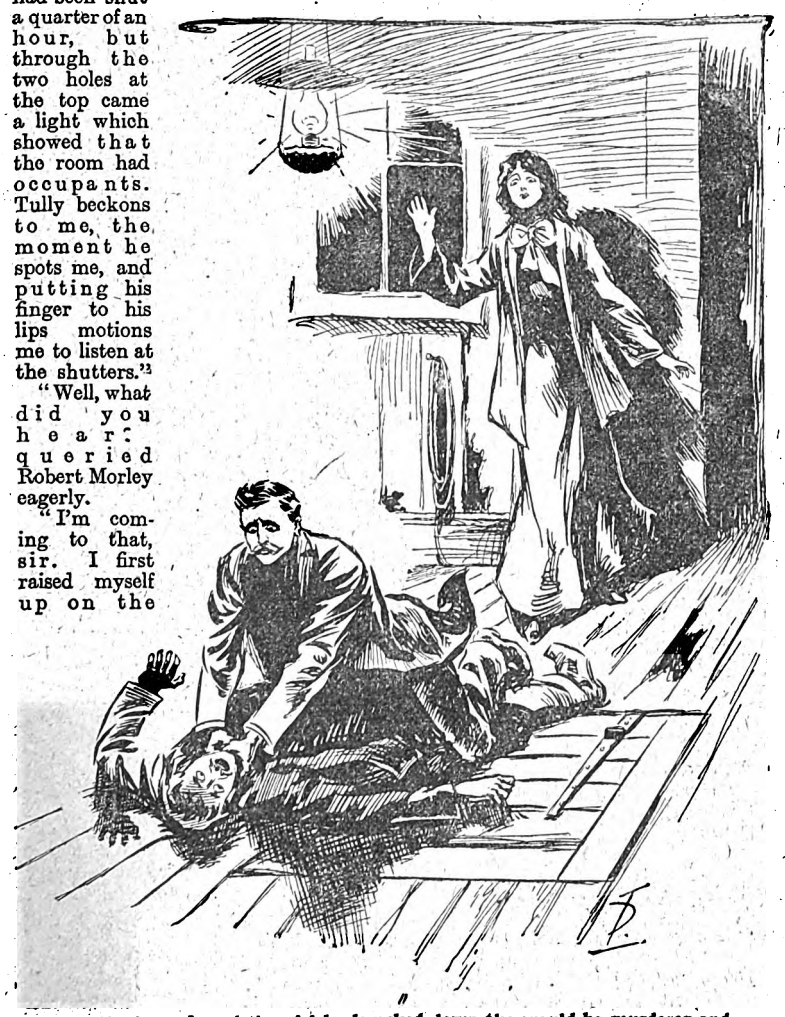
"And Tully's, Mr. Morley."

"And Tully's, Dobbs, will not be forgotten when accounts are balanced."

"One thing I should like to ask you," said Robert Morley to the old clerk. "This girl; this so-called Elsa Hanbury; is she kept in durance by the man Dennis?"

"She must be, sir; for not a soul in Rexholme has ever caught sight of her."

"Then, Blythe, our course is clear. Your business has resolved itself into my business, and the first thing to be done, is to swear out a warrant, on Dobbs' and Tully's testimony, for the arrest of Jasper Heaton on a charge of inciting and conspiring to murder Elsa Hanbury, who, there is every reason to believe, is his brother's child, Clement Heaton's daughter."



Having released the girl he knocked down the would-be murderer and pinned him to the ground.

Digitized by Google

"I will attend to that, Bob, and you?"

"I," said his friend, "am going to interview Mr. Richard Dennis; and induce him, if I can, to turn King's evidence: so that no link may be wanting in the chain which is to bind Jasper Heaton for what is to be hoped for society's sake, the rest of his natural life."

* * * * *

It was the end of September, and the evenings were drawing in; so that when Robert Morley arrived at the Anchor public-house on the quay, it was nearly dark.

There was no one in the bar except a tall, swarthy-faced woman, of forbidding expression.

To the young lawyer's inquiry if he could see the landlord, she replied that her husband was out.

"Will he be long?"

"I dunno!—p'raps he will—p'raps he won't. Do you want him partic'lar?"

"Yes, I do. If you think he'll be in in an hour, I'll call again."

"You can call if you want to—he may be in; and he mayn't."

"I'll chance it—in an hour."

Wending his way along the silent quay, Robert Morley found himself, in less than half an hour, some distance beyond the outskirts of the place.

The only house in sight was a grey, timber-built windmill, the torn and broken sails of which told of long disuse for corn-grinding purposes.

But for one thing, Robert Morley would have turned his face again towards Rexholme. Desolate and ruinous as was the building, he distinctly made out fully a twinkling star of light above the gallery.

"There surely can't be anyone living there?" he said to himself, "but at the risk of keeping Mr. Dick Dennis waiting, I'll explore a bit."

At that moment a piercing shriek came from the direction where the point of light glimmered.

"Something's wrong!" cried Robert Morley, running towards the mill with all the dash of his Oxford sprinting days.

It did not take him three minutes to reach the door, which he found to be fastened from the inside.

Picking up a short piece of the ironwork of the sails, with which the ground was strewed, he beat upon the crazy barrier of woodwork, until one blow, heavier than the rest, stove in two of the panels above the lock.

Clambering in through the aperture, he found himself in an atmosphere of semi-darkness.

Then, in a recess to the left, he stumbled upon the stairway leading up to the gallery floor of the mill.

It was the work of a minute only to grope his way up the rickety steps, another woman's shriek from above quickening his progress.

Just over his head he could see a dim light coming through a square opening.

Through this opening he sprang into the chamber to see a young girl lying prone on the floor, the grimy hand of Dennis, the black-browed landlord of the Anchor, on the quay, clutching desperately at her white neck.

Another second and Robert Morley would have been too late; but now he rushed across the chamber, seized the would-be murderer by both hands round the throat, and with all his strength pulled him backwards on to the floor, where he knee-pinned him to the verge of suffocation.

Calling to the frightened girl to pass him a length of rope, which hung on a nail by the window, he securely bound his prisoner hand and foot, and rising, turned his attention to the ex-gamekeeper's intended victim.

She looked to be about twenty, small and delicately formed, but with an unearthly pallor, that told a tale of years of shutting-out from the outside world.

Robert Morley's first words were to calm her, and then to debate what was best to be done.

"Do you think you could find your way to the police station in Rexholme?" he asked her, "and tell them to send two or three constables at once."

"Yes—I will go as fast as I can, but you?"

"Oh! I am all right! Besides, I want a little uninterrupted conversation with our friend here. I do not like to ask you to do this, feeling, as you must do, weak and excited with battling with this ruffian."

"Oh, I don't mind—I'm better now."

"One thing more, Miss—well, Miss Hanbury for the present. When you have summoned the police, do not return to Dennis' house, but go direct to lawyer Blythe, two doors from the Lamb and Flag hotel, on the Holme Road—he will look after you—till I have seen you, at any rate."

During the three-quarters of an hour interval, Robert Morley drew from his reluctant captive the whole shameful history of Jasper Heaton's scheme to defraud his elder brother's child of her rights.

It seems, that being determined to make an independence for himself before returning to England, Clement Heaton died on his cattle ranch in Texas, as he was on the point of selling his property. He had married some time before this, his wife having died soon after the birth of her little daughter.

Clement Heaton was just able to make arrangements for his daughter's return to the care of his father, as he supposed, never having heard of Sir Frederick's death.

With the child came the proceeds of the sale of Clement's Texan property, which, meeting his niece at Southampton, Jasper Heaton laid hands on, and used for his own purposes.

The child being only a burden to him, he paid Dennis and his wife a yearly sum to keep her out of the way. This they did, the subsequent inciting by Jasper of Dennis to silence her for ever on the eve of her coming of age, being, of course, already known to Robert Morley.

Jasper Heaton had been arrested in his own house about the same time that Dick Dennis was captured by Robert Morley. The evidence against him, that of his accomplice, of Dobbs, and Tully, the messenger, was overwhelming, and had he not died, two days before the trial of a malignant fever, he would undoubtedly have received the full reward of his crimes.

* * * *

It is pleasant to have to chronicle that Elsa Heaton and Robert Morley have agreed to walk through life side by side.

The impression each formed of the other, on that fateful night in the old windmill chamber, was destined to grow and to intensify, so that though, by reason of Jasper Heaton's criminal extravagance, the estate of Rexholme was much diminished in value, there was yet enough left for the lady of his heart to bestow upon Robert Morley, her knight-errant and best-beloved.

E. Ralph.

THINGS TO NOTE.

Miss Madge . . Morris' Wedding.

(See Page 677.)

How to Win a Gramophone. .

(See Page 682.)

Our New Serial, "The Albert Gate Mystery." . . .

(See Page 702.)

Digitized by Google

A CHANGE OF CIRCUMSTANCES.

Which Made all the Difference in the World.

I.

THE following letters appeared consecutively in the Daily Tatler for August 24th, 1900:

"SHOULD WOMEN PROPOSE?

"SIR,—The 'Mere Man' who advocated in your columns the liberty of women to make proposals of marriage, has surely never put himself in the position of the man proposed to. I can imagine nothing more ignominious or humiliating than to listen to a woman declaring her heart, and pleading for the honour you will do her by joining your life with hers. Any man in such a situation would look and feel an absolute idiot, but what of the woman who makes the confession? She would be trampling under foot the two prime qualities of womanhood, which I take to be modesty and reserve. No really nice girl, whatever the circumstances or however backward her lover might be, would take the first step in the declaration of love. It must be always the man's prerogative and privilege to propose.—Yours, &c., R. T.

"SIR.—May a mere girl venture to lift her voice against the arguments of a 'Mere Man'? I'm afraid I'm old fashioned, and perhaps not very experienced, but the idea that creatures of my sex should be presented with the right of proposing sends a cold shiver down my back. The notion may appeal to the 'new women' and the 'shrieking sisterhood' generally, but what true girl under any condition would dare or even wish to take such a step? And would men stand being proposed to? My own private opinion is that they would all emigrate to Timbuctoo if ever such a social custom came to prevail. No, Sir, the old order of things is best. My 'Mr. Right' (if there exists such a being) will have to speak first, or no engagement ring will ever glitter on the third left-hand finger of MAUD."

II.

IDLY and dreamily Ralph Trevor and his friend Cecil Orchard were sculling down the river. A summer's day had really come at last, and everything that breathed seemed to feel the magic influence of sunshine. To-day for almost the first time this season the Thames could be said to be properly alive.

"Isn't it hot?" remarked Ralph, not for the first time. "What do you say, Cecil, to our running in the boat under that willow, and having a rest till the sun goes down for a bit?"

"I'm your man. I was just thinking what a hard-working day's holiday you were giving me."

With a few skilful strokes the boat was brought alongside the bank, securely moored, and the two young men stretched themselves out, one in the bow, the other at the stern, both the picture of ease and comfort.

"You seem very dreamy this afternoon," said Cecil, when the other had smoked half way through a cigarette without making a remark.

"Do you know what I was thinking? What an infernal thing money is!"

"Dear me! It hadn't struck me in that light before. Now if you had said the shortness of money I might have agreed."

"No, it's the having too much that's worrying me."

"My dear chap, hand it over! I'm dying to relieve you, and short of finding a more worthy recipient."

"Ah, Cecil, you don't understand. I've not too much. It's she."

"She! What 'she'? Some great-aunt of yours who insists on squandering what should some day come to you?"

Ralph Trevor laughed in spite of his somewhat serious mood.

"No, I've no expectations of that kind. Well, I'm in the confessional box this afternoon, and had better tell you everything. The 'she,' Cecil, is the girl I'm in love with, and should like to marry."

Orchard started up from his recumbent position and looked curiously across at his friend.

"Good gracious, Ralph, fancy your being taken that way! I had hoped you had passed the susceptible age and were going to keep me company in my dotage. But tell me all about it!"

Ralph's cigarette had gone out. He lit it afresh and, drawing a cushion more comfortably under his head, continued the conversation.

"There isn't much to relate. You remember I went down to Bournemouth for Whitsuntide, and what a spanking time I told you I had. There was a girl staying at the boarding-house. Her name was Maud Napier. Her people were there, too; they were stopping all through the summer. Cec, I saw her and loved her, almost at first sight. It was as simple an affair as these affairs usually are."

"Well, Ralph?" said his friend sympathetically, when the other paused. Trevor pursued his train of thought.

"And yet it's wretchedly complex. You see she has money—about £160 a year. I've found that out from the Judson's, who know the girl intimately. And I—well, I can look the income-tax man boldly in the face, and truthfully say that I'm not yet taxable. You understand the point, old man?"

"Perfectly, but aren't you a little too sensitive?"

"Surely not! You know how people misunderstand one in a case like this. They would say it was her money I was after, and not the girl herself. One hundred and sixty pounds a year of her own—ah, that young man knows which side his bread is buttered! You can fancy that being said, Cec?"

"I can, but why mind the world?"

"I shouldn't, if the girl herself understood my motive. But would she? If she hadn't that money, it would be all right. I could speak out at once, tell her all about my position and prospects, and be refused or accepted, as the case might be. Oh, it's a queer position to be in!"

For some moments the two friends smoked in silence, the only sound being the quiet lapping of the water against the keel. Trevor had gone off into a brown study, which Orchard was too sympathetic to interrupt. A fish jumping out of the river near at hand caused a temporary diversion.

"A lively one, eh, Cecil? Well, shall we be moving on?"

"If you're ready! Made up your mind how to act about the girl, Ralph?"

"I'm going down to Bournemouth for August Bank Holiday. What will happen there I don't know. Destiny principally directs one in an affair of this kind."

"May it be a good destiny, old man! One thing I'd say to you. Don't let the girl suffer because you don't speak—that's where timidity on the man's part very often leads. There, you didn't think I knew so much about human nature, did you?"

"No, but I thought you knew more about a boat. You are trying to shove her off without unloosing the painter."

Both laughed heartily, and, as they rowed away, conversation drifted to lighter matters.

III.

An evening concert was in progress at the Winter Gardens, Bournemouth. The big glass pavilion was crowded, and upstairs in the gallery promenading was a matter of difficulty. Visitors and residents had alike turned out on this August Bank Holiday in quite exceptional numbers.

Maud Napier had eagerly accepted Ralph Trevor's invitation to accompany him to the concert.

"You'll be surprised," she had said, "but, though we have been a long time here, I've only been to a concert once before. My people don't care for music, you know."

"And do you?"

"Passionately. It just lands me in heaven!"

They had arrived some twenty minutes before the music commenced, and had secured a couple of seats in a position from which the vocalists could be clearly heard and seen. Never had Ralph felt so happy as to-night, and yet with the happiness were mingled feelings of uncertainty and unrest. He knew his own heart clearly, absolutely; if only he might know too the heart of the girl at his side!

For a while she seemed absorbed in the music, scarcely giving heed to her companion. The orchestra rose to the size of the audience, and played as though it meant to enhance its already great reputation. Maud was enthusiastic; Trevor caught the glow of her enthusiasm, and between the various items on the programme they fell to discussing warmly the points of appreciation. How many tastes they had in common! The girl's face lit up with the enjoyment she was feeling, and almost against his will Ralph found himself again and again looking into her eyes.

"One more song, and then the interval!" she said. "Shall we go outside for a little then?"

"If you like, and won't catch cold."

"Oh, I shan't do that! We can get our seats again?"

"Yes, I've the counterfoils of the tickets. It is hot in here, and I shall be glad of a breath of fresh air. Ah, here comes the singer!"

It was the "Jewel Song" from "Faust," sung superbly by a lady who, though not of great reputation, had clearly considerable knowledge of the stage business and took the trouble to realise, even though it was only on a concert platform, the character of Margaret. She was recalled again and again, but wisely refused to spoil the effect of complying with the calls for an encore.

"That was too lovely for words," said Miss Napier, when the applause had finally subsided.

Trevor glanced closely at her; there was strong emotion in the accents of her voice. If only he were less diffident in speaking, surely it would not be hard to win a girl with such sensitive feelings.

"We'll go outside then now. You'll put on your cloak?"

"I suppose I'd better. Thank you very much!"

Ralph's hand trembled a little as he adjusted the cloak around her.

"I'd turn the collar up," he suggested.

It was a simple remark, but something in the voice made her look into his face. It was very pale, and there was a queer haunting expression in his eyes. As they passed out together, their shoulders accidentally brushed one another. A new and tremendous knowledge for which Maud had been groping thrilled her from head to foot.

As for Trevor, he moved like a man in a dream. Unconsciously their steps took one of the more obscure paths where two only could walk abreast, and in a minute they found themselves away from the bright lights of the pavilion, away from the chattering crowd, along with the magic and rapture of thoughts that were far too deep for immediate words. Ralph was tongue-tied. Fearful of disappointment, he could not put the great, great question hanging on his lips. It was the girl who spoke first.

"Do you mind if we sit down on this seat. I am tired."

It was true. The gust of personal felings which she had never experienced before took much of the strength out of her.

They sat down under the shadow of the shrubs. A slip of the moon just showed through an opening above. It was the very night for intimate confession, and yet through pride and timidity Trevor seemed likely to let the golden chance go by.

In that brief glance before they left the building Maud had read him like a book. She was always a girl of intuitions, and she could trust them. Yes, she was loved, and the note from her own heart was no echo but a responsive voice. She had been offered love twice before—in very plain words too—but she had never felt like this, though nothing had been said. Dare she reply to a question that was not openly put? Surely, surely, if the reason at which she guessed prevented Trevor from speaking!

"You looked very strange just now," she said slowly. "I think I understand. I know you so well and—words aren't always necessary, are they? There!"

She put out her hand. He took it, and at last the words came.

"Maud, I can tell you now. I love you, dear."

"And I you, as you know. Did it matter my speaking first? Love was so mutual, Ralph, wasn't it?"

And they sealed that matter of mutual affinity in the usual way.

* * * * * * *

Three months after the date of their engagement Maud was spending one Saturday afternoon with Trevor in his home looking over some of his treasures.

"Oh, you keep a newspaper cutting book!" she observed. "How interesting!"

"Yes, I once had a mania for writing to papers."

"What's this? A lot of letters on 'Should Women Propose?' I seem to remember——"

"They're silly, Maud. Pass on!"

"Wait a moment! Is this yours, signed R. T.?"

"Yes, that's mine!"

Her eyes scanned it, and travelled to the next.

"How funny, Ralph; why, the next one is by me!"

"You? You were that Maud?"

"I was that Maud. I'm not now. Oh, how stupid and childish it reads. Don't circumstances change one's opinions?"

"They certainly do. Let me see what you wrote!"

Their heads bent together over the page. They raised them simultaneously, and she looked him roguishly in the eyes.

"Oh, dear!" she sighed, "I'm wearing an engagement ring" (she touched it lovingly) "and you didn't speak first, did you, Ralph?"

Herbert Jamieson.

Extremely Silly.

CLARA: "Well, dear, I am going to marry the Earl of Broadstairs." Maud: "Then, what are you looking so glum about it for?" Clara: "I am afraid my fiancé won't like it. Men are so silly."

Girls Will be Girls.

ADELINE: "What would you do if you were in my shoes?" Madge (after a glance at them): "Get a pair about four times smaller."

A Good Reason.

"HULLO, Jones, what are you doing with your coat buttoned up to your chin? Are you ill?" Jones: "Hush; don't mention it. I have on a tie that my wife chose."

One Thing She Hadn't Seen.

"AND now," said the country cousin to the City girl, "I have shown you everything on the farm." "Oh, George, you haven't done any such thing. Why, I heard father say before I started that you had a mortgage on it that covered nine-tenths of the ground."

Papa Forgot Himself.

LITTLE NELL: "I don't like my papa one bit. He's awful selfish." Mamma: "Is he?" Little Nell: "Yes. He nearly sat down on my dollie, an' then, instead of takin' another chair, he took her chair right away from her, an' left her on the hard floor."

Thought She Was Qualified.

MRS. DE JAR: "Is there an idiot asylum near here?" Mr. De Jar: "I believe so." "Do they take people on their own recommendation?" "My stars! How should I know? Why?" "Oh, nothing, only to-day I got hold of a package of my old love-letters."

The Lion and the Carrot.

A YOUNG married lady was explaining the difference between silver and electro to a small domestic, and said: "Mary, you will always find a 'lion' on anything that is real silver." "Yes, mum," said Mary, "I'll remember, and I've heard say as there is always carrots on gold, though I ain't seen them."

What She Said.

CLARA: "Oh, I am so glad to see you! I have some good news." Maud: "What can it be? A proposal?" Clara: "Yes. But you don't know who it's from." Maud: "Let me see. Why, it must be from—from——" Clara: "Charlie Haskins." Maud (hiding her surprise): "Oh, yes, of course. What did he say, dear?" Clara: "Oh, he was so nice. He began by declaring that he had always thought of me." Maud: "Then—he was sitting in the chair, wasn't he? He moved over to the sofa and took your hand in both of his, and told you how he had gradually learnt to love you, and remarked incidentally that he thought that kind of love was the more lasting." Clara: "Why, so he did!" Maud: "Then he was silent for a time, and finally said you must excuse him, but he was so overcome by his emotions. Then his arm slipped round your waist, and he said you were the only girl he had ever cared for in his whole life, adding he could not live without you. No, no, that would be impossible. And would you not say just the one little word that would make him, oh, so happy?" Clara: Well, I don't see how you know, but it was something like that." Maud: "And what was your answer?" Clara (beaming): "Why, dear, what would you have said?" Maud: "I said no."

A Very Different Colour.

"I SUPPOSE the baby is a delicate pink—eh, Smith?" Smith: "No. He's a robust yeller."

Not Always Thus.

TRAMP: "Madam, I was not always thus." Madam: "No. It was your other arm you had in a sling this morning."

Couldn't Master Those.

WICKERS: "They tell me, professor, that you have mastered all the modern tongues." Professor: "All but two—my wife's and her mother's."

Two Birds.

HE: "Will you marry me?" She: "No." He: "Then will you marry Harry Sawyer? He wanted me to ask you for him, too, while I was about it."

Bertha was Cautious.

BERTHA: "Grandma, is oor teef good?" Grandma: "No, darling; I've got none now, unfortunately." Bertha: "Then I'll give oo my nuts to mind till I come back."

No Family Likeness.

"AND are you the captain's boy?" asked the old lady on deck. "Yes'm," he replied. "Well, you don't look like him at all," she said, "and I never would have believed it."

Willie's Ambition.

"WILLIE," said the visitor, "what is your ambition?" "I'd like," said the boy, putting down his yellow-covered story of the plains, "to have people tremble like leaves at the mere mention of my name."

Wasted Sympathy.

"AND that is your answer?" "It is. But I hope my refusal will not cause you unhappiness, Mr. Perkins." "No, indeed. Smith said you'd snap up the first man that offered himself, and I bet him you wouldn't. I'm a box of cigars ahead."

A Source of Income.

MINISTER'S WIFE: "I think it is perfectly scandalous the Widow Bentley marrying again, and for the fourth time. Don't you think so, my dear?" Minister: "Well, it would hardly be right for me to say anything against Mrs. Bentley, my dear; she has been too good a customer of mine."

Diplomatic Wickwire.

MRS. WICKWIRE: "From the happy expression you had when Mrs. Potts was singing, one might imagine that you enjoyed that sort of thing. You don't break out into happy smiles over my singing." Mr. Wickwire: "I wasn't smiling over her singing. I was just thinking how lucky I was that she belonged to Potts instead of to myself."

Perfectly Safe.

THEY were standing at the front gate. "Won't you come into the parlour and sit a little while, Georgie, dear?" "N-no, I think not," replied Georgie hesitatingly. "I wish you would," the girl went on; "it's so awfully lonely. Mother has gone out, and father is upstairs groaning with rheumatism in the legs." "Both legs?" asked George. "Yes, both legs." "Then I'll come in."

Excellent References.

A MAN who looked extremely suspicious applied at a boarding-house for a home, and was received by the landlady. "I presume," she said, after inspecting him critically and hearing what he had to say, "that you can give references?" "What kind do you wish, madam?" he inquired with a smile. "Well," she hesitated, "I don't know who you are, and I would like something in the way of a recommendation." "All I can offer, madam," he said, pulling out some papers, "are here; they are receipted bills from every landlady I ever boarded with, up to date, as you will observe." Her face brightened. "Oh," she exclaimed, "that will do. You can have anything in the house you want."

Digitized by Google

The Parting of the Ways.

A Pathetic Little Love Incident.

BERTHA, standing at the window of the room, held a seashell to her ear. By her on a table was a vase, a sea-gull with wings curved curiously under, for the holding of flowers. Her left hand rested on the gull.

At the back of the room among a laughing crowd sat Ernest. He was busily engaged in drawing caricatures.

A young girl drew near to Bertha.

"Why do you hold the shell to your ear so long?" she asked.

"I am listening," she explained, "to the sound of the sea. No matter how far inland you take it, a shell like this sings of the sea. It is like the soul singing of eternity."

"Bertha, Bertha!" voices came calling from the other end of the room. "Come. Have your caricature drawn. Look. Such ears, such noses, such mouths! Stand still for yours. There, Ernest, she is posing. Commence."

Ernest took a fresh sheet of paper. He sharpened his pencil to a point.

"A little this way," he commanded. "Now." And he scratched it swiftly over the paper, drawing.

The others gathered round him, some kneeling by his side, others leaning over.

"Splendid!" they cried. "Oh, Bertha, if you could only see! It is worse than ours. Those eyes!"

They laughed convulsively, one girl until she coughed.

By and by Ernest, rising, presented the picture to Bertha with an elaborate bow in which the slim white fingers grotesquely swept the floor.

She looked at the sketch a moment, frowned almost imperceptibly, and laid it back on the table.

Ernest reached out his hand for it.

"Shall I tear it up?" he asked.

"No," replied Bertha. "Leave it there. I want it for future reference."

The chill of her manner fell upon the rest. They dispersed in twos and threes, some going into the drawing-room, where they played duets and sang snatches of song, others to the little parlour glimmering through the width of open doors, and the two were left alone.

"I have offended you," said Ernest; adding, "It seems to me that lately I am always offending you."

"It is hardly your fault," she returned gently. "It is the fault of our natures; that is all. They clash."

"Sit here," he begged, pushing forward a chair, "and let us talk about it."

She sat down and idly took up the caricature. He, opposite, watched her face as she studied it.

"And this is how you see me," she mused. "There is something abnormal about it. The artist nature is perforce peculiar, else it would not be an artist. It is almost impossible. The nature of the caricaturist is impossible. To see people and things so distorted suggests distortion in the one who sees. It is as if your mind were a twisted X-ray which fantastically reveals the skeleton."

Leaning back in the armchair he had taken, he regarded her out of amused eyes.

"Go on," he insisted. "Don't spare my feelings."

He said it laughingly, but there was a cynical look about his mouth that she had got to know.

"The picture is as I shall look ten years hence," she went on. "If you are always to see me ten years older than I am, all the saints and angels protect me! Such foresight is rife for the breeding of unhappiness."

"You cross bridges before you get to them, Bertha. You borrow trouble."

"Sometimes it is just as well, Ernest."

"Yes."

"We shall never be happy together."

"If it was the drawing of the picture, Bertha, that was a little thing. Let me tear it up and let it be as if it had never been drawn. Will you?"

"Life is made up of little things. They are the straws that show the way the wind is blowing. No; don't tear it up. I want it for future reference, as I said. I want to be reminded by it that if I should be married to you not only my face but my every action would be distorted thus."

"No, no!"

"Yes. And that is not all. We are too alike for happiness. Both sensitive as flowers, both jealous. We quarrel now; we would quarrel then. After marriage the making up is not so sweet as before. It grows monotonous, and then come the sleepless nights and the tears—the tears. Already with me they have commenced. The night you kissed Mabel I waked at four o'clock and never closed my eyes again. I lay still, half heartbroken, watching the pattern of the paper on the wall grow out of dimness and take to itself its old fantastic shape in the light of the dawn."

"Mabel is hardly seventeen. She is only a child."

"Children grow to be women, and soon. Suppose we were married and two years from now she came to our house and you kissed her again."

She tapped trembling fingers on the arm of her chair.

"I should die of it," she faltered.

He drew up his chair nearer and, taking the trembling fingers in his own, he caressed them.

"Somewhere or other in Grimm's fairy tales," he said, "there is just this sort of story. Isn't there a girl who goes down in the cellar and sits there weeping because some day she might marry and the storks might bring her a little child, and the little child might fall down the steps to that cellarway and break its leg?"

"It is only when you love a man," she continued to muse, following up her own train of thought, "that you lose the blessed sleep that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care."

"Didn't I come to you early the next morning and comfort you, Bertha?"

"Her kiss was on your lips," she answered.

With a shrug of his shoulders he laughed.

"You are ridiculous," he affirmed.

"Once you were mine," she resumed, as if he had not spoken. "I should want you to be all mine. So far as I have been able to judge, no man ever belonged solely to one woman. Therefore, since the thing is impossible, it is best to tear ourselves apart before it is too late."

He dropped her fingers.

"You speak very coldly of tearing ourselves apart, Bertha," he complained.

"I am not cold, but I scent unhappiness. Living alone is a negative unhappiness. Living together would be positive."

After a pause, she continued—

"Besides, I am a rover. Already I have stayed in this one place too long. I begin to grow restless again."

"If you put your head on my shoulder a little while, wouldn't that take away your restlessness?"

Digitized by Google

"For a little while, perhaps; but it would return, and then I should have to go back again to my Mother Nature for comfort. She comforts with flowers, with dew, with soft, sweet breezes, but most of all with the sea. The moan of it, the sob, the sometime sigh; its lights—rose lights, white lights, soft, mellow lights of the setting sun—drifting while you look into the silver shimmer of a crescent moon. I long for the sea."

"Bertha, you make me sad, as sad, sitting there, as if you were alone, longing for the sea. You are not alone, my sweetheart. I am here."

She regarded him with a gaze that seemed not to see him.

"For months I have studied you," she began. "You have given me much happiness, but more unhappiness. If you had not overbalanced the happiness with the unhappiness you would not have been a man."

There came a look about his mouth which was like that of a hurt child. She had grown to know that also.

"You have many lovable qualities," she soothed, "but with the exaggeration of the artistic temperament you possess an exaggerated power to hurt. This you make use of frequently. My life with you would be part ecstatic happiness and part acute despair. And the despair, I am afraid, would far outweigh the happiness."

The snatches of song drifted from the drawing-room in upon the silence which had fallen between them.

"Alone we come into the world," she said slowly, "and alone we go out of it. But I, it seems, am one of those creatures born only to live alone from the cradle to the grave. I wish to be the only one. Few women in this old world have that happiness. I can hardly dare to hope that it will be meted out to me."

"You are the only one with me now, Bertha."

"Now!" she repeated. "The 'now' is characteristic. I am your girl while the summer lasts, but there are winters to come and other summer times. How will it be then? Others came before me. Others will follow."

He shook his head in dissent.

"I know your nature," she averred. "It is summed up in one word—'artist.' There are many synonyms for the word—volatile, ephemeral, vacillating, irresolute, weak. But the one word suffices. To turn it into an adjective you are artist and that describes you."

He rose.

"I will go," he said, "and come back by this way again when you are in better humour."

"If you are wise," said she, rising also, "you will never come back."

He stopped short.

"Do you mean that, Bertha?" he questioned, the words coming distinctly clear with a touch of infinite sadness.

"I mean it," asserted she.

He made a step forward.

"Will you kiss me good-bye, then?" he asked.

"If I kissed you I should want to keep you, and I am very sure that it is best for you to go."

He walked through the room out into the hall to the door. He put his hand on the knob and looked back at her. Though her face had paled to the whiteness of her gown she made no effort to recall him. He turned the knob and went out. The door shut on him.

She started forward with a sharp, quick cry as if she would have opened the door. Then, clasping one hand to her heart, she caught up the sea-shell and held it close to her ear, listening.

The group at the piano, rushing laughingly in, found her standing motionless as the statue of a woman with the shell to her ear.

"Are you still listening to the sound of the sea, Bertha?" they asked.

"Still listening," she answered, "to the sound of the sea."

"But why," they queried, "are your eyes so sad?"

"They look on life," she answered, "and life is sad."

Z. A. Norris.

Your Editor Chats.

THIS week I have received the following letter from a Glasgow reader:

"In introducing 'How I Chaperoned Belinda' you tell us that we are to learn how men of honourable names use the basest means to force a young woman into marriage, because she is the heiress to great wealth. Now, seeing that the law in no way forces a woman to share her wealth with her husband, and that the law also allows a woman to abandon her husband (either with or without cause) at any moment she pleases, and, further, that the law compels a man to support his wife, no matter how rich that wife herself may be, does it not seem absurd to expect intelligent people to take an interest in the so-called 'revelations'? Had you given us some accounts of the base means used by women to ensnare a wealthy young man into marriage they would no doubt have been worth reading, as, in that case, they need not have been ridiculous."

I am glad to have an opportunity of clearing up this point, which may have occurred to many other readers. What my correspondent says concerning a married woman is undoubtedly correct. She has the control of her money and can claim her liberty at will—if she has the courage. I must point out, however, that the series of articles criticised deal not with a married woman, but with an inexperienced unmarried girl of seventeen. A girl of that age, with but a limited knowledge of the world, is not likely to have as keen a grasp of the law as my Glasgow friend appears to think. Certainly we never met one with so exhaustive a comprehension of the Married Women's Property Act!

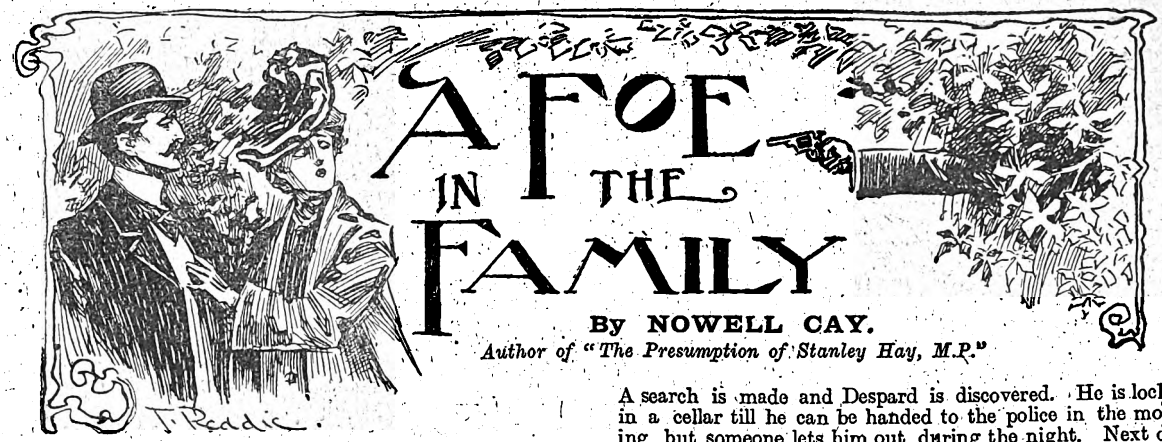
The case of Belinda is, unfortunately, a typical one. Every year men of wealth, but of plebeian origin, on this and the other side of the Atlantic, procure titled husbands for their daughters. The fact is palpable—refer to the list of fashionable marriages. How often this is done against the daughter's inclination it is our purpose to show. The bargain is concluded in hard cash, the title is bought for so many thousands down, and the girl is handed over to the tender mercies of the husband her father's wealth has bought. Once married she can, of course, leave that husband when she likes. But how few young girls have the knowledge or the courage necessary to take a step that invariably incurs the odium of Society! Surely prevention is better than cure, and it is in the hope that in calling attention to this matrimonial sale and barter we may quicken public feeling against it, that we have decided to set forth the facts contained in Lady Peggy Carstairs' revelations.

I am always delighted to receive criticisms of any of the stories that appear in this little paper, whether such criticisms are favourable or otherwise, and I am delighted to be able to say that all those letters I have received concerning the opening chapters of "How I Chaperoned Belinda" (with the one exception above) express the great appreciation that readers feel concerning them. One correspondent in particular, who seems to know what he is talking about, says:

"I like David Carr already, for I think him a rattling good Britisher, and I do not think Lady Peggy will get rid of him so quickly as she thinks. A man's true love in the middle classes is not so easily brushed aside as it is in the 'smart set.' David's personation to get near his love is remarkably witty, and Honoria being embraced by the Egyptian is just as it should be, and, in my opinion, could not be nearer the truth. Being a Customs House officer myself, I have a lot of dealings with big passenger boats, and I have heard and seen enough to convince me that all Lady Peggy is writing is genuine."

YOUR EDITOR.

Digitized by Google



By NOWELL CAY.

Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

A Plot to be Frustrated.

GEORGE ILDEN, Baron, of Ilden Castle, while staying with his uncle Jasper, at Pennybrook Hall, suddenly discovers that several suspicious events which have taken place during his stay at the Hall, point to the existence of a plot against his life. He has been shot at, poison has been placed in his pocket-flask, and other attempts, fortunately futile, have been made on his life. He confides in Cathie Hay, his cousin, and they agree that as many members of his own family would materially benefit by his death, the attempts must have their origin in that direction. They suspect Percival, Ilden's cousin. Ilden asks Cathie to marry him, as a means of circumventing his enemies' designs, but she has to refuse.

At about this time he meets Florence Courthorpe, the sister of an old college chum who was drowned while boating. She is very poor, and has taken a situation as governess at Witterby, a village not far from Pennybrook. In seeking to escape his foe, Ilden inadvertently settles down just opposite Florence's temporary home.

Late one night Florence sees a man attempt to enter Ilden's bedroom window with evident criminal designs. She leaves the house clad only in dressing-gown and warns Ilden of his danger. For this exploit her employer dismisses her.

She now has no home, so next day leaves Witterby to stay with some friends at Lallerton. Ilden accompanies her. Arrived at Lallerton, however, they discover that Florence's friends, the Despards, have left suddenly, and no trace of them can be found. Florence, of course, is greatly distressed.

Ilden, however, feeling that he is responsible for her position, and desiring to baulk his enemy, proposes to her, is accepted, and marries her secretly. An announcement in the papers informs his family of the wedding.

Shortly after their marriage Ilden receives a message urging him to return to Pennybrook, his uncle Rupert being dangerously ill. Leaving his wife at the apartments he has taken at Sydenham, Ilden leaves for Pennybrook. He is met at the Hall by Cathie, who informs him that his uncle is dead, and that he is again exposing his life to danger.

Cathie informs him of her belief that Guy Despard is in the plot, and insinuates that his own wife, being a friend of the Despards, is possibly implicated.

That night her fears for his safety are shown to be well founded. For in the middle of the night the alarm bell is violently rung, and as Ilden opens his door to ascertain the cause, an attempt is made to stab him. Ilden immediately gives chase to his would-be murderer, and, catching him, throws him down, and is half-strangling him when Grant appears with a light, the rays of which show Ilden's captive to be none other than his cousin Percival. Percival, however, declares that he saw Despard entering Ilden's room and thought he was stabbing at him.

A search is made and Despard is discovered. He is locked in a cellar till he can be handed to the police in the morning, but someone lets him out during the night. Next day Ilden leaves the Hall to make inquiries regarding Despard at Lallerton, and finds that Despard has been there before him and knows of Lady Ilden's assumed name of Mrs. George and her hiding place at Sydenham.

He immediately changes his plans and hurries to Sydenham, only to find that Florence has gone, no one knows whither.

It appears that shortly after Ilden had left his wife to go to Pennybrook, a girl had called on Florence, and had asked her to go to the death-bed of her friend, Miss Despard, who was living close by. While gazing at her unconscious friend, the maid had made the astonishing announcement that Lord Ilden was not Florence's husband, but the husband of the dying Miss Despard. Unable to realise the import of the words, Florence had simply replied, "Lord Ilden is my husband."

(The above is a short synopsis of the opening chapters.)

"He is My Husband!"

SHE spoke the words bravely in spite of the terrible fear clutching at her heart, the fear that she would not allow herself to realise.

The maid changed colour at this open expression of disbelief.

"If he is your husband, then it is funny that he should want you to live with him here under a false name," she said mercilessly, and Florence made no answer.

She could not explain to this girl, but of course the explanation was a full and satisfactory one for herself. She tried to deafen her ears to the mocking voice that said it was not. There had seemed something unreal and impossible in the plot against her husband all along.

What, said the voice, if it were only a pretence, intended to make her agree to a secret marriage, hurried on without any introduction to her husband's friends—any acknowledgment by them of the tie?

For the moment she had lost consciousness of the silent figure on the bed, and she started, every nerve quivering, as a faint but perfectly articulate call came from it.

"Clara!"

The maid was bending over her mistress instantly.

"Yes, miss, I am here."

"Is Mr. Guy here?" asked the voice, weakly.

"No, miss, he was here this afternoon, but he has gone away again.

"I heard you talking. I suppose that it is nurse."

Florence came forward, her heart beating violently at the thought that the moment of perfect consciousness which the doctor had anticipated had come.

"It is I, Florrie," she said, her voice trembling, and the dying girl smiled faintly, as their lips met.

"Poor Florrie," she said softly, "I am so sorry! But I hope that he really loves you, and I shall not stand in your way now. I felt very bitter just at first, when I saw your name in the paper; but I felt that you could not know, and I suppose he never loved me really, although I have trusted him all through."

The words came slowly and with an effort, and Florence seemed to hold her breath listening. The name she dreaded to hear had not yet passed the dying woman's lips.

She had paused as if to collect her thoughts.

"I am sorry that Guy is not here," she went on, even more feebly. "I should have liked to have told him. It cannot matter to George, or affect his prospects, now that I am dying; and it might make poor Guy less bitter against him if he knew that we were really married. I told him a lie to please George. I should like you to tell Guy if you see him, and tell him that I want him to forgive Lord Ilden. He must put away this terrible idea of taking his life. You will urge him for yourself, will you not, to put away these thoughts of revenge, although Lord Ilden has injured you too? You would not have Guy injure him?"

She paused for an answer, and Florence's voice came almost as low and faint as hers.

"No, I love him."

"Then you will not tell Guy where he is? He has sworn that when he sees him he will take his life. You will not tell him?"

The heart of her listener gave a great throb. Suddenly, as in a flash, it came to her that it was Guy Despard who had been waiting outside the lighted window of the inn at Witterby. He had been at Pennybrook when Ilden's life had been attempted in the coppice. It was because she had told him where his enemy was that he had gone away without waiting for his sister to recover consciousness, hoping that he could come back to her with news that he had taken the life of the man who had broken her heart.

"You will not tell him?" the dying woman urged again, as she remained silent, paralysed by the thoughts which crowded into her mind. "George has injured you deeply, I know. I suppose that he must be cruel and unfair, although it is so hard to think it. I have had bitter moments after I saw the announcement of his marriage, when I have felt as though it would be right for him to die. I thought of him breaking your heart as he has broken mine, and I almost felt that Guy was right. But it is for God to avenge, not man, and I only pray now that poor Guy may not find him."

Florence's voice, harsh and strained, interrupted her.

"It is too late. I have told your brother where Lord Ilden is."

But even the tragedy in her voice seemed unable to shadow the tired serenity of the girl who lay dying.

Her eyes had closed wearily.

"Poor George!" she murmured drowsily, and after a pause, "Poor Guy!"

They were her last words.

Florence had fallen on her knees by the side of the bed, and she seemed to awake from semi-unconsciousness to find the doctor and nurse in the room. The latter was speaking to her.

"She is gone, poor dear, and no grieving can bring her back."

Florence rose to her feet unsteadily; but her thoughts were not of the tragedy of death which had taken place before her eyes so much as of the tragedy of the living in which she had unconsciously played such an important part.

Guy Despard was on his way to Pennybrook to kill George. She could not doubt it. For what other reason would he have left the death-bed of the sister to whom he was devoted? Despard was on his way to kill George, and it was she who had betrayed the latter to his enemy.

He had deceived her, perhaps. She could not think clearly of that. Daisy had said that he was not her husband. But whatever he was or had done she loved him, and she had betrayed him. It was for her to save him. Her mind held no other thought.

Already she was losing valuable time when she ought to have been following him to Pennybrook, and she only waited to bid a silent, tearless farewell to the silent figure of the girl she had loved as a sister, before leaving the house to begin her journey.

A feverish impatience possessed her now, and she made her way direct to the station without even returning to the house in the next avenue which had been her home, and which she realised vaguely would never be her home again.

Florence Visits Pennybrook.

THE night that at Pennybrook Hall was disturbed by the capture of Guy Despard was spent by poor Lady Ilden at a York Hotel. She had advanced that far on her journey only to find that the last train even for Rickerby had gone, and she had spent the night without sleep, only waiting till the morning should come to make the continuation of her journey possible.

The interruption had come as a great blow to her, killing the hope that had made her journey to the North one long fever of impatience.

When she went on in the morning it was with a dull hopelessness, a feeling that Fate had been unkind and that she was doomed to be too late.

It was a pale, pathetic ghost of the happy girl-wife of Sydenham who reached Pennybrook at last, barely fifteen minutes, had she known it, after Ilden had started on his disturbing visit to Lallerton. Only fifteen minutes that might have made everything so different, which might even have averted the final tragedy.

Catherine Hay had barely returned to the Hall after seeing George off at the station when Florence approached the house, the terrible foreboding in her heart quickened almost to a certainty by the sight of the drawn blinds. Somebody was dead at the Hall. Who could it be but George? She had come too late to warn him. And he had been all the world to her. It held nothing but him.

She hesitated uncertainly in dread of the confirmation of her fears which must meet her when she reached the house and made her inquiries, but her trembling limbs carried her on.

Wardle, the old butler, answered her timid ring, and was not a little exercised in his mind as to who the beautiful girl could be whose white face seemed in a way familiar, and who inquired so timidly whether Lord Ilden was at the Hall.

She stared at him with a strange incredulity when he said that his lordship had left the house half an hour earlier, as if she suspected him of a wilful attempt to deceive her.

"But the blinds are drawn. Somebody is dead," she said.

"Yes, ma'am, Mr. Rupert, the master's brother."

She remembered for the first time since she left Sydenham, that it was to see his uncle, who was ill, that George had left her. If he had deceived her, this at least was true. Her heart leapt to know that the mocking voice had for once been wrong. At Sydenham by Daisy Despard's death-bed it had suggested that this was an excuse he had made for deserting her.

"And can you tell me where he has gone?" she asked.

Wardle could not say. He would inquire,

"THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY," Our New Serial, Commences Shortly.

Digitized by Google

and he was asking her into the hall to wait when she stopped him with another anxious question.

"Do you know whether a Mr. Despard has been here to see Lord Ilden either last night or this morning."

The butler's face changed instantly. His master had just been announcing that he would give a reward of twenty pounds to the person who recaptured this Despard or the accomplice who had unbolted his prison door.

"Yes, ma'am," he said diplomatically, "may I ask whether you are a friend of Mr. Despard's?"

She was answering in the affirmative, leaping at the hope that she might meet her friend's brother and turn him from his purpose, when a girl of about her own age came forward from the hall, her naturally pleasant face clouded with angry suspicion.

Catherine had been passing through the hall and overheard what had passed. Here was a friend, probably an accomplice of the man who threatened her cousin's life, who evidently had not yet heard that the identity of her ally had been discovered. The opportunity of obtaining damaging admissions from her was not to be lost, and she disappointed Wardle, who had been thinking exactly the same thing, by taking the matter into her own hands.

"If you will come in," she said trying to keep the suspicion and hostility which stirred her out of her voice, "I can give you any information you want about Mr. Despard and Lord Ilden. You can wait here, Wardle."

She was leading the way to a little room opening from the hall, and felt safer for the presence of the old butler outside. The accomplice of a man like Despard might be dangerous.

But even to Catherine the precaution seemed a little absurd when she was able to observe her visitor clearly. This graceful girl, with her beautiful and anxious face, was as different as she could be from the typical desperado. Her big violet eyes were so pathetic in their questioning anxiety that Cathie found it difficult to steel her heart against her. But the suspicion that these same violet eyes had clouded her cousin's judgment made her voice cold.

"You are a friend of Mr. Despard's, I think you said. May I ask why you inquire for him here?"

"I have a message for him from his sister who is just dead," said Florence. "If you know where he is, I must beg you to let me know at once. It is of the utmost importance."

Catherine resisted the appeal.

"What I was trying to ascertain is why you should expect to find Mr. Despard here?" she said with as much indifference as she could command.

"I have reason to know that he is following Lord Ilden."

Catherine nodded. This was the admission she had been anxious to obtain.

"You are a friend of Mr. Despard's, and you knew that he was following Lord Ilden," she said judicially. "Can you tell me why he was following him?"

But poor Florence could restrain her anxiety no longer.

"Something has happened," she cried. "Lord Ilden is dead. Why will you not tell me?"

Cathie found it more necessary than ever to steel herself against the agony in the appeal that sounded so real.

"You knew, then, that this Despard intended to take his life. He made the attempt, but I am glad to tell you that it was unsuccessful. Your friend is at the present a fugitive from justice with a price set on his recapture."

Cathie felt half afraid of the open but justifiable hostility she was showing as she watched her visitors' face. It seemed impossible to believe that the glow of relief over-spreading it could be anything but genuine. Her own hostility seemed lost sight of.

"And Lord Ilden was not injured?" she asked, anxiously.

"Thanks to the courage and promptitude of his cousin, Mr. Grant Ilden, he escaped without a scratch. But you have not told me who you are."

Florence looked at the questioner hesitatingly. She had entered Pennybrook Hall with even more vague apprehension than Catherine had felt in admitting her. Clearly, as it seemed to be shown all Lord Ilden's danger was due to Guy Despard and his resentment on Daisy's account, she could not entirely free herself of the distrust which he had made her feel of his relatives. She could still remember that he had imagined it unsafe for anybody at Pennybrook Hall to know where she was, and, although she had been compelled to transgress his wishes and show herself there, she was still hoping to hide her identity.

"I would rather that you did not ask me, please," she said quickly. "I only want to know where Lord Ilden is gone, so that I may follow and warn him. You say that Mr. Despard is still hiding?"

Catherine's face clouded with fresh suspicion at the refusal. If, as she had suspected from the first, this was the adventuress whom George had made his wife, what object could she have in hiding her identity, unless she was playing a part of which she did not want her husband to hear.

"But if you do not give me your name," she said, "how do I know that you are not in league with this man, Despard, with whose plot against my cousin's life you admit yourself acquainted? How do I know that you are not seeking Lord Ilden's whereabouts to betray them to your accomplice?"

And she opened the door.

"Wardle, will you ask your master to come here?"

The butler hurried away to obey the order. But Florence had already taken alarm at it. The Honourable Jasper Ilden would probably recognise her, and her identity could be hidden no longer. Her nervous fear of her husband's relatives came back with redoubled force. They would not tell her where Lord Ilden was. They might even detain her. She had run into the danger against which her husband had warned her. And with a sudden remorse she realised that she had disobeyed him uselessly. At the best she had done no good. She might for all she knew have fallen into a plot which he saw more clearly than she.

She made her way to the door.

"I do not wish to see anybody," she said with dignity. "You will not tell me where Lord Ilden is. I must discover for myself. Please allow me to pass."

For Catherine, more suspicious than ever, had her back to the door. The fact made her visitor desperate, and she exerted all her strength to fling it open. Once out of the room into which she had been entrapped she would be able to get away from the house and escape.

But as she reached the hall a fresh obstacle presented itself. Two young men were entering from the grounds, and for a moment she stopped hopelessly. Then with a sudden thrill of happy surprise she started forward, calling her husband's name.

But the hope lived only for a moment. As the elder of the two young men turned his face she realised that she had made a mistake. It was not her husband, and panic seized her again. Catherine was close behind her, red and excited, the two men staring in surprise in the doorway.

Then Percival Ilden came forward raising his hat.

"Lady Ilden, I believe. You have heard of this attempt

"THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY," Our Splendid New Serial, will Commence Shortly.

Digitized by Google

on Ilden's life, and come to assure yourself of his safety. I am afraid that he has already left Pennybrook."

To the frightened girl, prejudiced in his favour by his superficial resemblance to George, his voice sounded sympathetic. She turned to him appealingly.

"You will tell me where he has gone, and let me follow him to warn him of his danger?"

"I imagine that Ilden has received as much warning as he needs," said Percival; "but of course you will be anxious to join him."

Grant, who remained in the doorway, had eyes only for Catherine. It was apparent that some hostile passage had taken place between the two girls, and the fact sickened him. Had Catherine allowed her jealousy to carry her so far as that?

"Surely nobody wishes to prevent you following your husband, Lady Ilden?" he said suspiciously, and her instinctive glance at Catherine answered the question eloquently.

But she was replying to Percival, on whom her hopes of escape centred themselves.

"I have a message to Mr. Despard from his sister which might change his terrible purpose. If he finds my husband, and I am sure that he is pursuing him still, I must be there to make them understand."

Percival changed colour.

"You have a message from Despard's sister?"

"A dying message," she answered quickly, "which must surely affect him. She died yesterday, and they were her last words"

Percival's face had grown even more ghastly. He was not sorry that Catherine saved him the necessity of replying. He wanted time to think.

Grant's glance had made Cathie's colour flame higher, and made her feel the need of justifying herself. Perhaps it had made her wonder a little also whether the justification was possible. As usual, she had acted on impulse, and was troubled now by the second thoughts that always punish impulsive action. Had she permitted her prejudice to make her unjust and horrible? The girl's admitted acquaintance with the Despards seemed to awaken no suspicion in the minds of the men listening to her.

"Lady Ilden would not tell me her name, although I guessed it," she said, hotly still. "She admits that she knew Despard was coming here to attempt George's life. I do not think we ought to let her go until she tells us how she knew."

"She has already told us," said Grant coldly. "She is acquainted with the man's sister, and received a death-bed confession from her yesterday, which naturally brought her here."

"She ought at least to tell us why her friend, Despard, has been attempting George's life," protested Cathie. "If she will tell us that, I shall be willing to admit that she is not Despard's accomplice."

"An accomplice of the man who has attempted her husband's life!" cried Grant, sharply. "That is preposterous."

"And as for Despard's motive, that is of more importance for Ilden to know than for us," put in Percival. "We only waste Lady Ilden's time when she ought to be joining her husband. I can quite understand your eagerness, Lady Ilden, and will see you to the station at once, if I may."

The sound of footsteps on the stairs, which warned him that his uncle and the butler were approaching, made him throw open the door impatiently, and he was relieved to find Florence fully as eager as himself to leave the house. She followed him gratefully, welcoming the quick pace at which he strode down the avenue.

The master of the house reached the hall, to find the suspect gone.

"What is this," he said thickly to Grant, "Wardle tells me that we have an accomplice of Despard's here?"

(Continued on next page.)

Slept for Three Months.

No one has ever explained satisfactorily the mysterious arts of the Indian jugglers. One of these men performed some time ago the remarkable feat of putting himself to sleep, and allowing himself to be buried in a sealed vault for three months. This trick of being able to induce at pleasure a prolonged sleep is one which, were the secret generally known, would save a great amount of suffering, for when one cannot obtain proper rest at night by reason of pain, the whole system becomes undermined, and rendered exposed to diseases even deadly in their nature. It was while she was in this condition that Chas. Forde's bile beans came to the rescue of Mrs. Davidson of Dunhead Farm, Monikie, near Dundee. "For twenty years," said she to a Dundee newspaper man, "a night's sound sleep was denied me on account of acute biliousness and indigestion. Night after night I sat up in bed racked with pain. I had awful pains across my back, shoulders, and stomach, and I was also subject to dizziness. Often a mist would rise up before my eyes and almost blind me, and the terrible pain would make me feel quite faint. A doctor whom I consulted told me that I should never be properly cured, so you can imagine that I was in despair. One day one of my sons brought me a box of Bile Beans, and I began taking them. For the first few days I felt no better, but then, as I continued to take the beans, my health slowly improved. I got a night's undisturbed sleep, the first for twenty years! Then my ailments slowly but surely left me, until after a few months I found myself quite cured. I can always rely on having a good night's rest now. That it was bile beans alone that cured me I am quite certain, and I shall never be without a box in the house." If you are suffering as Mrs. Davidson did, give bile beans a fair trial, and you, too, will have cause to bless them. For biliousness, indigestion, dizziness, sleeplessness, liver and kidney disorder, Chas. Forde's bile beans are the best possible remedy. They are also a certain cure for constipation, piles, neuralgia, colds, rheumatism, anæmia, and all female ailments. They cost one and three halfpence or two and nine, of all chemists, or from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, E.C. They are a boon to sufferers from sleeplessness, curing this by removing its causes.

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,

Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Digitized by Google

"Catherine will tell you about it. I confess that I cannot understand her view."

Meanwhile Percival had begun to talk as they passed out of the avenue gates, after giving a long backward glance to make sure that they were not being followed.

"Did Miss Hay tell you where Ilden had gone?" he asked, and was relieved to find that Catherine, probably the only person at the Hall who actually knew, had given no information. Catherine's attitude was a complete puzzle to him; but the fact that he could not understand it at all rendered it none the less fortunate for him.

"It is lucky, then, that my cousin took me into his confidence over his plans," he went on easily. "The attack on his life last night, together with the knowledge that the man who wishes to kill him is still at large have, of course, made him very nervous. His idea is to keep out of the way so far as possible, until Despard is captured. My uncle has offered a reward for his arrest, and we are, of course, scouring the neighbourhood. Meanwhile Ilden thought it best to retire to Scotland. You know, of course, that he has a small hunting-box there at Lochtarry?—he wrote to you last night, asking you to meet him there. Did you not get it by this morning's post?"

"I have been travelling all night," she said, her voice trembling a little to think that she must travel so far before her quest was ended. "But if you are quite sure, I shall, of course, go there at once without returning to Sydenham."

Percival glanced over his shoulder once more. Nobody was following.

"Oh, there is no doubt at all that Ilden has gone to Lochtarry. You will probably overtake him, though, before he reaches Edinburgh."

Her face brightened at the hope, but fell again suddenly, and she walked on in troubled silence.

"You think it best to follow your husband at once, do you not?" he asked nervously, as she remained silent, and Florence answered timidly.

"I have no money. I came direct from my poor friend's death-bed with her message, and did not think of money. I had just sufficient in my purse to bring me here, but now——"

He was thankful to remember that he had a five pound note in his pocket, and offered it very gracefully.

Poor Florence felt more than ever grateful to him.

"But I do not know to whom I am indebted for so much kindness," she said, as she accepted it. "You speak of Lord Ilden as your cousin. Are you, then, Mr. Percival Ilden."

She wondered as she spoke that George should have expressed some suspicion of such a man if her surmise were correct.

But Percival had always been chary of giving his name when engaged on an enterprise for which a reckoning might have to be paid.

"No, I am Grant Ilden," he said, and held out his hand to her.

"I am sorry that I cannot see you all the way to the station, but I start very shortly for Mordenhale. My poor father's body is to be taken home to-day."

Prudence had suggested that it would be impolitic to be seen more than was necessary with Lady Ilden, now that his purpose was achieved.

There was little chance now that Daisy Despard's message would be delivered either to her brother or to Ilden till after the funeral at Mordenhale, and by that time, if he judged Despard's mood rightly, one would be dead and the other a murderer under lock and key.

So far, all, apparently, was working exactly as he would have desired.

"THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY," Our New Serial, will commence shortly.

Florence Goes North.

Meanwhile, Catherine had felt her suspicion against "Despard's accomplice" only increased by Percival's championship. For in Ilden's opinion, at least, it was Percival who had permitted the would-be murderer to escape. If George was right, it was not likely that his cousin would wish the woman to be questioned about Despard's motives.

She found it impossible, however, to make the Honourable Jasper share her suspicions.

"Why have they let the young woman go before I have questioned her?" he asked, as Grant turned away with an indignant scorn which he was at no pains to conceal.

"Because she is Lady Ilden," said Catherine, and the old man burst into an amused laugh.

"What! George's new wife and you thought her that man's accomplice. Well, this is a good joke. But you have not let her go away again without taking anything. How far has she come, poor girl?"

"I don't know. Lady Ilden seemed very reticent about her movements. And she certainly had no desire to stay. She took alarm when I sent for you."

Mr. Ilden stared at the tone.

"What do you mean?"

"The fact that she is Lady Ilden does not necessarily prove that she is not Despard's accomplice. If he married an adventuress who only wanted his money and title—she knew that Despard was coming here to try and kill him."

"And came to warn him, I suppose. My dear child, you are talking rubbish. I have seen the girl myself at church, and a very nice girl she seems too. You must not take any notice of the stuff that jealous women like—well—Mrs. Haydon, talk about a pretty woman who has made a good match. If she were an adventuress, she would know better than to let Ilden be killed and lose her position at the Castle. It seems to me that everybody has gone mad about this business. Why, Percy has been telling me that Ilden accuses him of letting that rascal out of the cellar. I hope you have not been saying this sort of thing to the poor girl herself, after the trouble she has had coming here."

"I only suggested sending for you and she took to flight," said Catherine.

"Well, go and bring her back then, and tell her that she had better stay here until George can be wired for. Good gracious, I don't know what George will say when he hears that his wife has been frightened away from the house!"

"Percival is escorting her to the station. If I have been discourteous, I have no doubt that he will atone for it," she said half ironically, thinking meanwhile that the two were spending the time plotting together.

"Oh, if Percival is with her it is all right."

The Honourable Jasper's generous impulses were, as usual, easily satisfied, and he returned to the decanter with which he had been fortifying himself for the funeral arrangements.

Catherine was left to continue her justification of what she had done to herself. And already she was troubled by some very serious misgivings.

As Mr. Ilden had instantly suggested, Lady Ilden's knowledge of Despard's purpose by no means made her an accomplice. It was possible that she had heard of it only in time to take this journey to Pennybrook to warn her husband against it. Had she been implicated she would scarcely have appeared at the house as she had done.

Catherine found herself conjuring up, to her discomfort the picture of an anxious and distraught wife appealing for knowledge of the man she loved, after a night of anxiety, only to be met by suspicion and reticence. And the girl's face had been so sweet and innocent. Was it possible that she had

(Continued on page 702.)

Digitized by Google

Treatment of Deafness. A Speciality.

THE establishment of a special Institute in London for the treatment of defective hearing and diseases of the ears, nose, and throat, marked the beginning of a new era for the deaf, for in the hands of its staff of medical men, who have made deafness a life study, the new Drouet method of treating ear ailments by local application, is now curing an average of 35 cases every month. A full account of this Institute and of the new treatment, is contained in the last issue of the "Journal for the Deaf." This Journal, together with a detailed account of cured cases (whose names and addresses are given), can be obtained free from the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. With the "Journal" there is also enclosed a Report Form, by means of which any sufferer can obtain advice free by correspondence and instructions for home treatment. When possible, however, patients are recommended to call at the Institute for a personal consultation with the Medical Staff, between the hours of 2 to 4 p.m. weekdays.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

WEAR IT FREE

FOR A WEEK!

H. SAMUEL SENDS HIS FAMOUS

"ACME" SILVER LEVER

ON RECEIPT OF P.O. 5/- ONLY

Test it for a Week! If satisfied, remit balance, 20s. and receive a valuable free gift. If not, return watch and your 5/- will be at once refunded.

Solid Silver Cases, fine 3-plate movement, jewelled, dust and damp proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Written Warranty for 7 years. Price 25/- Full amount returned if dissatisfied.

A SILVER ALBERT FREE!

To all remitting full amount 25/- with order. Write now for the GREAT FREE BARGAIN GUIDE.

Nearly 200 Pages, 3,000 Engravings of Watches, Clocks, Cutlery, etc.

ALL THE BEST SEASON'S GIFTS.

Free for a Post-card.

H. SAMUEL,

Dept. 29, Market St., MANCHESTER.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; 14 lbs never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints, etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box.

Headaches Cured Free By ZOX.

ZOX IS FREE TO EVERY READER OF "SHORT STORIES."

The Proprietors of ZOX have such belief in its efficacy that they offer any reader of Short Stories, who will send a stamped envelope, two Free Sample Powders. They will be quite satisfied to abide this test.

NEURALGIA, HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, AND NERVE PAINS.

NEURALGIA is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch which are most liable to the attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple and Sure Remedy, certified free from injurious substance by Dr. A. B Griffiths. The Proprietors of the Remedy offer to send two free sample ZOX powders to any reader of Short Stories who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

RELIEVED ACUTE NEURALGIA.

Ulceby, N. Lincolnshire:—"The Reverend HENRY COX will thank the Zox Co. to send him a 2s. 6d. box of Zox Powders by return of post. They are most efficacious in relieving acute Neuralgia; he does not like being without them. He has given Powders to several, who have experienced great relief."

ZOX Powders can be obtained of Chemists, Stores, etc., at 1s. and 2s. 6d. a box, or post free from

THE ZOX CO., 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

made a mistake? She could never forgive herself if she had.

For a moment she paced the hall in an agony of indecision. Then she put on her hat hurriedly and set off for the station, missing Percival on the way by taking the short cut to the road through the fir coppice.

She had plenty of time she told herself; for no train started for Rickerby on its way either to London or Ilden Market for fully an hour, but the desire to make amends, if amends were needed, made her walk breathlessly.

As she approached the station a train was coming in, but the fact did not affect her for it was going north. It was in the station when she approached the other platform searching in vain there for the figure she expected.

Had Percival not taken her to the station at all she asked herself, with a growing suspicion of the man to compensate for that of his companion.

At the other side of the station they were already closing the doors of the standing train preparatory to its starting again.

But Catherine crossed the bridge without haste. It was only as a matter of form that she was going to assure herself that Lady Ilden was not on the other platform.

The train was beginning to move as she reached it, and the station-master, recognising a lady from the Hall, questioned her with a glance.

Catherine shook her head, she was not going on in the train, and he closed the door he had been holding open.

Then to his astonishment Miss Hay rushed suddenly across the platform, threw open one of the doors for herself, and scrambled into the train just as its speed had made the performance dangerous.

She had acted as usual on impulse, the turn being given to her decision by the fact that the face she had seen at the window of the compartment, and recognised, was the face of a woman in tears.

(The plot against Ilden comes near to being unravelled in next Tuesday's instalment.)

Another New Serial.

THE story which starts in a fortnight's time will, as I told you last week, be from the pen of Mr. Louis Tracy, the clever author of many serials and successful novels.

To those of my readers who have been readers for some years past, there is no need to emphasise the excellence of his fiction. For he it was who wrote those excellent stories "The Lost Lady Delia" and "The Shadow Hand." My new story is every whit as good as these two, and I am sure will rivet your attention from the opening to the final sentence.

The story deals with the mysterious robbery of some priceless jewels from the residence of some Turkish officials in London, both the plot and the incidents of the story being most graphically and thrillingly presented. The first instalment will appear in a fortnight's time.

THE tramp who had been into the house prospecting came out and joined his companion on the roadside. "What luck?" asked the waiting one. "None," growled the other. "I don't like this business of asking for bread and getting a stone." "Well," said the first one in a tone of philosophic resignation, "'taint half as bad as askin' for bread and getting a bulldog."

LITTLE MISS LILY has been allowed to come to the table on the occasion of her mamma's birthday, after promising that she would be very, very good. Unfortunately she was seated opposite a gentleman who was entirely bald. After some time spent in contemplation of the phenomenon, she could not help remarking to her mother, in a quite audible stage whisper: "Oh, mamma, see that gentleman. His head is all naked."

The NEW STANDARD book
On CONJURING is

The Modern Conjurer

By C. LANG NEIL.

With an introduction by . .
CHARLES BERTRAM.

Explaining and Illustrating Tricks by

J. N. MASKELYNE — FRANK KENNARD
TREWEY — PAUL VALADON
CHARLES BERTRAM — H. DE MANCHE
T. NELSON DOWNS — L. GRAHAM LEWIS
MLLE. PATRICE — ELLIS STANYON

and others.

With over 500 Illustrations from Photographs of Actual Tricks.

Demy 8vo, cloth. Price 6s.

Professor Bertram, the greatest drawing-room conjurer of the present time, concludes his introduction as follows:

With the greatest possible pleasure I recommend these fascinating pages to amateurs and experts as the finest and most reliable work upon Modern Conjuring and Feats of Dexterity that has ever been produced.

At all booksellers, and Hamley Bros. Limited, 231 High Holborn and 35 New Oxford Street, or of the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

HOW AND WHAT TO DANCE.

By W. LAMB President of British Association of Teachers of Dancing.

Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

Containing complete instructions in the art of Dancing, including all the latest and fashionable square dances and skirt dancing.

Cut this out and send with 1s. 2d. and your name and address to the Book Publisher, 17, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. (S.S.)

IF YOU LIKE ★ ★ ★
Bright, Light Stories

IF YOU LIKE ★ ★ ★
Pretty Pictures, Tastefully Printed

IF YOU LIKE ★ ★ ★
Jokes that Make You Laugh

IF YOU LIKE ★ ★ ★
A Great Bargain

You can get them all in

Pearson's Xmas 'Xtra

1902

which costs 1s. and is on sale everywhere.

Digitized by Google

INTELLIGENT MEN AND WOMEN

have discovered the wonderful reward secured by a few minutes' daily practice of physical exercise. Our finest men and most beautiful women never neglect this exercise for health. Why should you, when you can improve your health, strength and beauty from 50 to 100 per cent? We supply "everything for health and strength," and publish a monthly magazine you should read. Its title is "Health & Strength," and it contains reading and illustrations which cannot fail to help you in the important matter of your health and strength. Sample copy free for 3d. stamps, or price 2d. at all bookstalls and booksellers.

NEW PUNCHING BALL.

Can be easily and quickly fixed up anywhere. Provides simply magnificent exercise. Instructions free. Price £2 10s. complete.

EXERCISERS OF ALL KINDS.

Sandow's Developer. .	12/6
Whitely Exerciser .
,, ,, Ladies'	4/6
,, ,, Men's .	5/6
,, ,, Athletes'	6/6
Ryan Combination . .	10/6
Travellers' Exerciser .	3/6
1 Strand Chest Expander	1/6
3 ,, ,, ,,	3/6
5 ,, ,, ,,	6/6
5 ,, Athletes'	7/6

BALL MASSAGE CHAIN

With Instructions.

Non-stretching .	3/6
Stretching . .	8/6
,, (strong)	10/6
,, (ex. strong)	12/6

GRIP MACHINES.

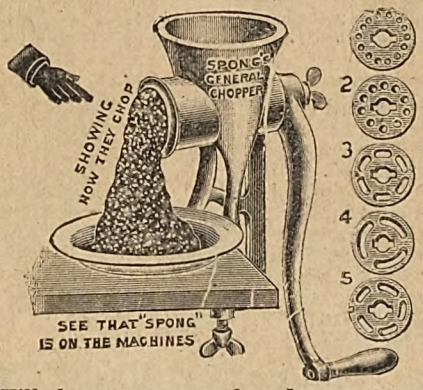
For developing strength in hand, wrist, and forearm, with chart of exercises:

	Pair.
Rubberoid pattern .	2/6
Cork ,, .	4/6
Spencer ,, .	4/6
Sandow Grip Dumb-bells	7/6, 10/6, 12/6
Hendrickson pattern	4/6

HEALTH & STRENGTH BOOKS.

Sandow's . .	2/6
Apollo's . . .	2/6
Milo's . . .	2/6
Miles' . . .	7/6

THE "GENERAL" CHOPPER IS WANTED IN EVERY HOME.



Will chop more meat, bread, vegetables, seasoning, stuffing, suet, etc., in two minutes, and will do it better, than can be done in an hour under the old methods.

JUST THE THING FOR XMAS AND NEW YEAR PARTY DINNERS, ETC.

Nothing to get out of order. Chops in five different sizes—instantly altered—strongly made—practically everlasting.

ONLY 7/6.

HEALTH & STRENGTH MAGAZINE,

29 Stonecutter Street, Ludgate Circus, London, E.C

Call if you can. No obligation to buy.

HEALTH & STRENGTH MAGAZINE is sold at all bookstalls and booksellers.

A PAIR OF GOOD LEGS

FOR EVERY ATHLETE.

The Trainer of several well-known Cycling Champions tells in the form of a small illustrated book how everyone may become possessed of a pair of well-developed legs with big calves. The advice if followed will transform the worst pair of "spindle shanks" into symmetrical and strong legs. No medicines, food, or anything costing money required. Send P.O. and stamps for 1/1 and book will be sent under cover and post free. CYCLE CHAMPION TRAINER, Hazelwood, Leigh-on-Sea, Essex.

A SCIENTIFIC WONDER.

PRICE 1/1 Post Free.

With this scientific instrument you can see bones whilst moving as well as still.

WHO TO MARRY. WHEN

SHOULD TO

PLAIN TALK by the most celebrated American Medical Author and Specialist, Dr. Foote. A wonderful book. Nearly 1,200 pages. 200 anatomical illustrations. 26 true-to-life coloured illustrations. Over a million copies sold. Ours is the genuine unabridged American Edition with coloured plates, exceedingly valuable recipes, health advice, etc. Post free, 8/6.

MARRY MARRY

THE "KAISER" MOUSTACHE TRAINER AND PATENT COMB.

Invented by German Imperial Barber. Used by the German Emperor. Cures a straggling, ragged, etc., moustache, and quickly forces it to assume any desired style of arrangement. Worn at night. Sent per return post and free from observation, post free, for 2/6, or (finer quality) 3/6 only. Money back if not satisfactory.

THE STUDENT'S MICROSCOPE.

3d. Post Free, with full instructions. This illustration shows one drop of water as magnified 200 times by above marvellously effective student's microscope. The animalcules can be seen moving about, fighting and eating each other, etc. This microscope also shows the insects that live in cheese as large as fleas.

LONDON NOVELTY CO., SEA VIEW ROAD, LEIGH-ON-SEA.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

My Well Wishers.

I HAVE received a swarm of kind letters from numerous readers on my approaching marriage, such as I never could have expected. Certainly I cannot express how much I thank one and all for their encouraging words, but next week, in taking farewell of my readers (for a while at any rate), I must at least make an attempt at doing so. Meanwhile, though, as you must know, my time is very, very well occupied, I must snatch a few moments at my favourite work of trying to help readers in their little difficulties and misunderstandings.

Wants to Go Abroad.

"H. B. M." is very interested in my recent correspondent from Africa. No, this gentleman did not send me his photo, but I fear you do not quite understand what an "African" gentleman means at the present day. My correspondent is a Scotsman living in Natal, and not coloured and the possessor of "thick lips," which you say you do not like "very much." But why are you so anxious, "H. B. M," to go abroad? You would not really much care about living in South Africa, unless true love were the motive of your settling down there. I am sure there must be plenty of nice young men in your district, and as you are only twenty, why not give them a chance before thinking of those beyond the seas?

A Case for Patience.

"HALIFAX" has known a girl for a year, but his parents object to their friendship because she has a deformity in the left arm. He is twenty and will abide by any advice I may give him. I do not see why "HALIFAX" should not be friends with a girl, no matter what may be her deformity. But as he is only twenty, I suppose he is sensible enough to know that it is not yet time for him to think of getting married. Let him continue his friendship so long as he and the girl are attracted to each other. If when he arrives at an age and position enabling him to marry, he finds that the girl is still the only possessor of his affections, then he would be silly to allow a deformity to stand in their way.

A Case for Perseverance.

So, "HOPELESS," you are in love with your country cousin, and have sent her your photograph. She replied saying she did not wish to be bothered with a young man, and had not one of her own to send in return. Now you hear she is very upset at having replied like this.

* * * *

I suppose if she does not want to be bothered with a young man, you will not bother her. But she probably did not know her own mind. You should try and find out what she really feels in the matter. There is no reason why you should not continue to write to her of pay other attentions. In time, she will perhaps let you know her true state of mind. I do not at all see what there is to be "hopeless" about. When a man finds that his love is not returned at first, he should continue to pay attentions until he learns definitely that there is or is not hope for him. But do not bother her. Surely a man can admire a girl without being a burden to her. Continue to express your feelings, and be "hopeful," not "hopeless," and something is sure to result.

Is He a Consumptive?

"ADA" is receiving attentions from a man whom she likes very well, but his appearance suggests that he is consumptive. Do I advise her to continue the affair?

* * * *

Who said he was consumptive, "ADA"? There are few things about which people are more deceived than consumption. The least likely-looking people have it, and those most likely in appearance, to the lay mind, are often quite free from it. I advise you to try and meet your friend when a doctor is present, and ask the latter privately what he thinks of the young man's appearance. He may be merely in delicate health, or overworked. Certainly find out first before you allow such a circumstance to interfere with your fondness for him. If, of course, he really is consumptive, you should not go on with the affair, as there may be a heavy penalty to pay in the future for doing so.

The Doubtful Rival.

How should a man act towards a girl he admires, when he believes she is the victim of unwelcome attentions from another man? "L. D." is attracted towards Amy, but she is always seeing another man. Once or twice he has noticed that she looks weary and bored in the latter's presence. At other times she has said little things about the other man which suggest that he is not a great favourite with her. What the facts are he does not quite know. They are not engaged.

* * * *

Does she appear pleased to see you? Does she talk intimately of people and things to you? If so, there should be some opening for you to press your own suit. As to the other man, I should say nothing about him to her. If she likes to volunteer any information, take it, and as much as you can. In time, you should have got together evidence enough to enable you to get at her real feelings towards him. But do not jump to conclusions. She may, for all you know, have a real fondness for him, in spite of outward signs, and until you are convinced to the contrary, you have no concern with such attentions as he may pay her while you are as yet only an outside admirer.

The Stage Beauty.

So, "H. F.," you are in love with a most charming young actress, just because of her beautiful stage face, and winning smile. You are only a clerk on a modest salary, so any overtures would not carry you far. How had you better act?

* * * *

You are probably one of a hundred who feel the same towards that young lady. Does this encourage you to further effort? One, probably, of the hundred has the possession which is nine points of the law of love, and any advances on your part might be met by strong muscles. What you are suffering from is not really love at all. People get into similar states over heroines in novels, statues, or pictures. It is a very delightful state to be in, to feel you are drawn towards any image, but it is just as well to separate that from any connection with serious love. Certainly try and meet the girl if you have the slightest chance. How you can do so on ordinary social lines depends on whether you have a mutual friend able to give the introduction. The next step will be the progress you make in interesting her in you. But let me warn you, you have not a very hopeful prospect in front of you, and I think it would be better to cure yourself of the infatuation, and remember that all is not gold that glitters, and that every pretty face is not necessarily that of an angel.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

LIFE-SIZE DOLL FREE!

"Baby's Clothes will now fit Dollie."

GIRLS can get this beautiful Life-size Doll absolutely free for selling only ten packages of the Electric Polishing Fabric, at 6d. a package Something new for cleaning and polishing Jewellery, Silver Ware, &c., without the use of powder, paste, or liquid. Sells at sight. Write to day, and we will send you the Fabric post paid. When sold send us the money (5s.) and we will send you post free this Life-size Doll, which is 2½ft. high, and can wear baby's clothes. When stuffed, this doll is an exact reproduction in fast colours of a hand-painted French creation, done on extra-heavy cloth that will not tear. The workmanship is perfect, the colour effects the very finest. The doll is intended to be stuffed. It is this century's model of the old-fashioned Rag Doll that Grandma used to make and would make Grandma open her eyes in wonder. Dollie is printed with Golden Hair, Rosy Cheeks, Brown Eyes, Kid-Coloured Body, Red Stockings, Black Shoes, and will stand alone. If Mamma can donate one of baby's out-grown dresses that her little daughter can put on and off, button and unbutton to her heart's desire, the Life-size Doll will live in that child's memory long after childhood's days have passed. If you do not care to sell our goods we will send the Doll postfree, upon receipt of 2s. These dolls are sold all the year round. A single packet of SHY-NALL sent post paid on receipt of 6d. Address:

SHY-NALL,

SHY-NALL CHEMICAL CO. (Doll Dept. 38K), 75, Queen Victoria St., London, E.C.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 463.)

PAPER PATTERN of this

= Dressing = Gown.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

LADIES ONLY

Need read this and you will afterwards always look smart, and your hair keep beautifully curly and wavy.

WAVINE. A NEW HAIR WAVING AND CURLING FLUID.

Invaluable for keeping the hair in wave or curl, is not affected by damp or wet weather. Unlike other preparations, it imparts a brilliant gloss, is not sticky or greasy, and has a delightfully refreshing perfume, is inexpensive, and acts as a tonic. Can be used on the most delicate hair. Send for full-size sample bottle direct from manufacturers, post free, by sending P.O. for 1/1½. WAVINE CO., 19 Park Street, Highbury, London, N.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 105 Oxford Street, London, W.

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp. Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (BT), Specialist South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

For HEADACHE & NEURALGIA.

The favourite for 14 years. The safe remedy. First discovered by one of our leading medical men. Nothing "like it" or "as good." Insist upon having Kaputine and you won't be disappointed with the result.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-.

Samples 1d. each.

KAPUTINE LTD.,

HUDDERSFIELD.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

TO BE FIRST

Is to occupy an enviable position. Many aspire for first place, but few attain it. To acquire the lead, aspiration and push alone are not sufficient. Merit is required. This is exactly why . . . .

BEECHAM'S PILLS

stand foremost among medicines. They possess real merit, and have proved themselves worthy of a permanent position in the family medicine chest. Trial purchasers become regular users, because they find nothing to equal Beecham's Pills for dispelling

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Indigestion, Sick Headache, Languor,

and other such troubles which arise from a Disordered Stomach. They regulate and tone up the entire system. The genuine worth of BEECHAM'S PILLS has obtained for them the unique position of having the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

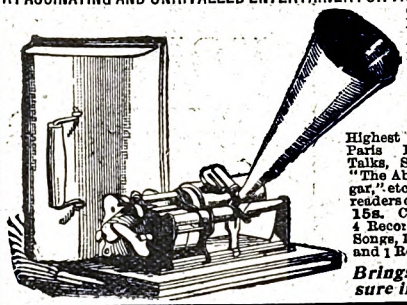
Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S CRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

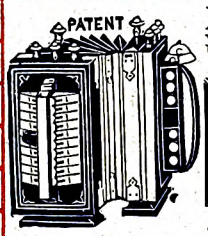
CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories.
Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6
Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount
Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—
CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.
Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

Ladies Say

Two dozen No. 1, at 1/-.
One dozen No. 2, at 1/-.
One dozen No. 3 at 1/6.
POST FREE.
May be obtained from all Underclothing Houses and Chemists.

"The MENE" SANITARY TOWELS

Are Superior to all makes for Cleanliness, Comfort and Economy.

A FREE SAMPLE

To any lady naming this paper to

MISS HAYNES,

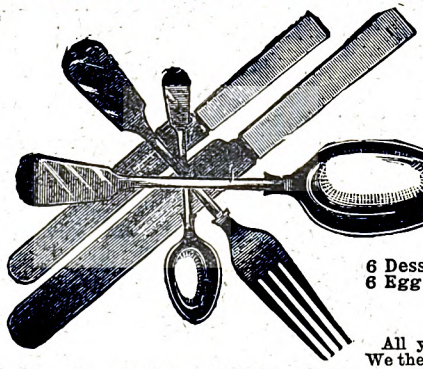
55 FANN STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Sole Proprietors:—

ROBINSON & SONS LTD., CHESTERFIELD.

WHAT MAXEY'S DO.

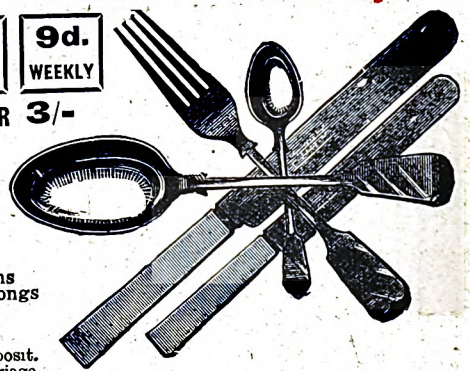
SELL THIS PARCEL OF SHEFFIELD CUTLERY FOR 3/-



50 ARTICLES	PRICE 25/-	DEPOSIT 3/-	9d. WEEKLY

THIS PARCEL SENT FOR 3/-

6 Table Knives
2 Table Spoons
6 Dessert Spoons
6 Teaspoons
2 Salt Spoons
1 Jam Spoon
6 Dessert Knives
6 Table Forks
6 Dessert Forks
6 Egg Spoons
2 Mustard Spoons
1 Pair Sugar Tongs



All you have to do is to send 3/- deposit. We then forward the Cutlery at once, carriage paid. The price is only 25/-, and you pay 9d. weekly or 1/6 fortnightly until paid for. If, however, you wish to pay cash the price is 21/-, if paid in seven days.

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE OF FURNITURE, ETC.

AGENTS WANTED.

MAXEY & CO., MEADOW STREET, SHEFFIELD.

Short Stories.

No. 727. Week ending December 6th, 1902 Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

A Thrilling Incident from our Complete Story, "Her Own Enemy." See Inside.

THIS BOOK IS FREE.

The Mysteries of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism Revealed.

The American College of Sciences of Philadelphia, Pa., has just published a remarkable book on Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism, and Magnetic Healing. It is by far the most wonderful and comprehensive treatise of the kind ever printed. The Directors have decided, for a limited time, to give a free copy to each person sincerely interested in these wonderful sciences. It is the result of the combined effort of twenty of the most famous hypnotic specialists in the world. You can now learn the secrets of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism at your own home free. Hypnotism strengthens your memory and develops a will of iron. It overcomes bashfulness, revives hope, stimulates ambition and determination to succeed, and gives you that self-confidence which enables you to convince people of your real worth. It gives you the key to the inner secrets of mind control. It enables you to absolutely control the thoughts and actions of whomsoever you will. When you understand this grand and mysterious science you can plant suggestions in human minds which will be carried out in a day or even a year hence. You can cure bad habits and diseases in yourself or others. You can cure yourself of insomnia, nervousness, and business or domestic worry.

You can instantaneously hypnotise people with a mere glance of the eye, without their knowledge, and powerfully influence them to do as you desire. You can develop, to a marvellous degree, any musical or dramatic talent you may have; you can increase your salary; you can develop your telepathic or clairvoyant power; you can give thrilling and funny hypnotic entertainments; you can win the love and everlasting friendship of those you desire; you can protect yourself against the influence of others; you can become a financial success and be recognised as a power in your community.

The American College guarantees to teach you the secret of attaining all these things. It is the largest and most successful school of Hypnotism in the world. It is chartered by the State laws, and carries out every promise faithfully. If you want a copy of its free book, just send your name and address on penny post-card, no money, to the American College of Sciences, Dept. WL 5, 420 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A., and you will receive it by return mail, post paid.

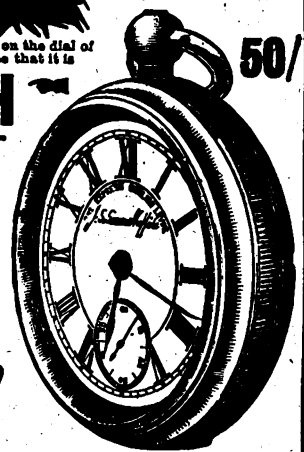
'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Watches

THE "EXPRESS"
(Registered)
English Lever,

That word "Express" on the dial of a watch is a guarantee that it is

BRITISH

50/



Manufactured throughout, and NOT a foreign-made movement in English Cases.

TERMS. Send 5/- and the watch will be forwarded to you. If satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of the same amount.

If not satisfied, return the watch, and your deposit will be refunded.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Electro-plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

For HEADACHE & NEURALGIA.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries. The safe remedy cures in ten minutes. There is no "similar" preparation.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-.

Samples 1d. each.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

Short Stories.

No. 727. For the Week Ending December 6th, 1902. One Penny.

ASTOUNDING SOCIETY REVELATIONS. BEGIN TO-DAY.

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

LORD REGINALD DAVENANT. Another of Belinda's suitors.

LADY HONORIA. The Duke's sister.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister, who is staying at Cairo.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

HOW LADY PEGGY FINDS BELINDA.

Lady Peggy undertakes, for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, to chaperon Belinda, and to marry her to a son of some old and titled family. Staying at the same hotel in Cairo are the Duke of Eastacres and his mother, the Duchess. Lady Peggy and the Duchess agree that nothing could be better than a union of the Duke's title and Belinda's millions; everything is therefore done to bring this about. One evening, under the guidance of a fine looking Bedouin, they all go to witness a religious festival. They manage to arouse the wrath of the fanatics, but are delivered by the dragoman, who turns out to be David Carr. Belinda signifies her gratitude by publicly hugging him.

The dragoman is dismissed, and back at the hotel the Duchess of Eastacres takes Lady Peggy to task for the occurrence. Lady Peggy retorts that not long ago she saw the Duchess' own daughter Honoria in the arms of a real Egyptian. The Duchess is furious, calls Honoria, and after storming at her, is slapping her face when Belinda rushes in, rescues Honoria and takes her to her room. Shortly afterwards a fearful shriek is heard, followed by an impassioned appeal for "Help!" The voice is Belinda's!

Rushing upstairs, we discover that Belinda has just prevented Honoria from poisoning herself.

The next evening, Lady Peggy discovers the Duke of Eastacres and a new comer, Stanley Forbes, about to fight a duel. Realising the possible disastrous consequences to her matrimonial plans for Belinda, Lady Peggy rushes forward and places herself between the two men.

Sending Eastacres off on some errand, she takes Forbes aside, and after telling him she knows that the quarrel is connected with a girl named Sheila Kenwyn, whose whereabouts Forbes wants to find out, promises to extract the address from Eastacres if Forbes will forego a scandal. Forbes consents.

Lady Peggy then finds Eastacres and refuses to allow his suit with Belinda till he gives her the address. Eastacres gives it.

Later on Lady Peggy is rewarded by discovering Belinda in the Duke's arms.

All rights reserved.]

Belinda Falls Into a Trap.

At that, the psychological moment, I appeared upon the scene.

"Dear me," said I, "this is very unexpected." And I glanced from one to the other in benignant surprise. "However, I suppose I must not scold—congratulations would be more to the point, eh, Belinda?"

For a moment she made no comment, but stood with flushed cheeks, her breath coming and going in little pants. She had retired some distance from the Duke. Then with an abruptness mightily disconcerting, she turned to Eastacres, and, in a passion of anger, touched with tears, cried:

"Oh, how I hate you!"

"Belinda! What ever are you thinking of?" I gasped. "What do you mean?"

"He's horrid," she said defiantly, "rude and ungentlemanly. I'm not going to marry him. I will never marry him, I hate him," and with that she stamped, yes, actually stamped her foot.

"Belinda," I said gravely, "your conduct calls for explanation. If you are not engaged to the Duke, how do you account for your—your attitude a moment since?"

Digitized by Google

"It's not my fault," replied the girl, with flaming cheeks.

"The Duke asked me to be his wife. I said I wouldn't do that, as, though I liked him—so I did then—I didn't care enough to marry him. I suggested we'd better be friends instead, and gave him my hand, and he, he—you saw yourself what he did," she concluded wrathfully.

"Lady Carstairs," interposed the Duke, "permit me a few words of explanation. I made Miss North a proposal of marriage, as she tells you. She did not return me a decided answer—in words. Something she said about looking upon me as a friend, and then—with what I took for a charming gesture of compliance—put her hand in mine. Am I to be blamed if I misread her meaning?"

"Not in the least, Duke," I said emphatically. "Belinda will be the first to see that, when she is quieter. At present she is excited, overwrought. To-morrow she will appreciate the position, and will express her sense of the honour you have done her."

"I shall say then as I say now," cried the girl, "I will have nothing more to do with him."

Eastacres, I think, was about to expostulate, but at a sign from me, kept back his remonstrance, and with much tact slipped out of the door.

I and my charge were left alone.

For the first few minutes Belinda seemed to doubt whether to rage or weep. The tears were very near her eyes, and her hands were tightly clenched. Finally, however, defiance came to her aid, and in a spirit of bravado, she perched herself on the table and began to whistle!

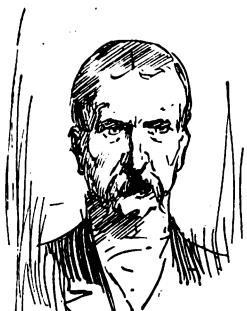
Finding that this unladylike conduct left me untouched, she shortly desisted.

"Lady Peggy," she said at last, "why should you blame me instead of the Duke for what has happened? You should be angry with him, not me."

"I am not aware that the Duke addressed you other than courteously," I returned. "You, on the contrary, spoke to him in the rudest possible manner. You have been guilty of an outrage on good taste, not to say good feeling."

"I am sorry you think that. Perhaps I shouldn't have said he was horrid, but—but—Oh, Lady Peggy, how could you think I meant to marry him?"

"I mistook you for a girl of refined perceptions," I said grimly. "I didn't think you would encourage a man, as you have encouraged the Duke, unless you had some intention of marrying him. Had I known you to be a girl of that description I would never have taken charge of you. As it is you have deceived me, insulted my friend, and hopelessly compromised yourself. I was not the only one who saw the Duke's embrace, and what preceded it. To-morrow, unless your engagement to Eastacres is announced—you will be looked on as an immodest, forward girl, you will be laughed at by the men, and cut by the women. Society doesn't permit conduct like yours to go unpunished. You are a young girl, remember, and as such the least suggestion of lightness or impropriety will be fatal to your social career; I do not see, indeed, how I can continue to act as your chaperon."



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

Belinda's face grew white.

"I didn't mean to encourage him, Lady Peggy," she said. "At first, indeed, I didn't like him, but when he was so nice to Honoria I changed my opinion, and after he'd saved me from falling down that horrid place in the pyramid, I felt quite friendly. I enjoyed going out with him. He can ride splendidly and he doesn't talk so badly."

"You accepted his attentions, and encouraged his hopes to gratify your vanity. Is that it?"

She shook her head. "I felt friendly, that was all. I've had men friends before now—lots of them."

Her coolness nettled me.

"What you may or may not have done in the backwoods of Australia has no bearing on the case," I said sharply. "You are not among savages now, but living under civilised conditions, and these conditions prohibit a girl from tolerating familiarities—such as you have permitted from the Duke—unless she is going to marry the man,"

"I didn't know," said Belinda despondently. Then, "I think Society is horrid," she went on with renewed vigour. "If a girl can't be nice to a man without nasty things being said of her."

"It's idle to rail against Society," I observed. "You can't change it. If you live in it you must conform to its usages, or"—I paused—"go under in disgrace." I spoke coldly, almost contemptuously; the girl looked distressed, a dim sense of the enormity of which she had been guilty stole upon her. She was gradually verging to a state of mind favourable to my influence.

"What shall I do, Lady Peggy?" she asked wistfully, which was exactly what I wanted her to ask.

"I can't tell. I'm too upset, too grieved to decide. I really think the best thing will be for me to cable to your father, and ask for advice." She flushed, I gazed at her fixedly. "Your father has such a keen sense of honour, he's so upright, so just a man. I shouldn't suppose he knew the meaning of double-dealing. His actions are the outcome of his intentions. He——"

"Don't," said Belinda piteously, "please, you mustn't cable, Lady Peggy," she went on earnestly. "I've got myself into this fix, and I must find my own way out of it." She stood up with an air of resolution, and gave herself a little shake. "I suppose I'd better apologise to the Duke?" she said, "to commence with."

"The Duke," I repeated, "it's not he I am thinking of. It's you. Don't you understand, you foolish and unhappy girl, that you've furnished such an occasion for scandal as Society will not readily let slip? Do you or do you not realise that within the last month you have more or less publicly embraced two men? The first was a mere outsider. As such Society could afford to ignore your behaviour. The Duke of Eastacres is a different matter. Belinda"—I paused—"your reputation is at stake. I cannot, I will not countenance a girl whose name is a bye-word."

"And yet," she said indignantly, "you cheerfully accept Mrs. Murchison-Lee, and she's a married woman."

"And, therefore, exempt from the criticism applied to young girls. Society has one law for married women and another for the young girls."

"It's shameful," cried Belinda.

"You're going from the point," I reminded her. "If you don't like Society, leave it. I will cable to that effect to Mr. North if you desire. If you elect to remain in Society, however, you must conform to its usages."

For a moment she hesitated, her blue eyes dilated, her figure thrilled at the thought of freedom. I feared I had gone too far, feared that my wild bird would choose to take flight back to the wilderness from which she came.

"I should like to go," she said, "so much. And yet——" Her mouth tightened, the smile went from her eyes. "I promised I'd stay with you for a year," she said slowly, "and, if possible, I'll keep my word."

"Very well, Belinda, in that case I'll do my best to help you. You are sure of your decision in regard to the Duke's proposal?"

"I cannot possibly marry him!"

"It's a pity you did not realise that a little sooner," I returned drily. "However, we must deal with the matter as it is. The only thing to do under the circumstances is to persuade the Duke to announce his engagement to you."

"Lady Peggy, I can't, I——"

"Allow me to finish, if you please. The engagement will be one in name, no more. In a month's time when we leave Cairo I will announce that the engagement has been broken off. You can then start afresh with the benefit of your experience."

Digitized by Google

"But it isn't honest or straightforward," she protested. "People will think it's a real engagement, and all the time it's pretence."

"Just as the Duke thought you really cared for him," I remarked. "And——"

"That's not the same," she said, "he mistook friendliness for love. I was not to blame for that, Lady Peggy."

"Blameless or otherwise you must accept the consequences, Belinda. Your engagement to the Duke must be announced to-morrow, or—" I paused significantly—"Come," I added more gently, "it's not so very dreadful. The engagement will be one in name only. At any rate, it is the only way to stop all gossip. You had better consent, Belinda, indeed, if you can't do so, I shall in self-defence be compelled to cable to your father."

"Very well," she said desperately, "it must be as you say."

"I will send for the Duke at once," I answered, "and ask him to consent to the arrangement."

A few minutes later the Duke appeared. I took him aside and explained in a few words what was required of him. He behaved beautifully, and with the greatest tact.

"I am more sorry than I can say that I should have distressed you, Miss North," he said to Belinda. "That my indiscretion should have caused you unpleasantness is a terrible thought. I think, however, Lady Peggy's notion will solve the difficulty. I understand that the world in general, and the Continental in particular, are to believe we are engaged? A formal engagement, meaning just as much or as little as you wish. You leave here, I think, in about a month? For a month then, Miss North, we are engaged. Do you consent?"

I caught my breath and waited in suspense for her reply. It did not come readily.

She was trying to think out the matter steadily and fearlessly.

For a moment things trembled in the balance, but only for a moment. She was so young, so inexperienced, so utterly unable to weigh the pros and cons. She thought, poor child, that she had really committed a grave breach of decorum, and never for a moment suspected I was laughing in my sleeve. She had made a mistake, and—however innocently—according to her simple creed she must suffer for it. She would not appeal to her father. She would find a way out for herself.

With a long-drawn sigh and a little quiver of the mouth, she answered:

"I consent."

The Duke bowed; I smiled upon Belinda and congratulated myself.

I redoubled those congratulations the next minute. Close on Belinda's words, the door opened, a tall, straight figure entered, and walked up to me.

It was David Carr himself, just sixty seconds late!

"I've come to say 'Good-bye,' Lady Carstairs," said the intrepid young man, after he had exchanged greetings. "I am sure you will be glad to hear your influence has obtained me the offer of a lucrative position. Sir Willoughby told me how much you had interested yourself on my behalf. I am going to St. Petersburg to superintend the building of a bridge across the Neva."

"Charming place, St. Petersburg," drawled the Duke. "I congratulate you, er—er—Mr. Carr."

David did not trouble to respond to the congratulation. He turned abruptly to Belinda.

"I may not see you again before the year is up," he said. "The year of waiting that you have imposed on me. You will see me then?"

"Surely," she answered, "I look forward to the end of that year as eagerly as you do. You'll remember that," she glanced at him pathetically, "whatever you may hear?" She put out her hand as she spoke and clasped his with a strong and steady pressure.

"I will," he answered gravely, then with a curt nod to the Duke, and a more courteous salutation to myself, he prepared to depart.

"A moment." The Duke's voice stayed him at the door. "You are interested in Miss North, I think?"

The young man frowned. Belinda, with terror-stricken eyes, watched Eastacres' face. Was he going to tell her lover here, before her face, of that ill-considered promise she had just made? It could not be, she thought. It was impossible a man could be so cruel.

With a smile, Eastacres continued to regard his rival.

"If you're not interested, there's nothing more to say," he continued languidly. "I had a piece of information to give you concerning the young lady, that was all."

"Well?" David's tone was not conciliatory.

The Duke paused, and lit a cigarette.

"I don't know that it concerns you really," he said, "still it's as well for you to know." Then with a sudden change of voice he drew himself up, and laid his hand upon Belinda's arm.

"We're just engaged," he said calmly. "Miss North accepted me a minute before you came into the room."

For a moment I thought that David would have struck him. The veins stood out on his forehead like cords, his face worked convulsively. Then from his throat came the words, half-inarticulate with passion:

"A lie, it is a lie," and then with a quick uplifting of the voice, a short sharp cry of agonised appeal:

"Belinda!"

White as death she came a step or two towards him, but what she was about to say or do I cannot tell. For of a sudden her will gave out, her nerves collapsed. Without a cry or call she fell. For the first and only time while she was with me, Belinda fainted.

David was bending over her in a second, pushing Eastacres aside. Without ceremony or excuse I put them both out of the room, and ministered myself to the fair-haired heap upon the floor.

She came round very quickly, and was horribly ashamed of her weakness.

"Will you do something for me, Lady Peggy?" she said wistfully.

"I suppose you want me to interview this dragoman of yours, is that it, Belinda?"

"Oh, no," she said. "I should not think of such a thing. I want you to persuade the Duchess to let Honoria sit with me for a bit, that's all. Will you send and ask her now?"

The request seemed harmless enough for me to grant it. Honoria, I knew, had not the sense to take a message to David undiscovered—let alone the courage. I saw Belinda to her room, and fetched Honoria to keep her company.

Then with a not unwarranted sense of self-approbation, I descended to the card-room with a view to finding out if anything unpleasant had occurred between Eastacres and the young engineer.

David Carr caught sight of me in the doorway, and, seizing my arm, he drew me back in the passage.

"Is she better?" he cried hoarsely.

"Yes," I said, "it was only a slight attack—the heat, I suppose."

"Is it true"—his fingers tightened on my arm—"true that she's going to marry that"—he pointed scornfully to where the Duke stood the centre of a group of men in the card-room.

"She's engaged to the Duke of Eastacres, if that is what you mean," I answered readily.

"You swear it?"

Digitized by Google

"Don't be absurd," I said sharply. "You're behaving like a madman. For goodness' sake pull yourself together."

With an impatient gesture I shook off his grasp and walked into the room. He followed me. Apprehensive that he would make a scene I asked Sir Willoughby to reason with him.

The Baronet, who had a real liking and esteem for David, readily agreed. I had the satisfaction of seeing the young man's face gradually settle into acquiescence if not resignation. Another few minutes and he would have left the Continental, convinced that henceforth his life must be apart from Belinda's. He would have made an effective exit and have rendered things considerably easier for me.

That he did not thus depart was entirely owing to Honoria, whose base ingratitude to me I cannot find adequate words to condemn.

She entered the room in her usual helpless fashion, drifting against people and things in a way that made me want to shake her.

At last she landed on the hearthrug, immediately in front of David Carr. Before I had time to realise what she was about to do, the wretched and ungrateful girl, with an unpardonable breach of faith, commenced as follows:

"I've brought you a message from Belinda, Mr. Carr. She says she won't be married for a year at least, and will you please come to the wedding."

With a flash of his dark eyes David took Honoria's hand in his.

"I will," he said. "And thank you very much." And with Belinda's last words ringing in his ears, a strange new hope in his heart, he left.

Honoria did not escape so easily however. Her punishment followed close upon her crime. With quiet deliberation the Duke beckoned a tall, bearded individual lounging by the window.

He rose at the Duke's invitation and came towards them.

"Honoria," said Eastacres calmly, "here is Mark Striven," and his look said all the rest.

Mark's appearance was not unprepossessing. Broad shouldered, loosely built, he had the easy carriage and affected the easy manners of the "big" man. Not till you came to know and study him did you realise that as his trim, torpedo beard hid a cruel and sensual mouth, so the apparent heartiness of his bearing veiled a crafty and treacherous disposition that only recognised the claims of "self."

What chance would the weak and wavering Honoria have against him?

Mark's poverty and not his will consented to the match. I gathered that £1,000 was the price of his liberty. For that sum he was prepared to love and cherish dear Honoria to the best of his limited capacity in that direction.

It was no business of mine, and yet, knowing all I did, I could not restrain a shudder of pity as I met the agonised appeal in her eyes. She was a poor specimen of a woman now, and what would she be a year after her marriage with him? I got up and left the room. I felt the necessity of a change of thought.

For the next week or two things went on fairly well. Belinda accepted the inevitable, if not with a good grace, with rare courage. She received calmly all congratulations, and smiled sweetly, if vaguely, in reply. I had of course informed Hardy North of the engagement, and had received a joyful, not to say triumphant, epistle in reply. Belinda read it with stoicism.

"I shall explain everything to dad when we leave here," she said. "It's not worth while to trouble now."

I commended her decision and pronounced the fact of her engagement far and wide. I was determined public opinion should force her into marriage. In the face of an outraged Society she dared not draw back.

Belinda and the Duke were together only in public. She declined to be alone with him for five minutes, and I thought it better on that point to give way. For the most part she went about with Midge, Honoria being in attendance on Mark.

The little Yankee had forgotten her grief at Reggie's defection, and was flirting desperately with an artist, a new arrival at the Continental. Reg still worshipped Belinda, but at safe distance. She had begun to learn the lesson of discretion.

Our stay in Cairo was drawing to a close, the Khedive's ball would end the season. It would also, unless I were careful, end the Duke's engagement to Belinda.

My plans, however, were well laid. On the occasion of the ball, the most important function of the season, I determined to make Belinda's marriage with the Duke inevitable. I had arranged for her special presentation to the Khedive, and that personage, prompted from the right quarter, would doubtless refer to her approaching wedding.

It would, I thought, need a stronger will even than Belinda's to disavow her undertaking in the face of Royal congratulations.

I had sent to Paris for her ball gown, and I was genuinely delighted with her appearance when she tried it on.

"You must wear your pearls, Belinda," I said, pondering, "and some jasmine in your hair. Get your necklace, dear, and let me see the effect. Come, don't be lazy, child, it is not very late."

Belinda, however, made no attempt to move, but stared straight before her into space.

"What's the matter?" I cried. "You don't mean to say you've lost the pearls? Why don't you speak?"

"I've not lost them, Lady Peggy," she said, flushing, "but they are gone all the same. Somebody has stolen them."

"When did you miss them?" I said sharply.

"A few days ago," she replied.

"Why on earth didn't you tell me, Belinda. One would think you knew the thief and were trying to screen him. Why don't you say right out what you know."

"I know nothing for certain," she replied, "and I mean to keep my suspicions to myself. You'd much better let the matter drop, Lady Peggy," she went on earnestly, "I don't mind much about the pearls."

"But I mind a great deal. In fact I shan't know peace until they are recovered."

"Please, Lady Peggy, don't say anything more about it, to-night, at all events."

She looked so pathetic that I was obliged to yield. Considerably mystified and more than a little troubled, I withdrew.

Who was the thief, and why should Belinda try to shield him? Even stranger than her reticence was her resignation at the loss of the necklace. One could more easily understand her foregoing vengeance than giving up the jewels.

It was a difficult situation, I felt my inability to cope with it unaided. In this dilemma I decided to seek the assistance of the Duchess. She would, I felt sure, give me valuable advice. I decided to see her that night; it was barely twelve o'clock, and we never stood on ceremony with one another. Relieved at this decision I took my way towards the Duchess' apartments. They were three in number, bath-room and bedroom, with a smaller room opening out of the latter, the resting place of the unfortunate Honoria.

I heard voices in her Grace's domain, and wishing for a private interview, I decided to reconnoitre before making my presence known. Her room had two entrances, one from the passage, one through the bath-room. I entered the last-named, and peered through the door of communication. It was not tightly shut, the interior of the apartment was visible through the opening.

At the far end of the room, on the threshold of her own chamber, stood Honoria, lean and lank in her long white nightdress. A brush was in her hand, and an expression of fear on her countenance.

I leant forward to ascertain the cause of her alarm. I followed the direction of her eyes, to where they rested on her mother. And as I gazed, a cry of horror rose to my lips.

The Duchess of Eastacres stood in the middle of the room, immediately beneath the electric light. One hand was raised in a threatening attitude towards her daughter.

And in the other lay—Belinda's pearls!

(The explanation of this scene will be given next Tuesday.)

Digitized by Google

Clouds in a Summer Sky.

Telling of a Quarrel, a Horsewhip, and a Reconciliation.

Harry Neville and his wife had lived one happy year of married life. They had their little differences, of course, odd little corners had to be smoothed off. Both were somewhat impulsive, sensitive and quick-tempered, but the magic of love, combined with common sense, had helped him, and he was increasingly thankful that he had met, and wooed and won her; while she was proud of her strong, manly husband who, for her sake, had altered so much of life, and, except for a rare visit to his old club, or once or twice playing in his old football team, had settled down to home, to find all his happiness in it, and the society of his bright young wife.

They had known little of each other before marriage. He had met her at some friends with whom she was staying in London. He had heard how she, after enjoying the comforts of easy circumstances, and after she had just finished her college course, had been thrown on the world to seek a livelihood on the sudden death of her father, when it was found that he was so deeply involved that there was nothing left for his only child but a good education, strong will, and health.

Harry, from their first meeting, had fallen desperately in love, and holding a fair position in a city firm, had soon persuaded her to share with him the comfortable suburban home, where they had so happily passed the first year of their married life.

And then suddenly, without warning, came the rude shock, and the dark cloud and storm.

On Thursday morning, while breakfasting somewhat hurriedly, for he had been spending the previous evening with some old club friends, and had risen late, Harry said:

"I am sorry to play truant so much, darling, not seeing you all day yesterday, and now I want you to spare me again this evening, and after that I will be a good boy and stay at home."

"Why, you gadabout!" she answered. "Where are you going to-night?"

"Well," he replied, "Jim Thornton, an old chum of mine, is going abroad to a good appointment he has secured, and came round to the office yesterday to ask me to dine with him and some other fellows at 'The Holborn' to-night. I do not think I shall be very late; but as I am rather busy, and do not wish to leave the office early, I think I will take with me what I want and change there. Put up my things, dear, and I will make up for leaving you so much by being extra good. You know where I am most happy, but I cannot break off all old friendships at once!"

"And I do not want you to," she answered. "You devote too much time to me now, and I sometimes fear lest you should tire of so much woman's society—I love to have you with me, but I want you still to mix with men. It must be better for you sometimes."

She ran off, and soon came back with a small bag containing what he required, bade him a warm good-bye, and he went off, as happy a man as entered the city that day.

By one of those strange chances which, unimportant as they may seem at first, are pregnant with vast issues, he found it necessary during the day to make an appointment for late in the afternoon, which brought him very near home, and so he altered his plan of dressing at the office, and resolved to give his wife a pleasant surprise; spending an hour at home, and going thence to keep his evening engagement.

He let himself in with a smile, as he pictured her surprise, and going through the hall found her in the little room opposite the dining-room, which they used as library, smoking, writing and reading-room, in fact a snug little place where rigid order was not enforced, and where either together or separately they have passed many contented hours.

Coming in suddenly upon her, she started and, as he thought, with a look of some disappointment, said:

"You told me you were not coming home till late!"

He went over to her and kissed her, when he noticed a letter which, after writing, she had apparently let fall on to the floor by the writing-table.

Stooping to pick it up he said, laughing.

"Going to resign, and writing for another place?"

She coloured, and hastily made for the letter, saying:

"Oh, it is only a spoilt letter which I re-wrote this morning, I meant to have torn it up!" But he had already picked it up, and without any intention of reading it had caught sight of its first words and suddenly grew stern.

"Give it to me!" she cried, as he held it from her with one hand, while with the other he pushed her almost rudely away. Then, glancing again at the letter, he uttered an oath, thrust her down upon a chair, and exclaimed—

"You false-hearted Jezebel!"

"Harry, how dare you? What do you mean?"

"Silence," he said, pressing his hand heavily on her, and holding her fixed, and she, for the moment terrified, remained quiet, while he read the letter, which ran—

> "My Dearest George,—I cannot tell you how I have felt since, after three years, we so unexpectedly met yesterday, and I feel how great a wrong I did you in leaving you without knowledge of my movements, and to suppose I was indifferent. But after yesterday's meeting, when you put your arm round me with the old tenderness and forgave my folly, all the old feeling has come back, or rather revived, for really it never left my heart, which poured itself out to you so freely in the dear old days, and I love you still more since you tell me you have never loved me less than then.
>
> "But I cannot write all I want to say, and am sending this rather that we may take advantage of a grand opportunity which has unexpectedly presented itself for us to have an hour or two quite alone.
>
> "My husband this morning told me of an engagement which keeps him in town till late (probably eleven o'clock) to-night, so you must contrive to come to me about seven o'clock (what a pity you are engaged all day!)
>
> "Our interview yesterday was all too short. I am longing to have you with me, to lay my head on you in the old way, and tell you all my thoughts, and show you that you hold the same place ever in the heart of your loving Kitty."

For a moment after reading this he remained silent, then, turning with an expression of terrible sternness to his wife, he said:

"Do you say that this was re-written and posted?"

She had recovered herself partially now, and was angry too.

"Yes, I do," she answered, "and how dare you speak to me like this? I can do as I like, I suppose? I am not your slave, to answer for every act to you!"

Not noticing her last words he demanded:

"Will this appointment be kept?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, it will, and I shall do just as I please in the matter," was her angry reply.

"You brazen-face! Tell me at once the fellow's surname and address," said he.

"Fellow! Fellow!" she exclaimed scornfully—then suddenly stopping, she looked fixedly at him for a moment as though deciding what course to take. A resolute expression came to her eyes, and angrily stamping her foot, she said: "Find out all you want to know for yourself. Take your hand away, unless you are coward enough to strike me. I might, had you spoken differently, have spared you a part of the pain you shall feel now. But you can do your worst, and I will see that you and you only shall suffer." He released her, and she rose, and was about to leave the room, when he interposed, and controlling himself by a great effort, spoke again:

"You are utterly shameless; fool that I have been. If I am not coward enough, as you call it, to strike you, be sure of this—the cad to whom your letter is addressed, shall take the punishment for both, and will be in no condition to receive or respond to your brazen confessions."

To this she responded with a curl of the lip, and a scornful laugh which only maddened him. But he said nothing further—only took her firmly by the arm and led her into the dining-room, placed her at the end farthest from the door, pushed the table to the same end of the room in front of her. She made no resistance, and did not speak—contenting herself with looking angrily at him as he sat her down, and putting on a look of sneering defiance.

He rang the bell, and as the maid responded, went to the room door to screen the view of her mistress, and said:

"A visitor will call shortly, about 7 o'clock, whom you are to show straight into this room, and to whom on no account you are to say I am at home. Mind you do exactly as I have told you." The girl, half-frightened at the stern mood of her usually good-tempered master, withdrew. He then stepped into the hall, and returned with a heavy riding-whip (an old treasure of his boyhood, which had been given him by a farmer uncle when staying in the country). Throwing this on a chair he looked at his watch and sat down.

Then she spoke, passionately, disdainfully, as though determined to goad him to the very utmost.

"You brave man, armed. Let me give you warning. You think to make me suffer in seeing, and another suffer in bearing your vengeance. Do not be too sure. Strong men have met defeat, and" (raising her voice) "so will you. In less than half-an-hour you will be cowed, humbled, and, as sure as I am here, you shall be thoroughly punished."

Such unabashed defiance, such absence of all compunction, and evident desire, that not content with the wrong he suffered, she should have him still further outraged—this was unbearable. He started forward, and for a moment it seemed he would strike her. Then her face changed, and she looked him straight in the eyes, with a glance which while he looked, seemed to disarm him, and she said as her voice seemed for the first time to betray something of fear:

"Harry, would you strike me?"

His hand dropped down again, and for ten minutes he sat buried in deep thought. It is wonderful how in the great crises of life, thoughts shape themselves so rapidly, and present so vividly, in so brief a space of time, the events of the past and the possibilities of the future. As the past months were lived again in those brief moments, even he himself was surprised to realise how his first anger turned to yearning love. As the memories came back of the tender glances of those beautiful eyes, which had just looked into his, of sweet endearing words, and tender caresses; of the devoted kindred soul (as he had thought) which looked through those soft eyes, to meet and mingle with his own. Then notwithstanding her unabashed and defiant attitude, and the terrible disillusionment which had come—so far as she was concerned, his anger was lost in grief, and thoughts of vengeance lost in care for her.

At last he rose, and seeing that he had but a few minutes probably at his disposal, said:

"Kate, after you leave this room to-night, we meet no more. There are two courses open to you. Go to your aunt, if it can be arranged; or if you prefer it, take this house and its contents and have with you some middle-aged lady companion. My salary shall be equally divided between us so long as you give me no further reason to alter the arrangement, and on the express condition that you never willingly see again the—the—person you will see here shortly. Let me have your decision by letter in the morning, and if you decide to remain here, I shall leave for good.

"If, at any time you need protection or any help, write to me at the office, and so far as I can render it you shall have it. Although it has all proved a delusion, and my earthly heaven a fool's paradise, I cannot forget it, and for the sake of the fair dream, although it turns out but a dream, you shall not want a friend."

"You are exceedingly kind," she said. "But these are matters we can discuss later on when you are less lordly, and in a far humbler state of mind, as most certainly you will be before this is finished."

Her sneering tone again aroused his fury. To feel that she had not only so deeply injured him, but gloried in the hope that he would be cowed, perhaps beaten by her unknown lover—made him conscious of a burning desire to strangle the very life out of the man he hoped soon to have in his grip.

At that moment the visitor's bell rang, and they heard the maid answer it. Starting up, he grasped the riding-whip, and threw himself behind the door, just as it swung open, and the maid announced:

"Miss Georgina Foster."

And there came into the room a tall, lovely woman, evidently some two or three years his wife's senior—to whom his wife, pushing back the table from her, flew with outstretched arms crying:

"George, darling, I am so glad you have come. Finding you were coming, my husband here insisted on running home just to wait for an introduction to my dearest friend, and helpful confidante of the old time, of whom through my folly I had so long lost sight.

"Harry, this is my dear friend Georgina Foster, or George, as I always call her, who used to be sister and mother all in one to me, and whom I met yesterday. She has come to live very near us and, as you know, is going to spend the evening with me, so hurry up, and leave us quickly. For I have so much to tell her."

He came forward dropping the whip behind him, whispering to himself "idiot," "fool" and, with the best grace he could, stammered some common-places. Then, as a great wave of gladness came into his heart, he turned to his wife and began:

"Kitty."

But she turned on him sharply, and bade him make haste, or he would be late for his engagement—adding, I have so much to say to George, whom I only saw for a little while yesterday, and to whom I want to tell all our doings right up-to-date.

"But, Kitty"—and his eyes pleaded for compassion——

"Come! Hurry up," she said lightly, and with a smile—but when as she pushed him out of the room her back was to her friend—she answered the appealing glance he gave her with a look of stern anger, and waving him off, closed the door upon him.

After dressing, during which operation he communed with himself, using expressions which it would have been anything but safe for others to use to him, he went out. But pausing for a moment at the door of the drawing-room, he heard the merry laughter of two women, who seemed to be enjoying it with infinite relish.

It took him some time, and much persuasion next day, to obtain forgiveness, which, however, was really waiting behind the little storm he had to bear, in a heart which beat with truest love for him, and which had, on reviewing the circumstances, found excuse for his mistake, and was not ill-pleased with him.

G. A. Morrant.

Digitized by Google

THE SEABOROUGH MYSTERY.

A Tale of an Artist's Love.

"You will always love me, Dick?"

"Till my death, Flossie!"

The unpleasant memory of those words came to Richard Filby, as he sat on the cliffs a mile away from the little village of Seaborough painting, or rather attempting to paint. What a fool he had been! He had flirted disgracefully with the inn-keeper's daughter Flossie, who had seemingly taken all his attentions in earnest, perfectly unaware that there was another young woman up in London to whom he was engaged. Last evening they had walked out together as usual, wending their way along the shore, and there the declaration of love recorded above had been made. How on earth was he to get out of this imbroglio?

After a few minutes Filby dropped palette and brushes. Ambitious as he was to be famous, he really could not paint this morning. He slipped off his camp-stool and throwing himself full length on the grass, gazed up reflectively into the sky. What a nuisance this artistic temperament was! He was formally betrothed to Freda Withers at Forest Hill, and had no desire to end the betrothal, and yet down here in this romantic little spot the temptation to enjoy himself with Flossie Barnett, who had attracted him the very first moment that he arrived at the inn, had proved too strong to be resisted. It was an innocent entanglement, but how great the cost! He had come down to work and he had been philandering instead. And now the last day but one of his stay had come. What follies were committed in the name of so-called love!

"Nice day sir!"

Filby looked up. It was the coastguard on his round.

"Yes! Rather warm for working though and for walking too I should imagine."

"Oh, I don't mind that. sir! Used to it you see. That's a grand bit of cliff you're painting, sir."

"If I could only get it right it would be."

The coastguard mused, his hand stroking his chin, his eyes taking in the points of the picture.

"Ah, I mind that spot well. There was a suicide from there about a year back. A chap (he was the son of a farmer round here) as was gone on a girl that he couldn't get jumped right off there into the sea. His coat was found on the cliff—he'd taken it off before he jumped—but his body must have been washed away by the sea, for though we searched high and low we never found it. It was a sad case."

"Very! I didn't know events like that occurred in this part."

"Sometimes, sir! Folks do silly things for love all the world over. Well, I must be moving on!"

"Have a bit of tobacco?"

"Thank ye, sir! That's real stuff. Good morning!"

Directly the man had passed on, Filby began pacing up and down on the cliff. An idea had come, the execution of which might solve the difficulty he was in, and with free movement of his limbs Filby always thought better. The notion presented difficulties at first, but one by one he saw his way out of them. What a lucky thing to have had that conversation with the coastguard! The means of relief from all his troubles was at hand.

That night an unusual thing occurred at the Seaborough Inn. Unseen by anyone, a man stole out at midnight, holding some dark objects under his arm, and made straight for the edge of the cliffs. Not a soul was about; only the distant sighing of the waves broke the stillness. Hour after hour passed by, yet the man did not return. But the wind rose, the sighing of the sea became a tumultuous roar, and by the time the light broke a regular tempest was in progress.

* * * * *

Two hours prior to that mysterious midnight flight Flossie Barnett sat in her bedroom, her usually smiling face most seriously set. A letter on foreign note-paper and bearing the Cape Town postmark was in her hands and she had committed the contents to memory for about the tenth time. It was from her soldier-lover, Jack Preston, written a couple of days before he was to embark on the transport for England. "In a very short while the writer would be here in person, with the plainly stated object of claiming her as his bride.

Now Flossie was in a quandary. Her little flirtation with their visitor, Mr. Filby, had taken a far more serious turn than she had anticipated. She had merely intended to amuse herself with him during the absence of her real lover, and surely a girl left by herself for two whole years had liberty to seek some mild amusement. On a higher social level than herself he had treated her as an equal, and that had rather turned her head. Besides, a halo of romance encircled his ample locks—he was an artist; in a few short years he would write R.A. after his name and have the free right of hanging mediocre pictures on the Academy walls. In a confidential moment Filby had drawn for her this vision of the future, of course omitting any allusion to mediocrity.

Yes, the affair had gone much farther than Flossie intended. As a matter of fact, she was enjoying herself so hugely that she had not the strength of will to draw back before the mischief was done. Last night she had been drawn into a horrible lie. She had told him that she loved him, whilst all the time her heart was with her old lover abroad. And this morning had brought a letter from him, a letter whose every line sat in judgment upon her and rebuked her for her folly.

She recalled Mr. Filby's manner and looks of the previous evening. How dreadfully solemn he had looked—and yet how finely picturesque! She had certainly made a splendid conquest, and if his heart was won but to be broken afterwards, still her achievement would provide food for her vanity for years.

Leaving that side of the question, however, Flossie turned to the consideration of the more practical matter—what was to be done now? Mr. Filby must be informed, and that speedily, of Jack Preston's existence, but how could the information be most delicately conveyed. A personal interview would be most satisfactory, but Flossie shrank from cutting a poor figure at that. What would be the gent'est way of letting this artist lover down?

Ah, she had it! Mr. Filby was returning to town on the morrow. She had his London address, and would write there a letter, which should reach him soon after his arrival home, explaining as best she might her previous commitment to another. It was an easy and capital solution of the difficulty.

The plan was no sooner settled than put into effect. Flossie took from a drawer paper and pen, and after a little cogitation fashioned the epistle. She read it through, approved, sealed and stamped the envelope. She would run out and post it herself the first thing in the morning.

Her mind at ease Flossie got into bed and was soon asleep. Had she only remained awake a little longer, she would have heard the stairs creak under passing footsteps and the old inn door squeak as it was being stealthily closed.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Directly she was up next morning Flossie went out and posted her letter. A blustering gale was raging and the wind lashed fiercely in her face, but her mission was far too important to admit of delay. On returning to the inn she ran in the passage into the arms of Bell the barman.

"Oh, miss, I was looking for you everywhere! There's someone in the parlour as wants to see you most particular."

"Who, Bell?"

"A sailor man I should reckon by his rig-out. He seems most excited."

Wondering who her visitor could be at this early hour Flossie turned the handle of the parlour door. A man whom she recognised as one of the local coastguards rose and touched his forehead.

"Beg pardon for disturbing you so early miss, but I've some very bad news. There's been, I'm afraid, another case of suicide from the Seaborough cliff."

"Who?" queried Flossie, turning pale.

"A gent as I've had one or two chats with of late. I don't know his name, but he was stopping here he told me. One of those painter chaps."

"Mr. Filby? You can't mean it. You must be mistaken." A wild look came into the girl's eyes.

"Don't think I am. Perhaps you recognise these articles?"

Going to the back of the chair upon which he had been sitting, the man picked up some objects from the ground. They were a man's coat and waistcoat of a rather pronounced check. Startled recognition stood in Flossie's face.

"Ah, I see you know them, miss. They're the very clothes—a little stained with paint, you see—that that artist fellow was wearing yesterday. But that's not all. When I found those on the cliff, I turned them over, and there, pinned to the inside pocket, was this envelope. I'm not much of a scholar, but I think it's addressed to you, miss."

Flossie took the note with trembling fingers, and, finding herself unable to stand any longer, subsided into a chair. She guessed the contents. Mad with love for her, Dick Filby must have committed suicide. At last she got the envelope open, and the few brief lines within confirmed her worst fears.

"Dearest Flossie," it ran. "Forgive me the step I have taken—believe me, it was the only one. We loved one another too passionately to be happy apart for a single moment and there was a life between that would always have divided us. I cannot explain but, dearest, I could never have lived without you, so I have chosen what they say is the pleasantest method of departing from existence. Treasure the lovely time we had together. Your broken-hearted,

Dick."

"I should like you to keep the one painting I did at Seaborough as a souvenir."

Flossie read it through twice and at last the sense began to beat in upon her brain. She had driven the man who loved her into a watery grave.

The coastguard stood quietly by, waiting for her to speak. Finally with an apologetic little cough he broke the silence.

"So he has drowned hisself, miss?"

Flossie nodded.

"He seemed a morbid kind of chap—I thought that when I spoke to him yesterday. So dissatisfied-like about his painting. I suppose it isn't a love affair like that young Perkins'?"

Flossie had recovered sufficiently to be on the defence.

"Oh, no, you mustn't think that! Mr. Filby wasn't very successful as an artist."

"Says so in that note, perhaps?"

She must baffle the coastguard's curiosity.

"No! This—er—simply leaves a little picture of his as a gift for me. Have you been to the police-station yet?"

"I came here first but I must go there straight now."

"Do me a favour! You must speak about the clothes, of course, but don't mention this note! It's quite unimportant!"

The coastguard scratched his head.

"I know I'm silly but I'm engaged, and all that will get about the village, and I don't want my young man to know that I've had a present from this Mr. Filby."

The coastguard, won by her pretty looks, promised, and Flossie breathed afresh.

"You haven't found the body?" she asked.

"Not yet, miss! Perhaps this storm will have swept it miles down the coast. Well, I must go and tell the police."

He was no sooner gone than Flossie burst into tears. The affair was terrible. Even if her part in the matter did not transpire, she would suffer compunctions of conscience for weeks for letting him proceed so far.

She went upstairs to the room which their visitor had occupied. The bed had not been slept in. Most of his belongings had been dispatched to London by train the previous day. Flossie once more broke down. She would never, never flirt again as long as she lived.

* * * * *

That same afternoon Richard Filby in the flesh arrived at his lodgings in West Kensington. He did not look like a man who had lately undergone a fatal experience. His cheeks were bronzed and his step was brisk—indeed the first remark which his landlady made was to compliment him on his improved appearance.

"Thank you, Mrs. Seymour, I've had a very good time. By the way, has my luggage come?"

"Early this morning, sir, by railway van."

"That's all right. I'll dine at seven as usual, Mrs. Seymour."

Filby went upstairs and proceeded to unpack. The few articles left at the inn to allay suspicion, could be replaced at a very small cost, whilst a breach of promise case might have landed him in hundreds.

He smiled as he thought of his clever and successful ruse.

He pictured the local constable assuming terrific importance, declining to give any information whatever, and all the inhabitants clustering in knots and discussing the news.

Now Filby was not a hard-hearted man, and he felt just the least bit sorry as he thought of Flossie Barnett. She would naturally be much cut up, for she loved him tremendously—but there, she was a high-spirited girl and took life pretty easily. And then, of course, marriage between them had always been quite impossible.

Dinner was duly served, and Filby did the meal ample justice. Over his cigar he commenced to nod, and remembered that he had lost a night's rest. He would go to bed very early to-night.

A knock at the door. The maid entered with a letter. He looked at the envelope and started. It bore the Seaborough postmark; it was from Flossie Barnett. He was thoroughly roused now. Had his trick been discovered?

He tore the letter open feverishly. The date reassured him; it was written last night. What on earth had Flossie to say?

Three minutes later Filby was pacing the room, waving the letter irritably in the air. His scheme had gone for nothing; all his trouble had been wasted. This chit of a girl had been simply playing with his affections all the time, and here was her confession.

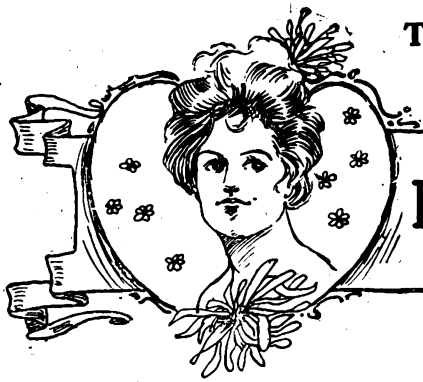
He seized pen and paper. That night the following communication was dropped into the post.

Mr. Richard Filby begs to inform Miss Flossie Barnett that he is still alive and well, and has returned to town. On second consideration, he did not think Miss Barnett worth drowning for, and her letter to hand this evening confirms him in this opinion. Mr. Filby hopes that Miss Barnett will attain happiness in her projected union and that his little picture may find a niche on her walls.

But by return of post without line or comment, Filby to his great indignation, got his picture back disfigured almost beyond recognition.

Herbert Jamieson.

Digitized by Google



THE STORY OF THE WEEK.

SEE OUR COLOURED COVER.

Her Own Enemy.

The Strange Story of a Blow that Missed its Mark.

CHAPTER I.
The Key and the Letter.

"I CAN say no more, Mrs. Brereton, than that we are very well satisfied with the immediate results of the operation. The next few hours will, of necessity, be somewhat critical, and as the most absolute quiet is of vital importance to your husband's chances of recovery, I would beg of you to leave him entirely in his nurses' hands."

"But surely, Sir James, they will allow me to—to assist. A wife's place, at such moments as these, is by her husband's bedside."

The words were uttered naturally enough, a half-suppressed sob lending them a note of feminine pathos. The speaker raised a small, white hand—rendered still smaller and whiter by the drooping lace ruffle at its wrists—as though to brush away a tear.

The great West-end physician frowned and shook his head. "Your husband needs at his bedside," he said, "those who have been specially trained for emergencies like the present, and who have no relationship with the patient to unsteady their nerves. When Mr. Brereton has definitely rallied, your co-operation will be most valuable; your presence now could only agitate him. I repeat, the slightest excitement will be disastrous, to put it plainly, fatal."

The black-robed, still youthful figure sank into a couch and the delicate brunette features were hidden on the cushioned arm of the lounge. The other shrugged his shoulders and took up his hat.

"After all, Mrs. Brereton," he observed, "I have every confidence in your good sense and your wifely affection. Edward Brereton is an old friend of mine, as well as a distinguished patient; you will forgive me easily enough when, in a month or two, you take Ned to Brighton to brace him up after his little experience of modern surgery, before giving back to the Law Courts their most brilliant ornament."

With a curt, yet polished farewell, he stepped noiselessly from the room. As he did so, Hester Brereton abandoned her crouching posture and sat back among the cushions of the lounge. Her cheeks were dry, her eyes cold and hard.

"You do not like me, Sir James Jardine," she said aloud; "what trick are you trying to play me? You banish me from my husband's room, perhaps from his death-bed, very politely, no doubt, but you do it—you!—you who tried to reinstate Douglas Brereton in his father's good graces when luck enabled me to oust him from them, you who refused to become a trustee of the will by which he was disinherited! 'Charming young step-mothers, my dear madam,' you told me, 'do not see these things as men of the world do.' Oh, no, Sir James, you are no friend of mine! And shall I leave you at a moment like this, to whisper who knows what counsels of reconciliation into my husband's ears?"

She put up her slippered feet indolently on the couch and fell into a reverie—a reverie that lasted for some time. The gloom of the Autumn afternoon deepened insensibly, the glow of the smouldering fire in the grate beside her began to illuminate luridly her handsome, selfish countenance.

Outside an occasional cab rolled, with a muffled rumble, through the stately square, its wheels subdued by the straw that covered the road before the residence of Edward Brereton, the most brilliant of many brilliant King's Counsel, a rising member of Parliament, and one of the wealthiest practising barristers in England. Upstairs the keen brain and marvellous memory that had built up an almost international reputation were still vaguely clouded by the sickening fumes of the chloroform that had rendered him mercifully oblivious to the surgeon's knife.

The stealthy entrance of a servant disturbed Mrs. Brereton's reflections, and she rose to her feet. The man brought her a card on a salver, and she took it abstractedly, then started. It read, "Mr. Douglas Brereton."

"Mr. Brereton asked to see you most particularly, ma'am," she was told, "he asked me to mention, ma'am, begging your pardon, that he would not quit the house till he had done so."

Hester Brereton bit her lip thoughtfully. "I will see him," she answered slowly; "here."

The footman bowed, switched on the light to the electric pendants above and about her, and departed. When the door opened again it was to admit a young fellow, fair-haired and stalwart. He was well-dressed, and his shrewd yet pleasant face wore an expression of mingled sternness and melancholy. Hester looked at him, playing with the lace at her wrists.

"Well," she remarked, "and what do you hope to gain by this extorted interview?"

Douglas Brereton moved across the thickly-carpeted floor, and paused, studying her.

"You have done your work thoroughly," he said, "when my father can come to the very verge of the grave and I not hear of it. A paragraph in this morning's Times was my first intimation of his sudden illness—I only noticed it at my club a quarter of an hour ago."

His step-mother sneered. "And you have hastened hither to try and make your peace with him and his hard-won fortune before it is too late?" she said. "You are unlucky, Douglas Brereton, your father has just undergone a serious, almost desperate operation, and even his wife is not allowed to see him. You are already disinherited, as you know, and under the circumstances you can scarcely count upon the chances of a death-bed reconciliation."

Douglas Brereton shuddered. "My poor, poor father," he exclaimed, "and this is the woman who came between us!"

Hester smiled. "You mistake," she objected, "it was not I who came between you, but another woman. You cannot wonder that your father, brilliant, successful, ambitious refused his assent to his son's engagement with a low-born hospital nurse."

Her step-son folded his arms disdainfully. "Ambitious my father may be," he retorted, "but my mother was only a curate's daughter, and they were as poor as church-mice when they married. Better to be poor and happy than be rich and marry a woman capable of parting son and father, that she may inherit undivided the fortune for whose sake she can count upon her husband's death."

Digitized by Google

TURN TO PAGE 719 AND WIN A HANDSOME GRAMOPHONE.

A spasm of ferocity wrung Hester's face. "You came to insult me then," she said, "though you know your father would have you put out by his servants if he could hear the cowardly accusation you have made against his wife. Go, if your father dies, you are a beggar; if he lives so long as there is a spark of love in his heart for me, he is dead to you. Go!"

Douglas Brereton hesitated, but his step-mother extended a hand towards an ivory button in the wall at the fireside. Yielding to the inevitable, he crossed without a word the threshold of the room.

In the corridor beyond he lingered, the old house was familiar to him. Mrs. Brereton's drawing-room was on the first floor, a passage on the right went to his father's chamber. He stepped a pace or two along it thrilling with emotion, but halted abruptly. No, no, he must think of the sick man, rallying slowly from his dangerous operation—he could do nothing, nothing!"

Someone brushed by him—a woman in nurse's uniform—and an exclamation broke from Douglas Brereton.

"Winnie," he whispered, "great Heavens—you here!"

The nurse turned, a gentle, irrepressibly girlish face showing itself under the stiff cap. She had a letter in her fingers—an envelope addressed but unstamped.

"Douglas!" she murmured. "How strange that we should meet like this! Yes! I was sent in a hurry as a night-nurse to take the place of another one who could not be spared. I did not know the patient was your father. But I had to go through with it for a while, and, of course, they had never seen me. Even your friend, Sir James, doesn't know me by sight. I am so glad they have allowed you to come, though I was afraid when I didn't see you about the house that—that the quarrel was irreparable. I do wish I had never said 'Yes' to you, dear. But there, I mustn't stay, I go on duty in a moment, I was looking for Mrs. Brereton with a letter. Perhaps we shall see one another again soon."

She glanced at him—a shy, tender, hasty glance, that lent a sudden beauty to her grave features—and, giving him no time to answer her rapid sentences, slipped past him down the corridor.

Revolving bewilderedly the coincidence that had brought Winifred Carr, his betrothed wife, to wait upon the father who, on her account, had disinherited his son, Douglas Brereton went down the wide staircase and let himself out at the heavy hall-doors. He had scarcely rounded the head of the flight before Hester Brereton, emerging from her drawing-room, encountered the nurse with the letter.

"Anything wanted, nurse?" she asked coldly, "one of the servants would have answered the bedroom-bell; you need not leave your patient."

Winifred drew herself up. "I am not yet on duty, madam," she said, "and we are anxious to keep everything as quiet as possible in this part of the house. Before Mr. Brereton took the chloroform he insisted on writing this note, which he wished to have posted. It has been overlooked for half an hour, so I just brought it down. No doubt you will take charge of it."

Hester assented haughtily, and with pulses beating unaccountably, carried the envelope back into the drawing-room, as Winifred Carr, having administered her snub, retraced her steps to the sick room. Alone in her apartment, Mrs. Brereton was scrutinising the envelope in her hand. The name on it was "Robert Osler," and the address was one in Lincoln's Inn Fields. The name and address were those of Edward Brereton's own solicitor, and there was something in the envelope, something that felt like a key.

Moved by an impulse, Hector pulled at the flap. It was imperfectly attached and came open. She plucked out the inclosed missive—in which was folded a small steel key of intricate design—and read it. It began with a brief reference to Edward Brereton's approaching operation, and went on:

"Herewith is the key of the little strong-box in my bedroom. It contains the will you last made for me. I am glad it is in existence, in case of accidents. Had the previous one stood, I could not have been content to jeopardise my life. It was a cruel, unnatural document; you had better destroy it at once, that there may be no record of it."

Hester knitted her brows. So she was cheated, after all, and her husband had relented towards his only child. If he died she would lose a great part of his wealth; if he lived, he would be reconciled to his son. What should she—what could she do?

Her fingers closed upon the key, which was that of the strong-box where the new will lay. Destroy that document, and the old one—the one the solicitor had in his possession—held good.

But what was the use if her husband recovered? He would make a new will reinstating his son. Some words came into her head—startlingly. "The slightest excitement now would be disastrous—to put it plainly, fatal." That was what Sir James Jardine had said to her twenty minutes before. A shiver passed over her, and she sat down suddenly, the letter shaking violently in her hand. All at once it ceased to flutter; Hester Brereton had regained her self-control.

Putting the letter in her pocket, she stole out of her apartment and went down the passage leading to her husband's room. There was a room on either side of it—the three doors confronted her, closed and silent. One room was an empty guest-chamber, one her husband's own dressing-room, leading to his sleeping chamber.

Hester slipped into the first of the three, she knew that it also communicated, by a locked and disused door, with Edward Brereton's apartment. She had a master-key in her pocket—sure sign of a jealous and suspicious nature!—and opened the communicating door, aware that it was covered on the other side by a tall wardrobe.

Drawing it cautiously ajar, she found that she could just see between the door-frame and the piece of furniture. On the bed, motionless, and extended in an almost death-like position, lay the sick man, a vague and occasional sigh his only token of life. The chamber was dimly illuminated and empty. In the lighted dressing-room beyond, the nurse she had met in the passage was leaning over a tiny spirit-lamp, apparently preparing some food.

Noiselessly Hester pushed the wardrobe on its castors until she could get through. A stride, and she had reached the polished wooden cabinet that concealed her husband's strong-box. She stooped down, slid a walnut panel, and put the key into the inner lock. It turned easily, she whipped open the iron door, and ran through a medley of documents.

A long envelope caught her eye—it was indorsed, "My Will, Edward Brereton," and bore a date. Hester broke the seal and withdrew the inclosure—it was the usual legal-looking document; a glance showed her her step-son's name and the words, "One half of the residue, being approximately, as I believe, about one hundred and twenty thousand pounds." She had been right—Douglas Brereton was co-heir with herself.

Reclosing the strong-box she locked it, folded the will, and began noiselessly to tear the document into fragments. Then holding these, she started up and crossed to the bed.

"Edward," she murmured, "Edward, can you hear me?" The sick man's eyelids lifted, and he smiled faintly at her. Hester held up the torn will.

Digitized by Google

"Do you know what this is?" she whispered harshly. "It is your will—the will by which you made your son—whom you love more than me—a rich man. Well, I have destroyed it, you understand, destroyed it! Make another if you like—if you can!"

A ghastly change came into the drawn, white face on the pillow, a look of confused horror and incredulity.

"Hester, Hester!" said the pale lips, in a voice like the ghost of speech, "oh, my mad, my reckless darling, you——"

The sick man's shoulders moved as though he were trying to rise. A spasm shook him, the livid white of his face became a terrible ashen grey, a strange sound shook his throat, and he lay still.

There was a quick step and someone bent over him—it was the young nurse, and she turned an alarmed, condemning face on Hester.

"Madam! madam!" she cried, "why are you here? You have killed him. Go! go! send someone for the doctor, quickly."

Hester quailed before her stern gesture, and, hastily secreting the fragments of the will in her own pocket, swept from the room with well-affected excitement.

The nurse raised the nerveless form of her patient and tried to pour some brandy between the cold lips. She made a despairing gesture and set down the glass. "Too late," she murmured, "his blood is on her head."

CHAPTER II.

"I am on my Defence, then."

"Have the goodness to ascertain if Mrs. Brereton can see me for a few minutes."

Sir James Jardine made the request. He stood in the hall of the silent house to which, only a few hours before, he had been called in hot haste to find his friend and patient dead of heart-failure, and Hester Brereton in apparent hysterics. A night had passed and another heavy November day brooded over the metropolis and sent its foggy breath into the room where Edward Brereton lay in his last sleep.

The footman ushered the physician into a large and darkened library, and went to make the indicated inquiry.. The visitor put down his hat, crossed to the window, and peered out through the drawn blinds. On the opposite side of the way, two men and a woman were strolling to and fro—the latter was the young hospital nurse, Winifred Carr. One of her companions was Douglas Brereton, the other a short, stout, smartly-dressed man in a furred overcoat. Sir James tapped lightly at the pane and the three glanced significantly in his direction.

A sound made the physician turn about hastily. Mrs. Brereton herself had just entered the apartment—she walked with affected unsteadiness and carried a jewelled smelling-bottle.

"Ah, Sir James," she said, "so you have come to see me. How good of you. I am better to-day, though sadly shaken. Oh, if I had only taken your warning, my darling Edward might be alive now. It is that thought which is killing me." And she sank into a chair and hid her face in her hands.

Sir James approached her quietly. "Don't distress yourself by recalling the past," he advised her; "by the way, you should have kept one of the nurses with you until your nerves recover their balance somewhat. That little Nurse Carr is most gentle and capable."

Mrs. Brereton put her smelling-bottle to her nostrils. "I—I couldn't bear to see her again," the physician was told; "she reminded me too vividly of that awful moment, so I allowed her to go at once."

Sir James would have spoken, but his observation was prevented. The footman had re-entered with a card. Mrs. Brereton looked at it—it was inscribed "Robert Osler," On a corner was the one word, "Urgent."

"You will excuse me, Sir James," said Hester, showing him the card, "Mr. Osler is my poor husband's solicitor."

The physician had been watching her covertly. "By all means," he answered, "Osler and I are more than acquaintances, I will take the liberty of warning him not to tax you unduly."

Mrs. Brereton made no comment upon the proposal and Sir James lingered persistently. Suddenly there appeared in the room a small stout man with a furred coat—it was he whom the physician had seen walking on the other side of the way. He came deferentially across the floor, hat in hand.

"So sorry to trouble you, Mrs. Brereton," he began, "a terrible time for you, I am sure. Ah, Sir James, you here! But then Mrs. Brereton is in careful hands, I know. I can guess what you are going to say, that she must not be troubled with business—she shall not. All I wish is to have access to the strong-box in Mr. Brereton's bedroom. He sent me a line before undergoing this—alas, unsuccessful!—operation, to say that, in case of accidents, his will could be found there. He also speaks of inclosing a key which, however, he omitted to do."

Hester Brereton gasped involuntarily and looked at the letter held out by the solicitor—it was the note that had been given to her, sealed, by Winifred Carr, the note that she had opened, read, and thrust into her pocket. She had forgotten all about it from that moment, and here it was, between the lawyer's fingers. How had it come there?

She forced herself to answer collectedly. "I—I will look for the key," she rejoined, "and you can go through the strong-box at your leisure. Sir James will tell you that I am not fit to assist you."

The lawyer bowed sympathetically and hastened to open the door for her. No sooner had she disappeared from the hall than he himself darted out of the library and made for the double doors which led to the street. Scarcely a moment elapsed before he was back again. And with him were Douglas Brereton and Winifred Carr.

Sir James held up a warning finger as they entered. "In there with you," he said, pointing to a recess behind a large screen, "and remember, not a sound till you hear your cue."

Douglas Brereton assented silently and drew to the flap of the screen. There had not been a moment to lose—his step-mother was approaching the threshold of the library. An instant more and she was passing unconsciously within an inch of the hidden couple.

"This is it, I think," she said, giving the solicitor a small key and touching the bell, "you shall be shown upstairs at once. Take Mr. Osler," she bade the servant who answered her summons, "to—to Mr. Brereton's room, and point out to him the cabinet containing the strong-box."

Her voice faltered and broke pathetically at the mention of her husband's name. Hester Brereton was no mean actress, and she felt instinctively that much was at stake. Who had sent that intercepted letter to its destination; who had—who could have dealt her that dangerous blow?

The solicitor followed the footman out of the library, and Sir James, with a great show of professional anxiety, put his dead friend's wife back into her chair, and felt her pulse with delicate, masterful fingers.

"You are in a most over-wrought condition," he informed her; "your pulse is simply galloping. Let me send out for a draught; otherwise you will be prostrate in another hour."

With elaborate slowness he wrote a prescription, rang for the footman, and dispatched it to be made up. Hester chafed inwardly, yet she dared not rebel. Thanks to this tactful series of delays, Sir James was still there when the solicitor came downstairs.

"Mrs. Brereton," said the latter gravely; "a most remarkable state of affairs has arisen.

DON'T FORGET THAT "THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY" STARTS NEXT WEEK.

Digitized by Google

am sure, by the way, that I may speak frankly before Sir James—who is a trustee, along with myself, of your husband's will—a will that, in point of fact, is not to be found. There is neither will, nor trace of a will."

"No trace!" said a voice, the voice of Douglas Brereton, "then what is this?" As the question was asked, the screen was flung aside, and Hester saw herself confronted by her step-son. Near him was the woman who had said to her, beside Edward Brereton's deathbed, that she had killed her husband. In her step-son's hand was a scrap of stiff paper, covered with legal script. It was a fragment of the torn will.

Sir James took the scrap of paper. "Mrs. Brereton," he added, "we have adopted this somewhat dramatic means of securing a private consideration of certain grave problems. This nurse—who happens to be your step-son's betrothed—picked up in your husband's room the note which she had seen Mr. Brereton write and inclose, with a key, in an envelope, afterwards delivered to you by her. With it, on the floor, was this piece of paper, containing part of the wording of a will which your husband showed to me only a month ago, and which, according to his letter to Mr. Osler, was to be found in his strong-box. How came that note and this fragment in the room to which you were forbidden access, and which you entered by a circuitous route. Is it not the case that they slipped from your hand or your pocket during that visit which cost your husband his life—a visit made for the purpose of obtaining and destroying a will you feared might cost you dear?"

Hester Brereton faced them dauntlessly. "I am on my defence, then," she said; "so be it, your only witness is a woman whose relation to my disinherited step-son will destroy the weight of any false evidence you may have drilled her in. As matters stand, I am my husband's sole heir—no doubt he himself destroyed the will of which you speak."

"And by which," put in the solicitor; "you were left unconditionally half his fortune. The will still in my possession, and which the destruction of this later one brings into operation, was made two months ago after my client had determined to reinstate Mr. Douglas Brereton in his rightful position, and leaves you only a life annuity of a thousand a year, provided that you never re-marry. It was this last document which my client wished me to destroy as cruel and inhuman. His death renders it illegal for me to do so, and, in the absence of the later will, the document in question becomes his last and effective testament. Under it Mr. Brereton is master of this house, and of his father's fortune."

Hester put her hand to her throat, gasped, tried to speak, and fell fainting into the physician's arms. The trap which her own selfishness and avarice had set and baited had closed upon her.

* * * * *

By law, had the courts been satisfied with the evidence of Douglas Brereton and Winifred Carr, and the singularly preserved document, picked up by the latter in her patient's room and carried by her to her lover, who had taken them, forthwith to Sir James and Mr. Osler, Mrs. Brereton's theft of her husband's will could have earned her penal servitude for a term of years, if not for life. But Sir James and the discreet solicitor kept their dead friend's honour from that stain, and Hester still draws her thousand a year and lives, condemned by her own deed, to perpetual widowhood.

Douglas and his wife are worthier stewards of his father's fortune than she would have been. Well for them that they do not dream of the still darker crime that Hester Brereton committed, when she stung, with those envenomed words, the weak heart of a sick man, and slew him as certainly as if she had buried a knife in his bosom.

R. Norman Silver.

Tottie (aged five): "I wonder why babies is always born in de night time." Lottie (aged seven, a little wiser): "Don't you know? It's cos' they wants to make sure of findin' their mothers at home."

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

December 2.—The next twelve months will be rather favourable for those whose birthdays fall here. Go quietly and have a care against chills and colds.

Girls will have some anxiety over love affairs.

The day is not promising for marriage, pleasure, asking favours, nor entering upon new undertakings.

A child born to-day will be rather moody and suspicious; should keep in the employ of others.

December 3.—An active and favourable time for business and finances. More than usual movement, doctors, military men, and metal workers are benefited.

Young girls will find the opposite sex rather backward this year.

The day is good for most matters; buy and sell.

A child born here will be active, courageous, and ambitious; would do well in the Army, or as a chemist.

December 4.—Some sickness and trouble in the domestic circle are threatened. Be prudent and cautious in business.

Love affairs will not go well, and girls meet with disappointment.

The day is evil for marriage, asking favours, dealing with landlords for property. Beware of colds and loss in business.

A child born to-day will be unfortunate, over cautious, and ill-tempered. Worse for a girl.

December 5.—A good year for business and general concerns. Sign papers and speculate. Insure against fire and accident.

Girls will find love affairs very interesting; they become engaged or marry.

The day is good for most matters; write letters, buy, sell, ask favours, engage servants, visit, and make new friends.

A child born this day will be active, jovial, and affectionate. Should go into business for itself and will be fortunate.

December 6.—Give careful attention to business and it will prosper. Changes made this year will turn out well.

Young girls will have attentions, but should not place too much confidence in opposite sex. A good year to marry.

The day is good for speculating, dealing with professional people, electricians, and bankers.

A child born to-day will be fortunate and much respected. If a girl she will have a fortunate marriage.

December 7.—A quiet and unimportant birthday. The mind will be inclined to foreign journeys.

Girls will be much interested in news, but little progress is shown in love affairs.

A child born here will be ingenious and cheerful, but will have a very ordinary career.

December 8.—An unfortunate birthday; change, anxiety, ill-health, and business worrips. Some bother over news and agreements.

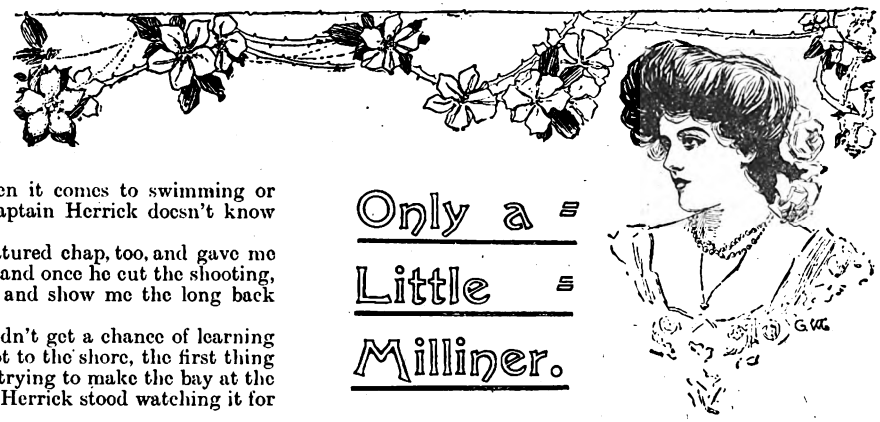
Girls will meet with disappointment, and many crosses and obstacles come into love matters.

The day is one to let others make the first move; beware of deceit and secret enmity.

A child born here will be unfortunate, and should keep in the employ of others. It will be idle, and mix with bad companions.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google



Only a Little Milliner.

I was awfully glad uncle Jack asked Captain Herrick to join us at Blairinch, although he declares he is about as much use on a grouse moor as a bull in a china shop.

That's all rot, of course, because though he is a sailor, he's not at all a bad shot, but when it comes to swimming or handling a boat, well—what Captain Herrick doesn't know isn't worth talking about.

He's such an awfully good natured chap, too, and gave me no end of tips about swimming, and once he cut the shooting, just to come down to the loch and show me the long back stroke.

However, as it happened, I didn't get a chance of learning it that day, because when we got to the shore, the first thing we saw was a small sailing boat trying to make the bay at the other side of the loch. Captain Herrick stood watching it for a couple of minutes then :

"By George," he said, "if the duffers don't take in that sail before they round the point, they'll be upset as sure as a gun !"

Then he whipped out his glass and watched the boat rushing up the loch. Just as she came from under the lee of the hills the wind caught her and she heeled over like a cockle shell. I could see one chap hauling away at the sail, but the second Johnnie seemed to be doing nothing except holding on to the first.

"They're a couple of awful duffers," I was beginning when Captain Herrick interrupted me.

"They're women !" he said, and before you could say knife he'd kicked off his boots, thrown off his coat and waistcoat, and made for the loch.

"Are you sure you can swim across the bay, Reggie ?" he shouted as I followed his example.

"Rather," said I ; "why, I did twice the distance yesterday."

"Yes, but not in a sou-west wind, and with a sea on like this. However, just keep on the lee side of me and we'll manage all right I daresay," said Captain Herrick.

And manage we did, though I'm bound to say when I heard one of the women give an ear-piercing yell, just as we were half way across the loch, I got such a fright that if it hadn't been for Captain Herrick I should have gone down like a stone.

He swung round in a second and put out his arm.

"Buck up, Reggie, old man," he said, "we'll reach them in another couple of minutes, and they're all right as long as they can make a noise."

All the same I was jolly glad when we got across and found the two women clinging to the bottom of the upturned boat. One of them was a stout old party in a big, mushroom-shaped hat and a waist—the other was a slim young girl, possibly her daughter. The old lady was yelling fit to take your head off. She stopped in the middle of a shriek when she saw Captain Herrick and me swimming towards them.

"Oh, save us ! Do save us !" she howled.

"All right, but you must obey orders, please," said Herrick. "Put your arm on my shoulder, so—no, not round my neck or we shall both sink. That's better ! Can you swim ?" he said, turning to the younger woman.

"Yes, a little."

"Then follow slowly, and Reggie here will give you a hand if you want to rest a bit. We're not far from the shore, and I'll come back presently."

He was off before I'd time to look round and when I did, if I hadn't been in rather a funk about having to look after the girl I should have felt inclined to howl with laughter, he looked so jolly queer swimming away with the fat old lady in the mushroom hat in tow.

The girl was awfully plucky, and though she wasn't a particularly good hand at swimming, she got along somehow, and only caved in once, and then I managed to keep her afloat all right till Captain Herrick swam back to us. I was jolly glad to see him I can tell you, and it was splendid to see the easy way he swam to shore with one arm round the girl who looked like a mermaid with her long black hair floating out behind her.

At least, I thought it was black until it began to dry in the sun, and then it curled up in brown rings and looked ripping.

She must have been a jolly pretty girl, too, for she even managed to look nice with her clothes all dripping wet and her shoes like a couple of wet sponges.

By the time Captain Herrick had finished buttoning the old lady into his dry coat and given her a pretty stiff drink from his flask, I had got the girl into my blazer, but she was most awfully pale, and shivered till her teeth chattered again. Captain Herrick poured some whisky down her throat as if she'd been a baby, but even then she didn't buck up.

If only we had been within a reasonable distance of a peat fire and a cup of hot tea we could have got the women round in no time, but there wasn't a cottage within three miles, and even Captain Herrick wasn't equal to carrying the stout old party so far as that, while as for the girl—I really didn't see what we were to do and I said as much to Captain Herrick.

"Do ? Reggie," he said coolly ; "why, fetch up the boat to be sure, it's been drifting in shore for the last ten minutes."

As it turned out there wasn't much wrong with her, though it took us a good time to right her and rig up a square sail which we found jammed under the seat in the stern.

The two women had bucked up ever so much, the old one in particular, and when we came back it was to find her scolding the girl for all she was worth.

"But, auntie," the girl said, "you know you wanted particularly to see St. Ronan's Creek, and if you hadn't jumped up and clung to my arm when I was hauling in the sail——"

"Don't talk to me about sails !" snapped the old woman. "I never did approve of your boating, and as for trusting myself again to such a cockle shell——"

Then Captain Herrick chipped in and said that if we were to make the mainland before sunset we'd better start at once.

The old girl was pretty obstinate at first. She began by saying that she wouldn't stir from the spot till a carriage came to fetch her from Craigdorn, and when Captain Herrick explained that as she was at that moment on the Island of Benmuir, a carriage to the mainland was rather out of the question, she rounded on him as though it was his fault.

Then I suggested our fetching a carriage from Blairinch, but when the old girl heard it was three miles away, she asked us how on earth we supposed she was going to wait all that time shivering in her damp clothes.

Then the girl snipped in :

"You know quite well, auntie, dear, that we are going back to Craigdorn in the Sea Foam," she said coolly. "You are far too wet to sit here arguing, so the best thing we can do is to start at once."

That settled the matter though it didn't prevent the old lady from grumbling the whole way back to Craigdorn.

Digitized by Google

However, no one paid much attention to her, for to tell the honest truth we had about as much as we could do to manage the boat.

It wasn't until Captain Herrick was helping her into a fly at the head of Craigdorn Pier that the old girl remembered to thank him.

"You must forgive my being so ungracious, Captain Herrick," she said, "but the prospect of rheumatism is apt to make us old folk rather cranky and——"

Of course Herrick said she was as sweet-tempered as an angel, or words to that effect, and when she asked us if we would look in and have tea with them one day, Captain Herrick accepted like a shot.

"I ought to have a card somewhere, if I can only find my purse," she said.

"Ah, here it is!" producing a rather pulpy-looking red leather bag and handing Captain Herrick a very damp piece of pasteboard.

"You won't forget that we are at home most afternoons from five to six," she said.

"No, I shall certainly not forget," Herrick said, looking straight at the girl, who for some reason or other blushed right up to her pretty eyes.

It was not until the carriage was out of sight that he looked at the card in his hand.

"Miss Merryweather, Milliner and Ladies' Outfitter, 49 High Street, Craigdorn," he read.

Then he turned to me. "Was that the address you gave the cabman just now, Reggie?" he said.

I nodded. "But I don't believe the girl is a milliner, all the same," I said.

"Why not?" said Captain Herrick. "Plenty of ladies go in for that sort of thing nowadays, and besides, it doesn't make a scrap of difference to the fact that the younger Miss Merryweather is an extremely nice girl, and about as keen a sportswoman as they make them.

"Why, she landed a three pounder in the stream at Craigdorn only last week and she——"

"Oh, she fishes at Craigdorn, does she?" said I.

"Of course, why not?" said Captain Herrick sharply.

"Only that she'd better not let Lord Craigdorn catch her at it," said I; "he's awfully down on poachers."

* * * * *

A couple of days later when I heard Captain Herrick ask Uncle Jack if he might take the cutter as he was going across to Craigdorn, I smelt a rat.

"Do you mind my coming with you, sir?" I said; "at least, if you are going to call upon Miss Merryweather."

Captain Herrick looked rather sick for a minute, then he laughed.

"You certainly were included in the invitation, Reggie," he said, "so come along."

As we flew across the bay in the cutter I thought of what Captain Herrick's mater would say if she knew he was going to have tea in the back parlour of a shop in Craigdorn High Street. I've only seen Lady Herrick once, and then she looked at me through a long-handled eyeglass, and told my pater I was really a very pretty little boy.

Of course that was ages ago, but I remember I thought it rather cheeky of her to call me a little boy when I'd just got into the second footer team at St. Olave's. Sir James Herrick had a ripping place in Worcestershire, but, of course, that went to the eldest son, and they say Lady Herrick had made up her mind that Rupert—that's Captain Herrick, you know—had got to marry an heiress by hook or by crook.

Of course, marrying a woman for her money is a caddish thing to do anyway, so Captain Herrick wasn't likely to be taking any, and I expect he jolly well told his mater so.

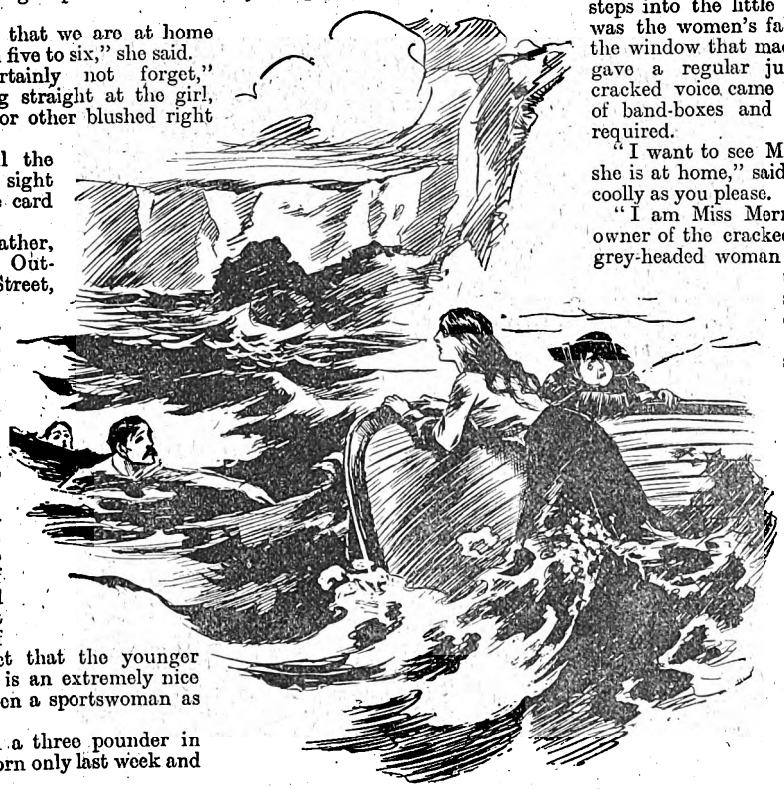
We got to Craigdorn just on five o'clock, and to see the way Captain Herrick strode up the High Street you would have thought he was in a mortal funk of being late.

When he came to No. 49 he had to stoop his head under the low doorway, and even then he nearly went a header down two steps into the little shop. I suppose it was the women's fal lals hanging across the window that made it so dark, but I gave a regular jump when a little cracked voice came from behind a pile of band-boxes and asked us what we required.

"I want to see Miss Merryweather if she is at home," said Captain Herrick as coolly as you please.

"I am Miss Merryweather," said the owner of the cracked voice, and a little grey-headed woman came from behind the boxes and stood smiling at us over the counter.

I've often wondered since how he did it, but Captain Herrick never turned a hair, only pretended he had come in to get some gloves for his mater, and felt sure he could rely on Miss Merryweather's taste to select them for him. He bought six pairs, and though he led the conversation round to old ladies with mushroom-shaped hats and young ones with auburn hair and brown eyes, we came out of the dark little shop as wise as we went in.



The two women were clinging helplessly to an upturned boat.

Captain Herrick hardly said a word the whole way back to Blairinch, and when we met the butler in the hall and heard Uncle Jack had visitors, we were just making tracks for the gunroom when we heard the sound of a girl's low laugh.

Captain Herrick stopped a moment as if he'd been shot, and then marched straight into the drawing-room.

I followed and was just in time to hear Uncle Jack say:

"Miss Seaton, may I introduce my friend, Captain Herrick, Lord Craigdorn, I think you have already met."

To see the cool way Captain Herrick shook hands with the girl, and then explained to her father that he had already had the pleasure of meeting his daughter, you would have thought that he'd known all along who the girl was.

I must say clothes do make a difference even to a pretty girl as you would jolly well have said if you'd seen Miss Seaton in the ripping white frock she wore that afternoon.

Lord Craigdorn was a handsome old Johnnie, too, and a very decent sort if he hadn't jawed away about Captain Herrick's and my heroism in saving his sister's and his only daughter's life.

Digitized by Google

I asked how the old lady was just by way of putting a stopper on, and he said she was pretty fit only suffering from a slight attack of rheumatism which prevented her leaving the house.

She hoped, however, to see us all at the Castle for a few days if Uncle Jack would arrange it.

As a matter of fact Uncle Jack couldn't—at least, not for himself—he'd got a lot more chaps coming up for the shooting.

So it ended by Captain Herrick and I going to Craigdorn Castle by ourselves, and, by George! we did have a ripping time with the trout!

At least, I did. Captain Herrick might have caught no end only he was busy teaching Mary Seaton a new cast with a special kind of fly. At least, that is what they said they'd been doing when they came in late for tea two afternoons running. All I can say is that when I came across them on the third day, they didn't look like fishing one bit.

Mary Seaton had on her white frock with a rose in her belt, and Captain Herrick was putting in all he knew to get hold of the rose.

When I came back a couple of hours later I'm jiggered if they weren't in exactly the same place. Captain Herrick was sitting with his back against a tree and Mary Seaton—well, so far as I could make out, she was pretty comfortable leaning against his arm. She held a crumpled card in her hand, and as I passed I heard her say:

"And do you mean to say that it would have made no difference even if I had been the Craigdorn milliner, Rupert?" looking up into his face as she spoke.

"Not a scrap, my darling," he said; "you would have still been the dearest, prettiest and sweetest little girl in the whole world."

I thought of Lady Herrick and smiled.

The girl smiled too as she lifted her head from Captain Herrick's shoulder.

"Rupert," she said, "you are a dear, and I believe I should have fallen in love with you even if——"

She didn't finish the sentence, but that I am bound to say was Captain Herrick's fault.

Morris Coleborn.

"I WONDER what old General X. can see in that odiously made-up Miss W.?" "The old war-horse likes the smell of powder, I fancy."

ADA: "No; Priscilla will never marry unless she finds her ideal." Ida: "What sort of a man is her ideal?" Ada: "A man who will propose."

ETHEL (shuddering): "How the trees moan and sigh to-night!" Bobby (speaking whereof he knows): "Well, I guess you'd moan and sigh, if you were as full of green apples as they are."

HE: "The artists say that five feet four inches is the divine height for woman." His Darling (crossly): "You know I am five feet eight." He (quickly): "You are more than divine, my dear."

FATHER: "I hear, my boy, that you have lately told your mother several falsehoods. This grieves me to the heart. Always tell the truth, even though it may bring suffering upon you. Will you promise me?" Boy: "Yes, father." Father: "Verywell. Now go and see who's knocking at the door. If it's the rate collector, say I'm not at home."

MRS. FIZZLETOP has been making an earnest effort to have her son Johnny taught to play the piano. A few days ago Mrs. Fizzletop called upstairs: "Why aren't you practising your piece, Johnny?" "I am." "You are not. You haven't touched the piano in the last half-hour." "I've been practising all the same. Those are pauses in this march, and I am practising them over and over until I know them."

TEN MORE GRAMOPHONES FOR READERS OF "SHORT STORIES."

In order that those of our readers who have not yet managed to secure one of these splendid instruments may still have an opportunity of doing so, we offer ten more of our famous Gramophones this week.

These prizes, as every successful competitor will tell you, are well worth trying for. They reproduce splendidly both the human voice and musical instruments. With each instrument is presented two records, and as a Christmas party entertainer they are hardly to be equalled.

What you have to do to Win a Gramophone.

Construct a sentence the initial letters of each word of which, in their proper order, shall make up the two words ALBERT GATE, the scene of the mystery of which Mr. Louis Tracy tells us in our next number.

Write your sentence in ink in the coupon below, using the initial letters given as the first letters of your words.

A.....	T.....
L.....	G.....
B.....	A.....
E.....	T.....
R.....	E.....

Name.....

Address .....

Then fill in your name and address, cut out your coupon, and send it to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., marking the envelope in the top left-hand corner "Albert Gate."

All attempts must reach us not later than first post on Tuesday morning, December 9th.

Result of the "Chaperon Sentence" Competition.

A handsome Gramophone has been awarded to each of the following in the above competition:

Mrs. E. Manning, 85 Beechdale Road, Brixton Hill, S.W.
S. Pavey, 58 West Street, Sittingbourne.
J. G. Bennett, 8 Sidney Street, Grantham
W. May, Harbour Constable, Folkestone Harbour
J. Peake Jnr., The Tannery, Liskeard
J. Brand, 27 Balfern Street, Battersea, S.W.
C. W. Lea, 196 Stockwell Road, S.W.
J. Darke, 16 South View Terrace, Plymouth
H. Baverstock, The Beeches, Bettemoor Road, Shirley, Southampton
T. F. Ingles, Westbury Stores, Westbury Avenue, Wood Green, N.

Digitized by Google

THE PRICE OF SILENCE.

The Story of a Man's Love, a Woman's Deception, and a Friend's Devotion.

***

Mr. Chris. Gerrard paid the cabman and ran in almost juvenile fashion up the steps of the hotel without listening to the "Thank you, sir!" of the surprised Jehu. Had Sir Allen Joyce arrived? No? That was a small piece of good fortune, Gerrard thought; he was afraid that he would not be in time to welcome his old friend on his return with his bride.

"I suppose it wasn't extraordinary for him not to say by which route he was coming," mused Gerrard, as he wended his way to the smoking-room. "He was never a man to worry about details, otherwise he would have managed his investments and certain other affairs himself since settling down. As nearly as I can gather from what he does say, he ought to have been here by now. Train late, probably!"

Gerrard sat down in a corner and lighted a cigar. His mind was full of his friend just then. They had been at school together, and had done a good deal of roughing it in the Colonies afterwards. Gerrard had been obliged to give up that life about six years previously, owing to a partial breakdown in health, but Allen Royce had continued the roving career, and, two years ago, had struck a good thing and made money. It is probable, however, that he would have continued his mode of living had he not unexpectedly come into the title and a goodly income.

Gerrard himself had not been fortunate, and for the few years during which he had been separated from his chum he had had some difficulty in making both ends meet. He never allowed Royce to know this, as he did not wish his friend to think that he was "sponging." It was an excess of independence, but Gerrard conceived that it was the proper course.

"And now he is married!" reflected Gerrard. "Who would have thought it, at his age—forty-five! Met his wife, and fell so desperately in love with her that he proposed and was married quietly by special license during a stay in the lake district up North. I am curious to see the woman. Met her near Windermere."

The smoke curled about Gerrard's thoughtful, bronzed face as he puffed slowly and deliberately at his cigar, keeping time with his meditations as it seemed.

"He would be a model husband, he would lavish every care, every attention, on his wife. If the woman actually didn't love him before marriage—which, of course, is an utter impossibility—she would be forced to do so by the manifestations of his love for her. I know Royce's character."

A hand touched his shoulder and he sprang to his feet with—

"Hallo, Allen, old fel—Oh!" he ejaculated, as his eyes fell on the figure confronting him. "It's you, Braxton? I thought it was Sir Allen Royce. I'm waiting for him."

"So am I!" rejoined the other laconically, taking a seat. "Sit down, Gerrard, I've something to say."

"Does Sir Allen expect you?" inquired Gerrard, puzzled

He looked down at Braxton without responding to the invitation to resume his seat.

"No, he doesn't!" was the retort. "And I can't say that he will be pleased to see me, but that is not my business. Sit down, man, and listen; you may be able to spare Sir Allen Royce the—well, let us be polite, and say the pleasure of seeing me!"

A cruel, cynical smile played about the lips of Braxton. Gerrard, more perplexed than ever, sat down and waited for the other to speak.

"People would tell you," began Braxton calmly, "that I am one of those individuals who earn their living by the exercise of their wits. In the course of that process I pick up certain bits of information which may, and often do, come handy. In plain language, they put money into my pocket, because the parties interested are willing to pay for the suppression of certain unpleasant facts, which I should consider it my bounden duty to make public if they didn't open their purse strings!"

"You're a blackmailer!" declared Gerrard hotly. He was the soul of integrity himself, and this man's brazen talk was almost intolerable. "What has all that to do with the Baronet?"

"It has to do with his new bride chiefly," observed Braxton entirely unmoved. "Naturally, what affects her, interests him, and he ought to be willing to pay for silence."

"Speak plainly!" demanded Gerrard sternly. "What does it all mean?"

"Sir Allen's wife is a criminal," said Braxton, with a trace of spitefulness in his voice. "She is really the woman who, in various guises and disguises, has been committing those robberies from grand houses, and she is guilty of other offences. She is a beautiful and singularly attractive woman, she ingratiates herself with men and women of position, receives invitations, and jewels and all that sort of thing disappear. As a rule she is not suspected."

It took Gerrard fully two minutes to recover himself sufficiently to make a remark.

"You mean to insinuate that Lady Allen Royce is this adventuress?" he asked with a gasp.

"I don't insinuate anything; I say straight out that she is that woman!" declared Braxton triumphantly. "I have indisputable proof! And I'll tell you more. She is preparing to gather up all the jewels and get all the money—in notes or cash—which she can wheedle out of her present husband, and then"—he lighted a match and blew it out—"she will disappear like that!"

"Supposing your statement to be correct, what is it to do with you?"

"As a matter of justice," returned Braxton evilly, "I have come here to point her out to the police as the woman they want for a case up in Scotland. Unless," he added slowly and significantly, "you will undertake to talk to the Baronet, and persuade him to buy the evidence from me in order to spare a scandal!"

"Never!" cried Gerrard vehemently.

"Then you are no friend, and I must try him myself! I would rather have you do it, because you are supposed to be such chums, but it doesn't matter to me. I expect Sir Allen is here by this time, so I will inquire for him! Good afternoon, Gerrard!"

"Stop!" commanded the latter. "Wait a little; give me time to think! How much do you want?"

"It's worth two thousand pounds!", said Braxton. "Make up your mind quickly, for I'm not going to lose my chances to please you! I'll give you five minutes."

Digitized by Google

Gerrard revolved this terrible matter swiftly in his mind. There was more in it than appeared on the surface; it was not merely a question of paying two thousand pounds—that would not be much for Sir Allen—but it was the effect it would have on him to find that the wife of whom he was so fond and so proud, was guilty of many crimes. If anything were done in the way of keeping the affair secret, it must be done without Royce's knowledge, or the blow would be almost as terrible. And Gerrard had not got that sum; he was congratulating himself on a stroke of great good fortune, having realised a profit of one thousand on a transaction which had extended over two years, but that was not enough to satisfy this man. Then, again, the idea of being mixed up in anything wrong went entirely against the conscientious nature of Gerrard; if he bought this man off, it would be equal to becoming an accomplice of Braxton and of the woman herself, assuming that the charges against her were well founded.

Poor Gerrard was torn this way and that, between his desire to help his chum, and his qualms of conscience. He had been overjoyed, on reaching the hotel, at the fact that he would be able to tell Sir Allen that he had made three thousand pounds for him in one deal. Now he could easily say that it was two thousand, and so make up the missing money, and he would willingly give up his own profit in order to save the friend who had more than once risked his own life for Gerrard. The money difficulty could be overcome, but conscience——?

"Time's up!" said Braxton irritably. "Going to do it?"

At that moment the door of the smoking-room was opened by a boy who looked in to see if a certain guest were there. Gerrard, looking through the open door over the boy's head, started as he saw Sir Allen's form pass the opening. By his side was a woman of thirty, tall and graceful, who turned her head slightly towards the open door as she passed. The vision of that face touched Gerrard and he answered Braxton's question with an emphatic "No!"

"That settles it!" said Braxton decisively. He had not seen Sir Allen and his wife go by the door. "I'll go and find the happy pair, and it will also interest Sir Allen to learn that Lady Royce has a husband still living!"

He was gone with that parting shot. As soon as he could collect himself, Gerrard made his way to the room indicated as Sir Allen's. He met Braxton in the corridor. They reached the door almost at the same moment.

"I forbid you to go in!" shouted Gerrard, forgetting himself.

"I shall!" asserted Braxton.

He made as if to rap at the door, but Gerrard intervened, and in an instant the two men were engaged in a tussle outside the room door. In the struggle, they fell against the door, which, a few seconds later was opened by Sir Allen Royce.

"For Heaven's sake!" he cried hoarsely. "Fetch a doctor! My wife is ill and I fear her heart is weak."

He was unmindful of the fact that the men he addressed were struggling together; his own trouble absorbed him. Gerrard and Braxton loosed their grasp on one another and hurriedly followed Sir Allen through the room into the next apartment, where Lady Royce lay on the floor, with an upturned face that told its own story to Gerrard.

The doctor was summoned, but he could simply confirm the opinion already formed by Gerrard. Lady Royce was dead, having succumbed to a heart seizure.

The grief of the bereaved husband was terrible to witness; he flung himself on his knees by the side of the bed on which they had laid the body and kissed the cold hand again and again.

"It is not true! It cannot be!" he moaned. "Come back to me, my darling! Do not leave me alone, without the love of a fellow-creature. I cannot live without you, my wife!" His voice shook with sobs and his whole body appeared to be racked with pain.

The sight was too much for Gerrard; he could not endure to behold the grief of his only friend. He could do nothing to help him, so he withdrew and left Sir Allen alone in his sorrow.

In the hall downstairs he encountered Braxton. It was almost with an air of triumph that he spoke to the blackmailer.

"Braxton, you are a big scoundrel, and it refreshes me to tell you so! But you have missed your game this time!"

"How is that?" sneered Braxton.

"The woman is dead, so you can do nothing, and you must find another victim for the exercise of your wits!" cried Gerrard.

"Come in here!" said Braxton quietly, leading the way into a small waiting room, which was empty. "Now, what does it matter if the woman is dead? The information is true, so it remains good all the same. If the facts become known it will be a terrible scandal, very nearly as bad—aye, perhaps even worse—for Royce. Remember him as we saw him just now. Don't you think he would pay two thousand pounds willingly in order that the truth should not be made known?"

"You brute!" cried Gerrard, amazed at the callous villainy of the man.

"Come, hard words won't mend matters. I want two thousand pounds, and for that I will hand over to you, or anyone else, the proofs I have here and will undertake to say nothing more about the previous history of Lady Royce." He watched Gerrard's face and could divine what was going on in his mind. "Well, is it a bargain? Will you complete this transaction on your own account, for the sake of your friend?"

"Yes, I'll do it!" said Gerrard after a pause. "Come with me and I will arrange it."

They left the hotel for Gerrard's lodgings. He had resolved to sacrifice his money and his sense of truth in order to save his friend. The revelation of the facts would crush Royce; the blow was hard enough for him to bear as it was, but to learn all the truth would probably kill him. The transaction was completed; Gerrard handed over the one thousand belonging to himself, and one thousand of the money he held for Sir Allen, and he received the proofs, which he at once destroyed.

As Gerrard sat alone in his small sitting-room that night he turned it all over in his mind, and found the best explanation for the tragically sudden death of Lady Royce. She had originally intended to dupe Sir Allen and leave him, after having obtained possession of everything of value which it was possible for her to get into her possession. But his great love for her made the execution of the plot almost impossible. She learnt to love him and she yearned to stay with him, but she dreaded discovery. Thus, torn by conflicting sentiments, she had lived through the last few days in a state of the greatest mental anxiety; every day she was preparing to fly with her booty and every day she was wavering and putting off the moment of flight. Gerrard heard from Sir Allen that his wife had become strangely excited after passing through the hall of the hotel, and had concluded that she had recognised Braxton, whom she must have known as the possessor of her secret.

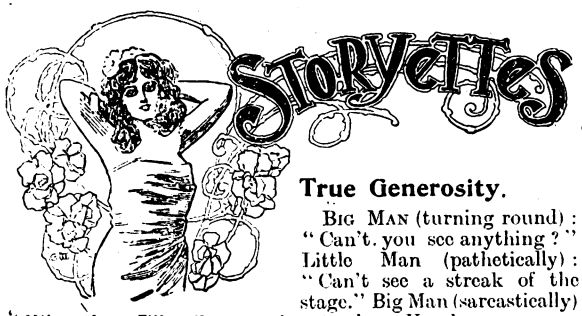
Yes, the inward fight and the fear that she was about to be denounced had so affected a naturally weak heart that syncope had ensued.

When all was over, and Sir Allen was able to think of business, Gerrard handed him the profit made on the investment. Sir Allen did not suspect that it was one thousand pounds short of the actual profit; he was satisfied that the result was fairly good. It was a month later that he discovered that Gerrard had lost his own money "by an unfortunate piece of rash speculation." His generous heart prompted him to offer the sum in gratitude to Gerrard for his kindness during the terrible days of which neither cared to say much, but Gerrard firmly refused. It was part of his own punishment for participating in a lie, as he put it to himself.

Once a year, Sir Allen and Gerrard make a pilgrimage together to a certain grave and when Gerrard sees how great and enduring is the love of Sir Allen for his erring wife, he feels that he is justified in having kept the truth from him.

G. E. Linger.

Digitized by Google



True Generosity.

Big Man (turning round): "Can't you see anything?" Little Man (pathetically): "Can't see a streak of the stage." Big Man (sarcastically) "Why, then, I'll tell you what to do. You keep your eye on me and laugh when I do."

The Wife's Paradise.

Mr. Flim: "What is there about these long-haired musicians that attracts you women?" Mrs. Grim: "Just think how easy a long-haired man is to manage."

Her Disappointments.

Miss Sentiment: "Were you ever disappointed in love?" Eligible Widower: "Two and a half times." Miss Sentiment: "Two and a half times?" Eligible Widower: "Yes, twice married and once rejected."

He Expected Too Much.

Harry: "And, dearest, do you think of me all day long?" Dearest: "I did, Harry; but the days are getting longer now, and of course—well, you know that that must make some difference."

Might Have Spared Him That.

"No, George," she muttered, as the miserable youth knelt in a passionate frenzy at her feet, "I can never be yours." "Well, Clara," he answered bitterly, as he rose quickly, "you might at least have told me so before, and saved me from bagging these trousers."

A Stitch in Time.

Sweet Child: "Are you going to be my new papa?" Accepted Suitor: "Yes, my dear child." "Have you got your wig yet?" "Wig? Why, no. I don't need a wig. Why do you ask?" "My other papa always said he was thankful his hair wasn't fastened to him."

Made Himself Eligible.

"Papa," said Miss Blooblood, "you remember you forbade Mr. Trivvet to call upon me because he worked for a living?" "Yes, I remember." "Well, papa, that objection is now removed. May he call?" "What's happened? Has someone left him a fortune?" "No, papa. He can't find any work to do."

Why He Mourned.

Smith: "What is the matter with you? I never knew you to have the blues so badly." Jones: "I am grieving over the death of my brother." Smith: "I didn't know you loved him so much as all that." Jones: "I didn't either, but the fact is after I had him locked up in an insane asylum he made his will and left me all his property, and now I've got to prove that he wasn't crazy, or his property will go to somebody else."

How Expenses Count Up.

Mr. Downton: "We've got to economise, and that's all there is about it." Mrs. Downton: "Well, you have two men and a boy in your office. A boy should be enough." Mr. Downton: "That shows all you know about business. I can't possibly get along without the boy, can I?" Mrs. Downton: "Certainly not." Mr. Downton: "Of course not. Everybody knows that. Must have a boy to sweep the office, run errands, and do all sorts of odd jobs." Mrs. Downton: "Very true. But the men?" Mr. Downton: "I've got to have the men to watch the boy."

Connected by Marriage.

She: "He is connected with you in some way by marriage, isn't he?" He: "Yes. He married my fiancée."

Before and After.

She: "Before we were married you used to call me an angel." He: "And now I wish you were one. Same thing."

A Peculiar Soil.

"I've noticed one thing about widows' weeds," said his reverence. "What's that?" "They rarely interfere with the growth of orange blossoms on the same soil."

A Good Name Lost.

Steele: "Marie Arlington has lost her good name." Sapsmith (hungrily): "Good gracious! What are the particulars?" Steele: "She has married a man by the name of Snooksby."

What Jennie Would Do.

"Jennie," said a young lady, turning away from the mirror, and addressing a companion, "what would you do if you had a moustache on your lip?" "If I liked him, I would keep quiet," was the demure reply.

Out of the Mouth of Babes.

Teacher: "I find only one mistake in your exercise. You have parsed phonograph as a noun of feminine gender. Why did you do that?" "'Cause I thought it was one of the machines that repeats everything you say."

He was Sorry.

Curate: "I hear you broke a chair over your wife's back during a quarrel you had last night." Parishioner: "Yes, sir." Curate: "And aren't you very sorry for what you've done?" Parishioner: "Yes, sir, the chair was as good as new."

Why He Turned Pale.

Wife (with determined air): "I want to see that letter." Husband: "What letter?" "That one you just opened. I know by the handwriting that it is from a woman, and you turned pale when you read it. I will see it! Give it to me, sir." "Here it is. It's your milliner's bill."

Willing to do Either.

An old Black-country collier, whose wife was dead, was very busy at the funeral assisting the eldest son in all the arrangements, and as in those days the corpse was carried by bearers from the house to the grave, the old gentleman, when all was ready to start, sang out to his son: "What bin I to do? Bin I to cry or carry?"

Sarah's Aunt.

"Sarah, this going out incessantly I cannot have; next Sunday you must stay at home." "But, ma'am, I have promised my aunt to spend the afternoon with her." Little Girl (interceding): "Do let her go, mamma. Her aunt has been made a sergeant, and has got a new coat with stripes on it, and a great, long sword."

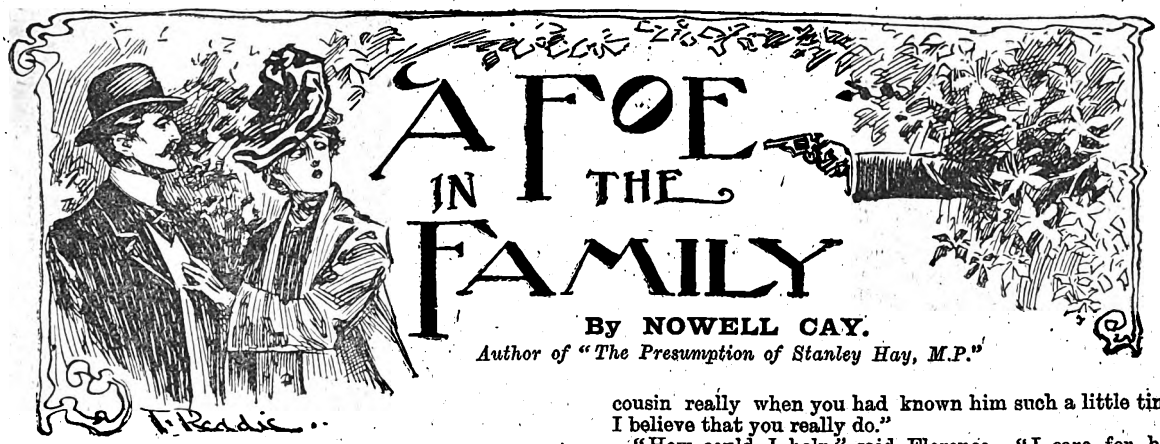
An Undecided Adornment.

"Angelina," said Edwin, "there is a little question that I have long been wishing to ask you." "Yes?" she said, opening her eyes very wide, and pretending complete ignorance, although confident that she was fully aware of its purport. "I wanted to ask you whether I ought to let my moustache grow or not?" Gulping down her disappointment, she said: "I would let it grow, if it will grow, but I'm afraid it is like you—undecided what to do."

Half the Truth.

Jones had married the prettiest woman in town, and Brown had married the plainest, and thought she was beautiful. One evening they were talking about their respective better halves, and Brown remarked: "I say, Jones, I think you and I married the two prettiest women in town." Jones looked at him in surprise a moment, but he saw he was serious. "Well, he replied cautiously, and with pride, "I suppose you are about half right, old fellow." Brown didn't see the point until he told his wife.

Digitized by Google



A FOE IN THE FAMILY

By NOWELL CAY.

Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

A Reconciliation

FLORENCE, faint and weary, had been unable to restrain her tears as the train started on the long journey. She could not tell how many more weary hours of loneliness and suspense lay before her, with the prospect still that at the end she might find George too late. The world, brightened for a moment by the kindness of his cousin, had become dark again, and, as soon as she found herself alone in the train, tears had come to her relief, and flowed unrestrainedly.

But they arrested themselves, and fear took the place of her dull despair when she saw the door of her compartment flung suddenly open to admit the figure of her enemy, the girl who had tried to detain her at Pennybrook Hall.

Catherine, for her part, had found her heart completely melted, and her suspicion finally conquered, by the sight of her tears.

"I am afraid that I have made a mistake and been horribly unkind to you, Lady Ilden," she blurted out, breathlessly, as the door was slammed behind her. "But where are you going? This is the wrong train for Ilden Market."

The big, pathetic eyes meeting hers were still full of fear and suspicion, although her apology sounded so genuine. Florence hesitated before replying.

"I am going to Scotland, to Lord Ilden."

"Scotland? But he is not there. He is at the Castle, and you are travelling away from him. Did Percival tell you that he had gone to Scotland?"

"No, Mr. Grant Ilden," said Florence. "I have not spoken to his brother."

"But it was Percival who took you to the station," cried Catherine. "And he told you that he was his brother? Then Cousin George was right, and it must be Percival who is in league with the people who are trying to take his life. And my foolishness almost allowed him to succeed in his plan for keeping you and your husband apart. I wonder whether you can ever forgive me."

The unmistakable evidence of his purpose was all that was needed to make her repentance complete. Percival could not have sent an ally off on a wild good chase to Scotland, and she was full of repentance for the part she had played herself.

It was a fitting punishment that the girl she had treated so unkindly should have difficulty in believing her sudden change genuine. But the fact that they would soon be at another station when she must persuade her companion to leave the train and abandon her useless journey made her bend all her powers to the task.

"You will wonder why I could have been so horrid," she blurted out impulsively, but I was prejudiced when I heard of the marriage. I did not think you could care for my cousin really when you had known him such a little time. I believe that you really do."

"How could I help," said Florence. "I care for him with all my heart, and you will tell me where he is, will you not? You will not deceive me. Forgive me, I feel as though you will not, but I am bewildered. Why should his cousin try to send me away from him?"

"That is what we shall all want to know," said Cathie, "and I think it will help us to solve this horrible mystery that seems hanging over cousin George. But I cannot think how I kept on being prejudiced when I saw you. You were not a bit like the girl I had imagined you. And now you will never like me or trust me."

"I think I do," said Florence, and for answer Cathie put her arms round her neck and kissed her, as she had been longing to do from the moment that she found her in tears.

"And now that we are friends," she said, "I wish you would tell me all that you know about this man Despard. Do you know why he wants to kill your husband?"

Florence's face, which had been aglow with the happiness of feeling that she had really found a friend, clouded suddenly.

While her husband's life was in danger she had no thought to spare for the possible tragedy that would come to her life when she had found him safe. Now it all came back with the question, and she remained silent.

"Cousin George himself thinks that he must have been paid by somebody who wants to clear the way to the title and estates," said Catherine. "Do you think that is so? Is Mr. Despard only the agent of somebody else?"

Florence shook her head.

"No, there is nobody else. It is only that Guy thinks Lord Ilden has injured him."

"Then I am sure that he is wrong," cried Cathie. "I am quite sure that George had never seen this Despard until he began to pursue him. I am sure that he knew nothing whatever about him. And besides, my cousin has never injured anybody. He is the kindest and best man that I know."

"I know that he is," said Florence. "But my friend, Daisy Despard, who has never deceived me, told me as she was dying that Lord Ilden married and deserted her, and would not allow her to tell her brother that they were married even when Guy had to believe that he had done her a greater injury still. I think that it turned her brother's brain. He cared for nobody in the world but his sister."

Catherine was staring incredulously.

"Your friend told you this, and still you are trying to save him from her brother's vengeance?"

"I love him," said Florence simply.

"And besides it is not true, and you know that it cannot be," cried Cathie. "Why, when was this marriage supposed to take place?"

"Early in the summer."

Digitized by Google

"Abroad?"

"No, in Yorkshire, at a village called 'Lallerton,' where she lived."

"Then it cannot be true by any possibility, for Lord Ilden has been abroad for a couple of years, and it is barely three months yet since he returned."

The strained look on Lady Ilden's face relaxed a little.

"I knew that it must be a mistake," she said, "although I am sure that poor Daisy Despard did not consciously deceive me. Is it possible that there are two Lord Ildens?"

"No," said Catherine, with a sudden enlightening suspicion; "but there may be somebody who had an object in assuming cousin George's title while he was abroad. But that is for George to inquire into when we have told him all we know. We must lose no time in getting to the Castle, in case Mr. Despard has managed to follow him there. It would be more than ever terrible if he were killed all through a mistake, and for another man's villainy."

She regretted the speech when she saw her companion's face. It was thus that it would end, Florence was saying to herself. Happiness like that which had been given back to her was too great to be enjoyed. She had found her husband all she believed him, only to lose him, and the expression of suffering hopelessness came back to her white, strained face.

Lady Ilden Visits the Castle.

The disappearance of Catherine had passed unnoticed at the Hall in the disturbance of the funeral arrangements.

The body of Rupert Ilden was to be taken to Mordenhale by road for interment on the morrow. His sons, together with Sir Charles Barton, and Jasper Ilden were travelling down later by train.

It was just after the departure of the hearse and an hour or so before the mourners were intending to leave the Hall that a message was brought up to the house from Catherine.

In passing through the station on her way to Ilden Market with Florence she had sent up word to Lady Mary that she was going to the Castle, but hoped to return before night. If she did not, her mother was not to be anxious.

Remembering that Percival would still be at the Hall, Catherine had thought it impolitic to give any further information, and even the easy-going Lady Mary, who had long resigned herself to a considerable amount of independence and unconventionality on her daughter's part, was not a little disturbed by this latest vagary.

"It is not as though Ermyntrude were there," she complained to Mrs. Jasper, as they discussed the message. For the widowed Marchioness of Dalmenay, who had ruled at the Castle during her nephew's absence abroad, had abandoned her post abruptly on hearing of his marriage, and was treating him with a dignified silence of which he was unconscious, from the neighbourhood of Nice.

"Perhaps George is there," suggested Mrs. Jasper, and Lady Mary looked alarmed.

"That would only make her conduct more remarkable. His wife, Percival tells me, has gone back to Sydenham, where they have been staying, it seems, since the marriage. I should wire to her to return at once if Catherine were not so impatient of anything like control, and I suppose she has some purpose in view."

Grant listened to all, but said nothing. He could not understand how Lady Mary could take the news so calmly. But then she had not been a witness of the scene between her daughter and Lady Ilden.

If Catherine could allow her jealousy of the woman who had won Ilden's heart to drive her into an open quarrel, as she appeared to have done, there was no knowing to what lengths her infatuation for her cousin would carry her.

Why should Catherine have gone to the Castle, except to see him, and what would she say when she saw him? If she was in the mood in which she had received his wife, Grant could understand her doing or saying anything; and her mother complacently imagined that she could be left to herself to do as she pleased.

He wandered over the house, tortured by jealous uneasiness. Somebody ought to save Catherine from herself.

The thought became unbearable at last, and he went in search of his brother.

"I shall not be coming down with you," he said. "I shall get down home a little later."

Percival glanced at him furtively, with the suspicion of a man who knows that he has injured another.

"I suppose you are running over to see Murgatroyd, and try to 'pump' him about the will before to-morrow," he said.

Murgatroyd was the family lawyer, and Grant drew himself up.

"No; I can trust the Governor to have acted fairly," he said; but the suggestion left an unpleasant suspicion in his mind, when he had hurried down to the station to catch the next train to Ilden Market.

It had been an understood thing that his mother's small fortune would come to him on his father's death. Before Ilden's return to the Hall he had been wondering whether its possession would justify him in asking the hand even of a rich woman without stigmatising himself as a fortune-hunter.

Percival's suggestion had made him ask himself whether his brother had intrigued to rob him even of that modest competence, but it seemed to him now that it could matter very little whether he found himself able to marry or not, and the question faded out of his mind for want of interest. Money could make no difference to him now that Catherine's infatuation for Ilden had shown itself unaffected by his marriage. Infatuation for such a man too. Despard's attitude had left Grant at least with a complete theory to account for the man's resentment, a theory by which his cousin's character suffered severely. And this was the man whom Catherine was making a hero. She was not worthy of the place he himself had given her in his thoughts.

He had managed to persuade himself that he despised her completely by the time that his tedious railway journey was over, and he found himself approaching the fine old building which the accident of birth had given to Ilden instead of himself. His cousin had everything, he said to himself bitterly. And without effort he had obtained even that which he did not desire. Life was indeed ironical, and the sarcastic lines round the poet's finely-modelled mouth deepened.

The Castle had a forlorn air to-day with all its blinds drawn, and the flag on its tower flying half-mast high.

The open door showed him a hall desolate with white wrappings that covered over furniture and armour as a sign that the family were away.

It was thus that it had given a melancholy welcome to its new mistress an hour earlier, when the two girls had arrived only to be met by the message that killed hope.

Lord Ilden had not reached the Castle nor had any message been received from him.

For Catherine, even more conclusively than for Florence, the fact seemed to prove that George had met with foul play, for Catherine had seen her cousin off on his journey to Ilden Market. She remembered how determined he had shown himself not to give any clue to his wife's whereabouts by joining her.

The two had stared at each other with wild eyes in which each had read in the other's eyes a dread that neither would express.

They had entered the house then to talk hopelessly over what was to be done when each felt that nothing was possible. It was a strange home-coming for the Castle's mistress.

Digitized by Google

She seemed strangely dazed, as if stunned by this new disappointment and the cruel lengthening of suspense. It was Catherine who acted, and she was feeling the need of a masculine mind to direct and assist her when she was startled to see through the window the figure of Grant Ilden approaching the house. It seemed an almost miraculous answer to an unexpressed wish, and she hastened out of the room to meet him, her face showing how welcome his arrival was.

The fact that Grant himself was looking anything but amiable did not even reach her consciousness.

"Oh! I am so glad that you have come," she said. "You will tell us what is to be done. I was wishing that you were here. But you have not news of cousin George?"

His solemnity had suddenly suggested a tragic explanation of his visit, and her voice was full of anxious eagerness.

"News of Ilden—no. I imagined that he was here," said Grant, and Cathie's dread that he had come with news of his cousin's death was put to rest.

"I thought he would be," she said, still distracted. "He told me most definitely that he would remain here until the funeral, and he has never come. It is terrible. But you will make inquiries along the line? You will find out what has happened—I feel so helpless?"

Grant was looking bewildered.

"I do not understand," he said coldly. "Did Ilden agree to meet you here."

"No, I should not have come if I had not met his wife," she cried impatiently. And the admission made him furious.

"And is it not enough for you to know that he has a wife?" he asked. And the anger in his voice reached her at last. She drew back staring.

"What do you mean, Grant?"

His indignation burst forth uncontrolled at the question.

"I mean that you are driving me frantic," he said impetuously, "by this mad infatuation for a man who has shown you by his marriage that he does not want your love. Why should everything be laid at his feet while I have nothing? Not that I have ever grudged him any of his advantages. He has wealth, title, and position. I have nothing. But I have never envied him until you made me by giving to him when he did not want it, all that I have so longed for in vain. His marriage has made no difference. Your only thought is of him, and you welcome me only because you think I can bring you together. Never a thought for me when I would have given my life for one kind one. Heaven knows that I would never have spoken if Ilden had wanted your love, but he has chosen another woman and you hate her for it, and are blinded enough to show your hate openly. If Ilden needs protection why did you not let his wife give it to him? Where have you sent her?"

(Ilden begins to see through the plot in next Tuesday's instalment.)

A woman passed down Piccadilly the other day dressed in colours so badly blended as to excite at once the astonishment and the ridicule of the passers-by. "That woman," cried a street urchin, "has been and gone and taken a bath in a rainbow!"

Ask your Bookseller for . . .

HOW TO CHOOSE A HUSBAND

By ROSALIE NEISH.

A Book every Man and Woman should Read.

Charmingly Illustrated. Six Shillings.

Your Editor Chats.

Next week the first instalment of the serial story, "The Albert Gate Mystery," will appear in Short Stories. As I have already told you, the tale is from the pen of Mr. Louis Tracy, whose works are so well-known to old readers of this paper.

Let me tell you that you have a great treat in store, and that you may safely look forward to a pleasant hour reading the opening chapters.

BEST WISHES TO MADGE MORRIS!

To-day is Miss Madge Morris' wedding-day, and I am sure that all readers will wish her every happiness. She has done good work for this little paper during the six months that she has controlled the "In Confidence" page. I am sure that a number of readers will miss her, but I have found a capable successor in Miss Cynthia Hamilton, who will take up the work which circumstances have compelled Miss Morris to abandon.

Miss Hamilton's experiences in affairs of the heart have been very wide, and, as her judgment is in every way sound, I am sure that those readers who wish for advice of this kind may rely implicitly on what she has to say. There are a number of replies to inquiries answered by Miss Morris before she left, which are already in type, but which have been held over for want of space. These, of course, will appear when there is room.

In the "In Confidence" page this week you will find a few words of farewell from Miss Morris herself upon the occasion of her relinquishing her favourite task of giving help to those in need of it.

OUR CHRISTMAS NUMBER.

In a fortnight's time the Christmas Double Number of Short Stories will be in your hands. It will be full of seasonable fiction, every line of which you will thoroughly enjoy. The number will be a double one, and the price will be 2d.

FOR NEXT WEEK.

For my next issue I have had prepared a number of clever little sketches of pretty girls of nearly all nationalities, and these will be used throughout the paper as headings for the stories. They will make a dainty and agreeable variation from the usual headings, and I trust you will like them.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

LORD MERVYN:

or, "NOT IN THE PEERAGE."

A Wrong Scent.

LAST autumn I was jilted. In the preceding summer I had narrowly escaped bankruptcy, and in the antecedent spring I had been the victim of a gross piece of injustice on the part of a near relation whom I thought would have known better.

The late Mr. Sirius Saturn, F.R.S., the eminent astronomer, was my uncle, and on the death of my father, his younger brother, being childless and a widower, he adopted me, promising my mother, who died shortly afterwards, that I should inherit two-thirds of his large fortune.

The remainder was bequeathed to his sister, then a Mrs. Vernford; and subsequently to her daughter, Beryl Vernford, my cousin, both of whom I had never seen till last year.

My uncle was by nature a very eccentric and irascible man. He was a staunch old Tory, very proud of his name and pedigree, and therefore when he heard that his sister, who had been left in reduced circumstances by Colonel Vernford, had contracted an alliance with a Mr. Eli Scubbs, a wealthy tallow merchant doing a considerable business in the Levant trade, no one was surprised that he made a codicil depriving her and her daughter of every shilling he had previously left them.

A year before his death he had determined to make one more grand effort to demonstrate the truth of his remarkable opinion respecting the brighter "faculæ" on the sun's disc, and with that view he requested me one morning to prepare his large telescope for observation.

I did so. Elated at the idea of yet convulsing the scientific world by his great and ingenious discovery, the unfortunate man approached the powerful instrument and, receiving my assurance that all was in readiness, applied his eye to the eye-piece.

Alas! he never saw with it again. In the most careless and culpable manner I had omitted to put on the coloured glasses, and the piercing streak of light that met his glance as he gazed through the telescope blinded him for ever.

To describe the old gentleman's rage when his oculist informed him that his right organ of sight was irreparably destroyed would be as painful as it is superfluous.

Suffice it to say that when his will was opened it was discovered that he had fully maintained his character for eccentricity to the last, having added another codicil by which he declared that I was not to inherit his fortune unless I married my cousin Beryl Vernford within a year of the day of his death. Should this condition not be complied with, the estates were to be sold and the proceeds devoted to founding a Hospital for the Relief of Indigent Astronomers.

What was to be done?

Of course the marriage by which I and my cousin were to inherit a fortune was out of the question.

In the first place, Miss Vernford had informed Professor Copernicus, one of the executors, and the only real friend I possessed, that "no consideration should induce her to even see her cousin under such conditions"; whilst her mother added that, "although regretting the flagrant injustice displayed towards her daughter, by which she had been deprived of her rights, she could not wish her to so far forget what was due to her as to consent to such a marriage."

Thus things looked hopeless enough, but it was absolutely necessary that something should be effected, for my position was rapidly becoming altogether untenable.

With the exception of a miserable pittance of eighty pounds a year, I, who had been brought up as heir-apparent to an estate worth five thousand pounds per annum, had no means whatever to live upon.

Being fond of the drama, I determined to try the stage, and for a brief season did the leading business at the "Theatre Royal, Grandborough," where I was known, according to the handbills, as "the great tragedian, Mr. Mervyn Lord."

Ere long, however, I quarrelled with the principal lady, an elderly person with a passionate nature, who complained that I did not really kiss her in the love-scenes, and the result was that I left the establishment. Afterwards I became a tutor, but found that still more unpalatable; and at last I went boldly to the Professor.

"Professor," I said, "what am I to do? This marriage, this iniquitous marriage is not to be thought of. Sooner would I take the oath of celibacy, and, joining some monastic institution, live a life of penance, than enter into the married state on such ignominious terms."

The Professor, who was waggishly inclined, had nothing to suggest except that perhaps I might ultimately be employed as Secretary to the proposed Hospital for the Relief of Indigent Astronomers.

Two months had passed in idleness. Eight trying weeks of impecuniosity and discomfort. I had dragged on a miserable existence in a Bayswater lodging. My former creditors, too, had sought me out, and threatened immediate proceedings.

My position was intolerable. I resolved to call once more on the Professor, and solicit his kind intervention on my behalf. We talked the matter over, and my old friend informed me that my aunt and her daughter were to leave England very shortly to join Mr. Scubbs, who was likely to be detained abroad for some time on business. He strongly urged me to pay them a visit before their departure, and endeavour, if possible, to remove their prejudices.

To this I at first vehemently demurred. Then the Professor drew a harrowing picture of my desperate condition. Then he represented an attractive one of my cousin Beryl. Then I half relented. Then the Professor alluded again to the spectral Hospital for the Relief of Indigent Astronomers, and finally I determined to make one tremendous effort to win a wife and fortune.

My aunt and cousin were stopping for a short time at the quiet seaside town of Beacham; and one fine afternoon in July found me knocking at their door, and feeling very contemptible and cross.

"Mrs. Scubbs in?" I inquired of the landlord, an unfortunate victim of epilepsy, who could scarcely speak.

"Un—no," he replied in a sort of squeak. "She and her daughter, Miss Vernford, have gone to London for a week."

Digitized by Google

"Just my luck," I thought, and hurried abruptly from the house, irritated and disappointed.

The attractions of Beacham, where I remained during the week, were limited. Outside the town and on the sea-beach were the remains of an old ruined castle. A notice-board intimated that beyond that point the young idea of Beacham might learn to shoot (with catapults), but that any one found doing so on the town side of it would be prosecuted. Here I used to spend the mornings, filling up the ocean with pebbles and meditating in what variety of nothing I should pass the afternoon.

On one rather windy morning, when I was still quite undecided as to whether I should sleep away the rest of the day on the sofa in the parlour or on the spring mattress in the bedroom, I was considerably surprised and greatly hurt by receiving a violent blow on the ankle from a stone.

"Those horrible catapults again!" I exclaimed, writhing with agony, and looking towards the castle. But, strange to say, in that direction there was no one to be seen. "The young rascal is hiding," I thought; "but I'll be even with him yet."

At this moment there was smothered laughter in my immediate neighbourhood, and, turning sharply round, I beheld a young lady sitting about ten yards off, and almost concealed by a large, brown silk umbrella.

Could it have been she who had committed this unprovoked assault, and was now enjoying the fun behind the shelter of a monster parasol?

I was just about to request that she would select some other target for her practice when the umbrella was partially lifted, and to my intense satisfaction there peeped forth from beneath it the most lovely pair of laughing dark-blue eyes imaginable.

"A pretty girl, by Jove! I wonder if she would care to have a shot at the other ankle," I thought to myself. And now she put down the umbrella altogether, thus displaying her rare beauty more fully. A profusion of dark golden hair, that waved wantonly in the wind, lent all the attraction of a vivid contrast to the spotless health of her fair complexion.

Her delicate neck swathed in down, the small chiselled nose, the short upper lip, all betokened refined origin; whilst the firm, rounded contour of her form, in all the promise of its ante-maturity, claimed attention in spite of the loose, pretty gown she wore.

She glanced at my ankle with a look of quasi-piteous sympathy, and then, with an expression of pseudo-humility, raised her large, long-lashed, good-tempered eyes to mine. One look was sufficient. I was in love with her.

But, nevertheless, my ankle began to pain me considerably, and upon trying to get up I found that I limped awkwardly.

At this moment my fair neighbour again raised her umbrella but no sooner had she done so than I heard a slight scream, and caught sight of the sunshade rolling rapidly down the beach and into the sea.

My first impulse was to rush forward and save it; but my foot was now in that state of incipient inflammation that I scarcely dared to stand up. She was, however, now standing at the waterside, and, stamping her shapely little, high-heeled boot petulantly on the ground, looked round at me with the most pitiable and imploring glance.

I could resist no longer. Martyr-like, I hobbled down as fast as I could, and arrived beside her just as an unusually large breaker burst at our feet. She had time to escape; but I, suffering agony in my ankle, whilst attempting to jump back, fell down in the surf, and was thoroughly immersed.

The umbrella, in the meantime, had receded still farther from the shore, and to my indignation, when I turned round I perceived my young lady sitting calmly on the stones, and apparently convulsed with merriment.

Filled with mortification and dripping all over, I limped out of the water, and expressed my regret that the umbrella was beyond my reach; in return for which remark she gave me what very much resembled a satirical bow, and thanked me for my exertions, expressing a hope that nothing had bitten me in the sea.

This last thrust filled up the cup of my misery. I took my departure, and when upon the parade I turned round in a weak manner to take a farewell look at her, she was in the water herself, and a minute after regained the truant sunshade.

As Beacham in general offered so little in the way of novels to occupy the attention, I naturally pondered much during that long summer afternoon over my adventure in the morning.

In the present instance I found great difficulty in consistently accounting for the conduct of this girl. Most people would have agreed with me in at once pronouncing her a flirt. The throwing of the stone, the prearranged accident with the umbrella, the laughter with which she had greeted my unfortunate performance in the water, though in her service, showed that, and to all appearance sufficiently.

But to me it was not conclusive. Would such an extremely pretty girl find it requisite, even if she desired a flirtation, to have recourse to such commonplace tricks? At any rate, if she was a flirt, pure and simple, she had acted the part to the life. And yet facts are stubborn things, and the fact undoubtedly remained, that she had derived considerable amusement from the success which had attended her effort to attract my attention, and to play off upon me a wilfully reckless practical joke.

The next day, about the same time, I wended my way once more towards the old castle. I had, as I had anticipated, been forestalled; she was there already. Slightly inclining her glorious head, she hoped I was none the worse for my immersion of yesterday. I was so pleased at meeting her again so soon, and finding the opportunity ready to my hand of solving the problem as to her real disposition, that I was at first a little off my guard, and by way of saying something observed:

"My misfortune carried its own recompense. It occurred in your service."

To my surprise she only slightly bowed, taking no other notice of the compliment, but asked casually if I was staying long at Beacham. This was hardly the procedure of a flirt, and I was more at sea than ever as to what she really was.

We chatted on general subjects till one o'clock, and at parting she told me her name—Clara Vesey—and asked mine. Cautious I have always been, and I though it best for the present to give my late theatrical designation, Mervyn Lord.

In the evening I met her again. I had now resolved upon a definite course to pursue in my examination of her nature. I intended to try my utmost to detect in her any indications of the propensity she had displayed on the occasion of our first acquaintance. With that view it would be necessary to get up a little flirtation of the so-called non-Platonic kind, and the evening was the fittest period to commence.

"Don't you find this place very dull?" she said, as we sat together on the parade.

"In your society it is little short of Paradise."

Again she ignored my overture. I was determined she should show her real colours.

"You are silent."

"Yes," she replied. "I was thinking how pleasant it was to you to save my poor sunshade yesterday."

I would not be put off in that manner.

"The blow on my ankle——" I began.

"Was too much for your gallantry?"

"Not so. In your service it was welcome."

"THE ALBERT CATE MYSTERY" STARTS NEXT WEEK.

Digitized by Google

More fair words. She took no notice of them, though.

"It was indeed," I persisted.

A frown passed over her face.

"You are very complimentary," she said at length, a little wearily.

"I detest compliments. What I say I mean. The only danger of labour in your service would be its inevitable enchantment."

I looked at her as I said this; but she did not return my glance. She was gazing rather vacantly at the sea. Of course, with all the beauty, she had ere now tasted the sweets of flattery. I would surprise her with mine. It should be carefully expressed, earnest, artistic. It should be like tribute warm from the heart.

"Such enchantment, I fear, would be short-lived," she said, a little absently, and still gazing seawards.

"The labour also, then."

She was again silent; but the vacant expression was gone. Her eyes had regained their normal look of merriment and mischief.

"Don't you believe, then, in life-long attachments?" I asked.

"Do you?"

"Most certainly."

"Of what description?"

"I believe in an affection which may almost be called adoration, which is as warm in old age as in youth."

She smiled. "That would indeed be glorious. Nor, of course, in such affection would there be any monotony."

At last I thought I was beginning to gain ground; nor did I then notice the satirical tone in which she was speaking, though it afterwards came to my recollection. I thought then she was in earnest, and I replied:

"Exactly. Monotony implies satiety, which adoration knows not."

"Such a love, the same throughout, must of necessity be so pure, so delightfully refined, so exquisitely temperate."

I congratulated myself on the progress I had made that morning, and the more I knew the girl the more I liked her. All my affairs seemed to suddenly grow rose-coloured. I entirely forgot my aunt, my cousin, and the pressing object of my presence in the place. All I began to think of was Clara Vesey. All I cared for was to be continually in her society, and every morning and evening found us together. I did not, however, yet understand her.

Although a remarkable unanimity of opinion had somewhat unaccountably sprung up between us on most points, I sometimes fancied that she was too easily pleased; but afterwards I accounted for this by her natural vivacity, which was ever to me one of her chief charms. We took long walks together along the shore, and arranged that if by any mischance either of us should be prevented keeping our appointment, we would, if possible, leave a note of explanation behind a certain loose stone in the old castle.

Four days had passed since my arrival, and two more must elapse before I need call at my aunt's house; if, indeed, I could bring myself to do so at all now, which, considering the altered state of my feelings, was beginning to be very improbable indeed.

On the morning of the fifth day she was not on the beach. I went into the castle, and in the appointed spot was a neatly-folded slip of paper. It contained these words:

"Dear Mr. Lord,—I am so very sorry I cannot meet you to-day. I will be on the beach to-morrow at the usual time.—Yours sincerely, C. V."

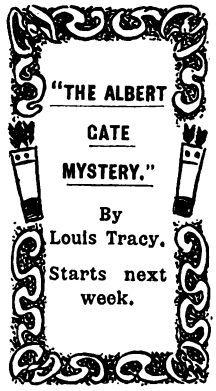
It was not until that morning that I was aware how deeply I loved her. It passed wearily and slowly. I could not walk. I tried vainly to sleep. I could only lie upon the beach and read and re-read her letter. The temptation was too strong for me. I determined to make an avowal to her of my sincere passion, if she gave me only the scantiest encouragement. I would ask her hand in marriage, tell her my circumstances, suggest a cottage, and, of course, furnish it with love.



When I met her she was in unusually high spirits. If possible, a brighter fire burnt in her deep blue eyes, a more mischievous smile dimpled her velvet cheek, and displayed the even rows of pearly enamel which lay behind her crescent lips. I clasped her hand with fervour.

"Oh! I am so glad to see you," I said. "I have been, really, so lonely!"

We sat down. There was silence.

"Do you find no pleasures in solitude?" she said presently, in a perfectly unconcerned manner.

This was but slight encouragement, and apparently she felt it was rather a disdainful reply to my exuberant salutation, for, though with an effort as if she suddenly remembered something, she turned towards me, and added earnestly:

"I mean—do you not prefer living alone, as a rule?"

"No!" I exclaimed, astonished. "What can have caused you to think so?"

"The mere fact of you doing so."

"But surely circumstances——"

"Are very much of our own making. Very often they are only a test of moral courage."

"What do you mean?"

"Break through them."

"But how?"

"Oh, if necessary by a leap in the dark."

"Your advice sounds desperate," I said.

"Circumstances are so, too, very often. But, seriously, why don't you try it?"

"Try what?"

"Marriage! Why shouldn't you? You're young, hate solitude. Surely the notion of a wife does not frighten you."

My satisfaction was intense at discovering what I imagined was her whimsically veiled confession of reciprocal passion. How little, I thought, did she imagine how prepared I was to avail myself of her advice, and to take a leap in the dark! I looked at her as anxious love will gaze, in hope.

"Oh! if you only knew what frightens me," I said.

"How can I know unless you tell me?"

"Shall I tell you?"

"Yes, please, by all means. This cuff is so tight. Will you unfasten it?"

She gave me her hand—firm little, bold little hand—and its touch sent a thrill through both of mine; and by a natural sympathy, the effect was communicated to my head, and made it the blind slave of my infatuated heart. The solitaire would not be disengaged. Her hand remained in mine. Another ineffectual attempt, and I succeeded. The cuff was undone, and, raising her hand to my lips, I took my reward—a playful box on the ear.

"Too quick, gallant knight. What were you going to tell me?"

"How much I adore you. Darling Clara! hear me while I declare the heartfelt love I bear you. Will you be my wife?"

At first she was not in the slightest moved, and even at the close of my address she only faintly blushed. It was the first time I had seen her do so. It was a favourable symptom. Alas! little did I then realise what was the motive of that blush.

But she did not answer me. Why? I looked at her again anxiously, hopefully expecting that the faint flush of modesty must have deepened into scarlet. Fool that I was! She was unmoved. The crimson had again subsided into the usual roseate hue of health. Her eyes followed the laughing waves, and smiled almost as saucily. I trembled. Could I have been mistaken?

"Do you love me, adore me, worship me?" she said, with radiant eyes.

"My whole soul is yours, angelic Clara—yours entirely!" I exclaimed, quite innocently.

"Have you ever cared for another?"

Digitized by Google

"Never! Never!"

She revelled in her victory. I fancied, when I afterwards reflected on her manner, that she had purposely prolonged the scene, desiring that I should taste fully of the intoxicating draught before she dashed it from my lips.

"And your love will always be the same?"

"Always! If I were torn from you this moment, and cruel fate forbade us ever to meet again, your presence would haunt me, your memory be enshrined in my heart as long as existence were mine."

It was finished. She rose, her usual gay, vivacious demeanour unruffled.

"Come to-night at seven," she said.

I kissed her hand. She was gone.

* * * * *

The evening arrived. The clock of St. Peter's Church was striking seven as I slowly wandered down to the castle. It was not a pleasant evening. The sea was covered with a dense vapour. The air was sultry. There was an oppressive stillness. I was there first. How familiar was the scene—the castle, the old notice-board, the wave-worn rocks! A quarter to eight. Strange she is not here, I thought. As the distant clocks chimed the hour of eight, I entered the ruins, and removed the stone. There was a letter. It was this:

"If you were in earnest this morning, please think no more of me. It should have been evident that we are quite unsuited to each other. When you receive this, I shall have left Beacham for good. Farewell.—C. V."

Treasure Trove.

Professor Copernicus received me very kindly. He sympathised with me in my misfortunes, and invited me to pay him a visit.

Nevertheless, he censured me strongly for omitting to call a second time at my aunt's house, and observed that he supposed experience alone would avail to put young men on their guard against promiscuous flirtations at the seaside. From my description of her conduct, he considered that the jade was evidently a thoroughly heartless and contemptible coquette. He would advise me to banish her for ever from my thoughts, feeling well assured that she was an innately cruel, reckless woman, utterly devoid of conscience, and a mere type of hundreds of others.

This was doubtless very sensible counsel, but somehow, it did not operate as the Professor wished.

I did not banish her from my thoughts, because I could not; so I moped and fretted, was silent and uncompanionable, lost my appetite, grew a beard, and expressed disbelief in everything, more especially in astronomy.

At this the Professor seemed to really grow alarmed. I required change, he said—change of scene and society. He had an idea to propose to me. It was this—that I should take a voyage to Turkey for the double purpose of benefiting my health, and making observations for him during the approaching egress of Venus retarded by parallax. The idea was welcome. The change of scene would be agreeable. I consented; and before many days had elapsed, I was on board the Mediterranean steamship Sultan, bound for the ancient and beautiful city of Mosquehat.

The important city of Mosquehat is most beautifully situated. It was this busy and opulent place we were now rapidly approaching. For some hours glittering pinnacles and gilded crescents had been visible from afar, and about six o'clock in the evening we put off steam just outside the harbour, where, much to our annoyance, we were informed that, owing to an insufficiency of water on the bar, we should have to remain till the morning. The post-office officials, however, came on board and took off the mails in a small boat and the company's agent, who left by the same opportunity, carried with him a list of the passengers for insertion in the Mosquehat Herald, an English newspaper published that evening.

The scene was very beautiful, and I remained on deck all night.

There I sat and thought, and whilst I was thinking sleep closed my eyes and I dreamt of what I had been thinking.

A figure of a girl—a well-remembered form—seemed to rise from the blue water, and, coming near me, laid its hand on my shoulder, and said: "I am not what I seemed. You will never comprehend if you don't know human nature. Not cruel, not false." And as she descended again into the waves, echo repeated, "Not cruel!—not false!" And then there was a long stillness, and when I awoke the beautiful scene was gone.

It was daylight. I descended to the saloon. Towards seven o'clock we entered the harbour and anchored about a quarter of a mile from the shore.

Through my cabin window I could see commissionaires of the various hotels crowding forward up the ship's ladder to secure as many of the new arrivals as possible for their respective establishments. Shortly afterwards there was a gentle knock at my door, and a dark-complexioned face, with little black, beady eyes, looked in, saying: "Pardon, monseigneur! I am the representative of the Hotel d'Angleterre! Grand hotel! Superb! Char——"; but at this stage of his oration I firmly closed the door, slipping the bolt into its socket. In the meanwhile the rapping on the door and panels of my cabin recommenced, whilst through the ventilators various cards, lists of criticisms, and approving notices were dexterously inserted in great profusion.

The clamour was tremendous; so, having completed my preparations, I took my modest hand-bag and rug, and, opening the door suddenly, was almost seized in the arms of a magnificent individual in a scarlet coat profusely adorned with gold lace; whilst round his cap, in letters of white on a gold ground, was the impressive inscription, "Grand Seraglio Hotel." I tried to extricate myself from his clutch and made a frantic plunge forward to the staircase, but in vain. He clasped me firmly round the waist, whispering the while all sorts of seductive observations anent the Grand Seraglio and its attractions, with a view to pacifying me.

And now all control over the crowd seemed to be over. As their respective chances of securing esteemed patronage diminished they grew utterly reckless, one struggling violently for my bag, while another would claw hold of my rugs, and a third conceive a violent affection for my umbrella. At the same time a continuous howling was going on, and cries of "Hotel de Mosquehat!" "Grand Hotel de France!" "Hotel Royal!" "Tres-bon!" "Charmant!" were dinned into my ears till deafness nearly supervened.

Resigning myself to the scarlet-coated one, I suggested to him that we should make one more desperate attempt to gain the deck. He graciously assented, and this time we met with more success.

Leaning on the great man's arm, preceded and followed by a mob of chattering stewards, I gradually mounted the companion, and made a kind of triumphal entry on deck. Hurried gently forward past the other passengers by my conductor, I descended the ship's side, the captain politely taking off his cap to me, whilst many of the passengers looked over the bulwarks to see me rowed off in triumph, lounging luxuriously in the special launch of the Grand Seraglio.

At the landing-place a tall, smart man in black, with patent leather shoes, and shiny black hat, which he respectfully lifted as he helped me on shore, was in waiting, and handed me to a carriage and pair, in which I drove off from the midst of a small but admiring crowd to the hotel.

There was clearly some mistake.

As we ascended the grand staircase I noticed that there were many of the visitors in the hotel looking over the marble parapets with, apparently, nothing to do but to gaze at me

DO NOT MISS THE FIRST INSTALMENT OF "The Albert Gate Mystery." STARTS NEXT WEEK.

Digitized by Google

I determined to put things on their proper footing at once: so, having duly surveyed the gorgeous gold-and-white apartments to which I had been conducted, I turned to my sable-clad attendant and inquired the price of the accommodation; but the man, having ushered me in, had closed the door and retired, leaving me alone to muse over my strange reception at Mosquehat.

What could it all mean? Had they mistaken me for somebody else? I took up a newspaper that was lying on the table by the window. It was the Mosquehat Herald of the previous evening. I glanced over it, and found the answer to the enigma in the list of passengers by the s.s. Sultan. Captain J. W. Arthur, Scotland; Mrs. Mary Baker, London; M. Jules Chatrain, Paris; Baron Diedermann, Frankfort; Lord Mervyn, England; &c., &c.

So they were really under the impression that I was a peer of the United Kingdom. Excellent!

By a ridiculous blunder on the part of a printer, I had received my title and its concomitant advantages. What would the smart man in black say when he heard that Lord Mervyn was, after all, only plain Mr. Mervyn—lord of theatrical celebrity?—for I may here observe that, for certain pressing reasons of a pecuniary nature, the urgency of which had become sufficiently obvious on the eve of my departure from England, I had thought fit for the present to retain my theatrical nom de guerre.

It was requisite, however, that the erroneous impression as to my exalted rank should be immediately removed, for, otherwise, it was impossible to say to what perfection in the art of self-development I might not find my hotel bill progressing in the course of my sojourn at the Grand Seraglio.

"The Albert Gate Mystery,"
Our Splendid New Serial, Commences Next Week.

At it was, I entertained but very little doubt that the expenses attendant on my princely disembarkation would show in the "note" a close approximation to the cost of the whole passage from London. I started, therefore, for the "Bureau" with a view to clearly explaining matters, when, as I was descending the grand staircase, the head waiter, meeting me, observed in a loud voice, "Your lordship's breakfast will be served in five minutes." Exactly at the same moment a young lady dressed in black passed by. I could scarcely believe my vision. It was—Clara Vesey!

I did not pay my intended visit to the Bureau. The apparition, as if by magic, of the very being whose memory and image had been for a whole month past stamped upon my mind, so startled my nerves that I thought no more for the time of my errand or its object.

I retraced my steps to my room, and pondered over the unexpected occurrence. The whole of the bitter past came crowding back upon my recollection. Each satirical look that her fair face had worn, each ironical remark she had uttered, were engraven in my memory, and returned to plague and humiliate me now.

Above all, I remembered with indignation the expressions of abject devotion I had used to a woman whose encouragement of them had been prompted by a rooted contempt for the infatuated speaker. And now I was near her again! She passed me by like a stranger. She would have none of me. I had afforded her amusement, and she had finished with me. Oh, that I could retaliate! Was the Professor, then, right? Was she indeed "devoid of conscience?" Would that I could yet let her experience such bitter self-abasement as she had inflicted on me.

At last the confusion in my brain began to subside; ideas again became arranged, and a scheme of mingled revenge and discovery suggested itself to me.

The truth was, that, notwithstanding the past, I still had a yearning affection for her, which, weak as it may seem, I would fain have found justified and reciprocated. As may well be inferred, I had thought deeply of her of late; and being of a philosophical and inquiring disposition, I had often tried to explain to myself some of the many inconsistencies in her behaviour during our brief acquaintance, which my close examination of it had revealed to me.

The result of these efforts on my part was to induce me to consider that there might possibly be in the disposition of this girl some intense idiosyncracy prompting her actions towards me, entirely distinct from a tendency to flirtation or reckless trifling. Sentiment, I fancied, floridly or passionately given utterance to, must seem to her nothing short of bathos wilfully misrepresented as pathos. In the formation of this idea, I had been partly influenced by the recollection of many of her looks, actions, and tones of voice—trivial evidence by themselves, but, looked at as a whole and in conjunction with her words, an indispensable element in the correct estimation of her character.

It was after breakfast, as I was strolling through the hotel grounds towards a small grove of cypresses that edged a cliff overhanging the harbour, that I met her again.

She had a book in her hand, and as she passed she raised her eyes to mine and smiled. It was the same ironical, amused expression that had so misled me at Beacham.

She was evidently undecided how to act, for I saw at once that if I had given her the slightest encouragement she would have immediately renewed the acquaintance, but I did not. Beyond a formal bow I made no response to her advances, continuing my walk towards the cypresses. But what was I to think now? What inference did that smile carry with it? I had little difficulty in deciding. It was a tribute paid to my supposed title. Clara Vesey could evidently meditate an alliance with Lord Mervyn, though her nature was utterly "unsuited" to that of Mr. Mervyn Lord.

I lighted a cigar, and ensconced myself in a secluded arbour off the main path.

My design was soon formed. Nobody knew me here, nor was I called upon to disclaim the distinguished rank with which I had been involuntarily credited, until it was directly and openly imputed to me. My plan was, then, to renew the intimacy between myself and Miss Vesey, maintaining, for a few hours, the assumption as to my peerage, and in that character to once more offer her marriage. If she were to accept me without further explanation, I should be satisfied as to her baseness, and revealing who I was, would release her from the compact, and see her no more.

Presently the silence that reigned around was broken by a footfall in the main path close by. It was light, slow, measured. How my heart beat! 'Twas she!

As she hurried along, shutting up the book she had been reading, I saw that she was closely pursued by a tall, stout Italian, about five yards behind her, who, as she was passing the spot where I was concealed, quickened his pace, and was just on the point of clasping her round the waist, when I emerged from the bushes, and offered her my arm.

The clear, deep blue eyes, just a little frightened, looked up so thankfully, and the little hand held so fast to my arm, that I was very much inclined to relinquish all my schemes for testing her character there and then. But, fortunately, I did not, and whilst the obnoxious individual who had been following her slunk off again between the trees, by design on my part and tacit consent on hers, we turned into the bypath leading to the secluded arbour at the edge of the cliff.

"Who was that man?" I asked.

"I don't know. A great stupid who is always making grimaces at me."

"He seemed very anxious to gain your acquaintance."

"Only that he might make a greater idiot of himself."

She looked very pretty. Dressed in black, her costume assisted her beauty by its striking simplicity. She wore a white straw hat, turned back at the edges and bound with a broad black ribbon. The book in her hand was a volume of Swift.

I was not slow in availing myself of the opportunity thus afforded me of commencing the application of the design I had so recently formed concerning her.

Digitized by Google

"I scarcely expected to meet you again so soon," I began.

"We prefer, that is, mamma prefers, the hotel to a private house."

"Excuse me. I did not suppose that I should have found you in either. What I meant was, that I scarcely expected to meet you in Turkey."

"Didn't you know we were here?" she said surprised.

"Certainly not. I am here on business; our meeting is, therefore, quite accidental."

She did not reply, but looked at me as if some sudden discovery had flashed upon her, then turned her eyes towards the harbour with the same look of abstraction which I had often noticed before, fixing them finally on the blue waves. Afterwards her manner was different.

"Do you like this place?" I asked.

"No, I hate this horrid big hotel! Everything is so formal. It is better, though, than May in London."

"Where should you like to live?"

"In Paris or Italy, in the midst of art and brightness. Shall you stay here long?"

"That depends entirely on circumstances," I replied.

"We leave to-morrow for Corfu."

"A pleasant place. You will prefer it to this."

"I suppose you know a good many people here?" she said.

"Not a soul but yourself."

"You will find it very dull, then."

"No," I replied, "like you, I begin to like solitude occasionally."

"You said you hated it at Beacham."

"I said a great many things there which I never meant."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. When we have an object to gain, as I had then, we often say things in our eagerness to obtain it, which, upon reflection, we must at least admit the stupidity of."

She was silent.

"You have done so also at times," I went on, boldly hazarding the accusation.

"I suppose I have," she said.

"I am sure of it, and, therefore, you can scarcely be surprised that I imitated you."

"But I had no object to gain," she retorted.

"Then you were so much the more to blame, since I had one."

She appeared a little disconcerted at this. It was evidently a new aspect of the matter to her.

"What was your object?" she asked, a little saucily; and I could just discern a slight reappearance of the old sarcastic look in her eyes, which she kept fixed on the water. However, I was now on my guard, and she did not find it so easy as before to enjoy an exhibition of sentimental imbecility at my expense.

"My object you are aware of," I said quietly, "as well as the method I employed to accomplish it."

"Did you, then, employ any very extraordinary method?"

"For me, a very extraordinary one,"

She was very interested. I had touched a responsive chord now.

"Is it possible," she was thinking, "that I have mistaken this man?"

I saw her stealing a side-glance at me, though my eyes were fixed straight in front, but I took no notice. Presently she said:

"Pray may I ask why you employed such a method?"

"Because I thought that, with you, it would be most efficacious."

"But you did not know me."

"Precisely. I was mistaken; I judged by appearances."

"What made you think I was sentimental?"

"I did not think you really so."

"What, then?"

"I thought—how erroneously I now know—that you wanted to get up a flirtation. I mean the sort of flirtation

(Continued on next page.)

INDIGESTION

Mrs. Annie Spiers, 104 Arley Road, Saltley, Birmingham, interviewed by a "Birmingham Telegram" reporter, said: "I am forty-two, and for a number of years I suffered from indigestion and biliousness. I had little appetite, and eating was followed by severe pain. As time went on, my complaints got worse; fearful pains tormented me, and I felt helpless and lifeless. I suffered much agony from pains in the shoulder blades. I went to several doctors, and obtained medicine from the Dispensary, and was also for three months under treatment at Queen's Hospital, but all to no purpose. About this time my son persuaded me to take some Bile Beans. My appetite soon returned and my spirits brightened, and after undergoing a proper course I was completely cured." Bile Beans cure Headache, Constipation, Influenza, Colds, Liver Chills, Rheumatism, Indigestion, Anæmia, and all female ailments. Of all Chemists, 1/1½ and 2/9 per box. Sample Box free on receipt of penny stamp, address as below.

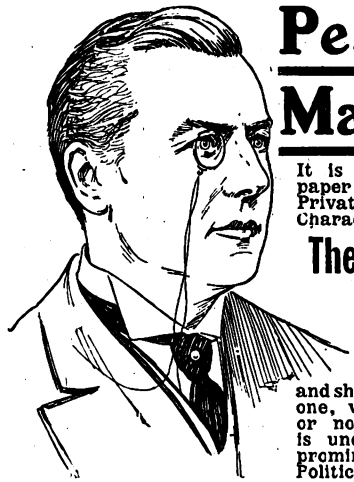
Half a guinea's worth for 6d. The "BILOSCOPE" and outfit, (an advertising novelty) for producing lifelike pictures. Post free on receipt of 7 stamps.

Address the BILE BEAN MANUFACTURING CO., Box 686, Greek Street, Leeds.

BILE BEANS

THE MAN WHO GETS THINGS DONE

Is the title of a most absorbing Article appearing in the DECEMBER NUMBER of - - - -



Pearson's Magazine.

It is the first authentic paper ever published on the Private Life and Personal Characteristics of

The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain,

and should be read by everyone, whether an admirer or not of the man who is undoubtedly the most prominent figure in English Politics to-day.

In addition the XMAS NUMBER of PEARSON'S contains another of the famous KETTLE stories by CUTCLIFFE HYNE; with a full-page Portrait of THE CAPTAIN in Colours.

Also a number of Sensational Stories and Articles by such well-known writers as ROBERT BARR, L. T. MEADE, ROBERT EUSTACE, G. S. LAYARD, and others.

On Sale Nov. 29. GET IT.

which consists of unlimited flattery, with a touch of romance, a good sprinkling of wild sentiment, and a dash of honesty, the whole served up by a devoted slave, whose common sense should be nil."

She smiled at this, and the ironical expression and tone of voice entirely vanished. Her real and inner nature was gradually unfolding, slowly proving the accuracy of the hypothesis.

"Why did you fancy I wanted a flirtation?"

"Because you threw that stone at my ankle."

At this remark she fairly laughed, saying, "I never threw it."

"What?"

"It was a boy, with a catapult, in the castle."

This was rather a check for me; but, to gain time, I said, "At all events, it seemed to amuse you very much."

"It did; and it would have done so much more if I had known that you were my Lord Mervyn."

"Why?"

"Because you were sitting there in such a dignified manner, as if the whole world belonged to you. And the absurdity of a little street boy putting all your magnificence to flight would have been so much increased."

She was just now perfectly genuine—enjoying the rare indulgence of airing her favourite ideas; too innocent to perceive that I had detected and was making use of them—only luxuriating in escaping for a time from the necessity of satire and of conforming to conventional opinions.

I determined on a bold step. I wanted to see the effect of a sudden piece of sentiment. In the most tender and languishing manner I could command I said, "I dreamt of you last night."

The genuine look vanished instantly. The soft, natural, happy expression changed immediately to one of cautious amusement. She felt she was back again in a world that was not hers—a world which, for the time, she must pretend to be of, nevertheless, for form's sake.

The outward expression of all this was a desperate attempt to compel her wayward, disobedient eyes to assume a look which they, poor servants of an unreasonable mistress, were utterly unable and unaccustomed to wear. A look, as at Beacham, of deep, soul-subduing passion, which was just about to terminate in the usual merry laugh, when I said, "Such an absurd, fantastic dream!"

Its effect was as if she had suddenly been checkmated.

"Do tell it me!" she said.

"I was on board the steamer, and, the night being beautiful, and the saloon crowded, I slept on deck. Of course there were all the usual accompaniments of the most approved sentimental and romantic pattern: the inevitable floods of pale moonlight——"

"The requisite harmony of the surrounding scene," she put in.

"The undying memory of the fair absentee."

The blue eyes brightened up, and a little ecstatic laugh showed the reality of the amusement which the description gave her.

"Presently," I continued, "instead of sweet sleep encircling me with her taper arm, I——"

"Yes!"

"—I fell into a sound doze. From the depths of ultramarine there rose——"

"To the sound of a fairy chorus, or a German band?" she asked.

"To the first, of course. There rose your form on my enchanted view."

"Was I a pale, transparent shade?"

"You were."

"So that you could see right through me?"

"I could"

"And what did you see?"

"The figures of Romance and Sentiment doing their utmost to encourage you."

"Did I obey them?"

"Of course you did. You forget that I was dreaming."

"Oh, yes! What did I say?"

"You said—let me see, what were the exact words? These ridiculous things soon fade from recollection: 'I am not what I seemed. You will ever comprehend, if you don't know human nature. Not cruel—not false!'"

"Cruel! False! You never thought me that?" she said anxiously.

"You don't seem to remember that all this was a nonsensical dream."

"Yes—I know! But—you dreamt it."

"Of you. That is, it was a distorted image of the mistaken character I had invested you with at Beacham."

"I do not quite understand."

"The explanation is simple. At Beacham I misread you. I had no suspicion that your nature was so allied to mine as it is. I mistook the burlesque for the original, so delicate was your treatment of the character you were playing. In my dream, however, you appeared to me as I had known you then, not as I know you now."

She was satisfied. No other query came from her lips. The intensity of her astonishment at hearing me give utterance to the opinions I had expressed within the last hour—so diametrically opposed to her previous conception of my character—held her in thrall. At the distant sound of a gong announcing one o'clock she rose to go.

"Shall you come out this afternoon?" I asked.

"Yes."

We parted.

I felt now that she was certainly a woman I cared to win, not merely for my own sake, but for hers; because I saw clearly that her nature was of such an uncommon type that few would ever properly understand her.

Now, though it differed in many respects from mine, it yet attracted me immensely, in this, that it seemed more at variance with others. It was a strange combination, and illustrated forcibly the effect which a mistaken system of education—one, at all events, unfitted to her—had exercised upon nature. It was reserved for some close student of human nature to discover beneath the coating of society varnish the precious material of originality. I had discovered it by a strange and bitter experience; though, in rescuing it from the clouds of formality with which it had been so carefully enveloped, I found a task difficult indeed.

I felt, however, inclined to persevere, rejoicing more and more at every new indication of the freshness and innocence which I was convinced lay behind. When I met her in the afternoon, mine was a part hard to play. This, I knew, was to be the crisis of our acquaintance. We were both bent on probing each other's character to the core. One false step on the part of either would be fatal.

I could scarcely resist expressing the most honest admiration of her wondrous beauty. I had to do it, nevertheless. The nature I had to deal with is little sympathised wit. The expression of feeling on such a subject had been, moreover, so satiated with flattery, though the reception of it was so unwelcome, that its greatest comfort was to meet with one who would utterly ignore for the time the physical perfection which contained it.

"What used you to do at Beacham after I left?"

She said this so frankly that I could not help looking at her in astonishment. She was decidedly in earnest, evidently quite unconscious that her words might appear heartless or extraordinary. If I had, then, misinterpreted her meaning and had chanced to give the conversation a wrong turn,

(Continued on page 735.)

"THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY."
By LOUIS TRACY
Commences Next Week.

Digitized by Google

Alfosco Regd

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Patterns Post Free.

Alfosco Regd

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 1262. 10/6

Design No. 1262. 10/6.

The Fashionable Three-quarter Sacque Jacket for Winter wear, direct at first cost from the "Alfosco" factories. This marvellous Jacket is produced in several excellent cloths, Black or Grey Vicuna, and Frieze, also in pretty Grey Tweeds, and in Black, Fawn, and Brown Beaver. Write at once for patterns. The Jacket is cut with the full Sacque-back, and trimmed with tailor stitching and pearl buttons, smart cuffs and lappels. Price: 30in. long 10/6; 33in., 11/6; 36in., 12/6; 39in., 13/6; or 42in. long, 14/6; carriage, 6d. extra. The Jacket can be ordered single-breasted if preferred. Send bust measurement under arms, and length required. Money returned if not approved.

Design 1261. 10/6.

Chesterfield Three-quarter Sacque Jacket, 30in. long. This jacket is produced in Black, Fawn, and Brown Beaver Cloth; also in pretty Grey Tweeds and in Black and Grey Vicuna Cloth. Price only 10/6; carriage 6d. extra. This Jacket can also be ordered 33in. long, 11/6; 36in., 12/6; 39in., 13/6; and 42in., 14/6; carr. 6d. extra

Design No. 434. 14/9.

Stylishly and handsomely trimmed Costume in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s Serge and Venetian Cloth, all colours. The Bodice is cut in the Russian style, lined throughout, and stylishly trimmed rows of cording and bands of stitched silk. Full flounced Skirt, trimmed silk and cording. Extraordinary value for 14/9; carriage 6d. extra. When ordering Costumes, please give Bust measurement (under arms), size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

WRITE FOR OUR

NEW SKETCH BOOK & CATALOGUE OF BARGAINS,

Containing Hundreds of Illustrations of Latest Novelties in Costumes and Jackets for the Winter Season.

Sent with Patterns, Post Free.

CALL OR WRITE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, LONDON, E.C.

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—

NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE Delamere Crescent, London, W.

Don't Suffer from Eczema

"ANTEXEMA" cures the worst cases—You may try it FREE

Let no one endure any longer the itching, burning, and smarting of Eczema, or any form of skin trouble, great or small. Send to-day for a free trial sample of "ANTEXEMA," together with copyright treatise on "Skin Troubles," and 200 testimonials from grateful sufferers who have been cured. Sent in plain wrapper, post-paid, by the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, N.W. "ANTEXEMA" is sold by all Chemists at 1/1½ (post-free from us for 1/3). Refuse injurious substitutes.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

IS YOUR BIRTHDAY THIS WEEK?

IF SO, READ THE BIRTHDAY COLUMN.

If further information is desired, send for particulars to "ASTURAL," 52 Station Parade Harrogate.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Digitized by Google

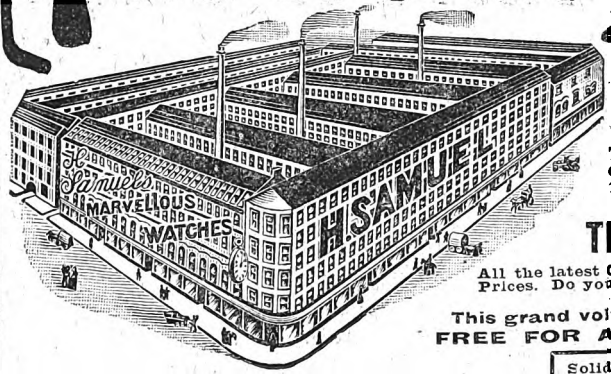
The World's Market

DEAL DIRECT WITH THE FACTORY! SAVE HALF YOUR USUAL OUTLAY!



SEND A POST-CARD NOW FOR
H. SAMUEL'S
BARGAIN ALBUM

The Perfect Money-saver. Nearly 200 pages, over 3,000 Engravings. Watches, 8/6; Clocks, 1/6; Gold Gem Rings, 3/6; Gold Brooches, 2/9; Cutlery, Plate, Silverware, &c.

THE SEASON'S BEST GIFTS.

All the latest Christmas Novelties a lowest Factory Prices. Do your shopping at home nd save half your usual outlay.

This grand volume is sent absolutely FREE FOR A POST-CARD ONLY.

H. SAMUEL
Sends his world-famous
'ACME' SILVER LEVER

Solid Silver Cases, fine ¼-plate movement, jewelled, dust-and-damp-proof removable cap, and the latest patented improvements. Price 25s. Full Amount returned if any dissatisfaction. Written Warranty for 7 years.

ON RECEIPT OF P.O. 5/- ONLY.

Wear it free for a week. If satisfied, remit balance 20/-. If not, return watch and your 5/- will b refunded.

A SOLID SILVER ALBERT! FREE!!

To all sending full amount, 25/-, with order. WRITE NOW FOR BARGAIN BOOK.

H. SAMUEL, DEPT. 29, MARKET ST., MANCHESTER.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 464.)

PAPER PATTERN

of

COOKING APRON & SLEEVES.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price One Penny.

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 90 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

PHONOGRAPH BARGAINS

5/6

Leader Special, 5/6
The best low-priced Talking Machine made.
DRAWING ROOM MODEL, 12/6
Others charge £1 10s 0d for an inferior Machine.
Leader Concert, 21/-
Equal to any 3-Guinea Machine.
Thousands of Records at 1/- each or 10/6 per dozen; 3 dozen or more 9/- per dozen.
You can make big money during the fall and winter.
A Few GOOD AGENTS Wanted.
Send for Samples or write for Catalogue, Post Paid.
MEAD & CO. Dept. 34 L, LIVERPOOL.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Guaranteed 4 years. Will work by hand or treadle. To ensure satisfaction, machine sent on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL: or, if desired can be paid 5/- Monthly. Write for terms, Designs, and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W., 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp. Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (BT), Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

FREE PRESENTS.

FREE.

You can earn a 3 years Warranted Watch, Life-sized Doll, Powerful Air Rifle, Beautiful Solid Gold Dress Rings, Long Guard, Bracelet, and Jewellery of all kinds from our list of pre-filled Exquisite Jewellery, at 9d. each (sold by us at 1/6.) You can have any of these FREE after selling Nine Articles of Exquisite Jewellery at 9d. each (sold by us at 1/6.) We send the goods on approval on receipt of your post-card. When sold you remit us the 6/9, and you get a Beautiful Present, absolutely free. Send no money, we trust you. You take no risk, as they sell at once, and we receive back unsold goods. Colonials must send 1/- for extra postage.

FREE.

(Room 59) HYDE PARK WATCH CO., 14 Kanelagh Road, Paddington, London, W

Digitized by Google

there would have been another misunderstanding. As it was, I said :

"I used to amuse myself by watching a ridiculously romantic couple making love in the old castle."

"Really ?" she said.

"Most certainly. The lady was tall, dark-eyed, and thirty."

"The gentleman short, red-haired, and twenty, in all probability."

"Near enough. They passed their time in a variety of ways. On one occasion I noticed that they kissed each other deliberately seventeen times in a quarter of an hour."

She laughed a little silvery laugh ; and at this moment a page brought her a telegram.

"No answer," she said, dismissing the boy. "From mamma. We do not leave till Monday. I am so glad."

"Indeed ! I thought you did not like this place ?"

"Nor do I ; but I like to meet a sympathiser whose society is congenial."

"And have I the privilege of being that sympathiser ?"

"I have mistaken you very much," she said.

"But that is all over. I also was in error, but stand corrected. Why should we lose each other's society ? Will you marry me ?"

"Yes."

There was no romance about it of the ordinary and approved kind. I knew she was true ; that she liked me for myself, and I wished heartily that I had not to confess that I was not what I seemed.

Suddenly she said :

"How glad I am you are not a lord !"

"How do you know ?" I exclaimed.

"There is no 'Lord Mervyn.' I looked in the Peerage this morning. I am not angry with you for doubting me. I also have deceived you."

"You ! In what way ?"

"As to my name. It is not Clara Vesey, but Beryl Vernford."

"Beryl Vernford !"

"Yes ! Have you heard it before ?"

"Many times. Know, fair cousin, that Mervyn Lord is a nom de guerre. I am no other than——"

"Cousin Geoffrey ?" she cried, amazed.

"Cousin Geoffrey," I replied.

* * * * *

The Hospital for the Relief of Indigent Astronomers has not been built.

F. Percy Monteith.

GERTRUDE (the big sister) : "Maud, I do wish you'd stop your chattering to that dog. Can't you see I'm talking to Mr. Lovedale ?" Maud (aggrieved) : "Well, I've got a right to talk to my puppy too."

"WHAT are your hopes for the future ?" asked the solemn man. "I have none at present," replied the youth. "To-morrow is my girl's birthday, and I am worrying about the present."

LADY (to housemaid) : "You should take a lesson from the cook. You are slovenly, whereas she washes her face three or four times a day." Housemaid : "No wonder. The fellow who comes here to court her is a chimney-sweep."

"I THOUGHT you said you were going to bring Mr. Browne home to dinner with you," said Mrs. Jones. "He couldn't come," replied Mr. Jones, as he sat down with great satisfaction to the first good dinner he had had a chance to attack for a long time.

MRS. JOHN COX (irritably) : "Here I'm dressed and waiting, with a dress on that cost you nearly £5, and a hat that cost £2 ! I should think you would be anxious to get out and let people see how well your wife is dressed instead of dillydallying in this way. What are you doing ?" Mr. Cox (meekly) : "One moment, dear, I'm trimming my cuffs."

The Lover's Guide to Courtship & Marriage.

By G. R. M. DEVEREUX.

A Volume containing sensible advice to all lovers from the first dawn of love, leading through the various stages up to marriage.

Price 1/-, post free 1/2.

SWEETMEAT-MAKING AT HOME.

By Mrs. M. E. RATTRAY, First Class Diplomee, National Training School of Cookery, London.

Some of the Chapter Headings are :—Chap. I.—SUGAR AND SUGAR-BOILING. Chap. II. — NUTS, FLAVOURINGS AND COLOURINGS. Chap. IV.—COOKED FONDANT SWEETMEATS. Chap. V.—MARZIPAN.

With Coloured Frontispiece and Several Illustrations.

Cloth, price 2/6, or 2/9 post free.

ORDER FORM. S. S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of
"THE LOVER'S GUIDE." I inclose 1/2
"SWEETMEAT-MAKING." " " 2/9

Name.....

Address.....

HOW ARE WE TO COMPEL YOU TO BUY PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we carry you by force to the bookstall to buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we petition Parliament to make it illegal not to buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we throw bad eggs and brickbats at you to make you buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we torture you with thumb screws to make you buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we cut off your fingers by inches till you consent to buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we beat you with red-hot pokers to make you buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we pour boiling oil down your neck to make you buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we extract every tooth in your head to persuade you to buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

Must we drag you behind a motor car at sixty miles an hour from Land's End to John o' Groats to make you buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA ?

NO, we must not ! Fortunately none of these things will be necessary, as you will, of course, buy PEARSON'S XMAS 'XTRA of your own free will, and cheerfully pay your shilling.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must in future be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

My Good-bye.

Although you will be reading these lines on my wedding-day, the process of producing Short Stories makes it necessary for me to write them ten days before they appear. To-night is a Thursday, and to-morrow I leave the offices of this little paper, alas! for ever. The thought makes me feel just a trifle sad; and if the tears will force themselves into my eyes, they are, at least, not tears of unhappiness—just tears of regret at leaving the good friends I have made during the past year.

A few readers out of the thousands who have written to me during the time I have controlled this page have questioned the manliness of a man who will allow his sweetheart to work and save money to furnish their new home. I have refrained from touching on this subject up to the present, for it is naturally a very delicate one. But, before I say good-bye to you, I would like to tell those who think hardly of the man who will soon be my husband, that I am one of those girls who prefer to make money and get married to shirking work and remaining single. Jack had some scruples at first about the arrangement I suggested, but he is broad-minded enough to see the folly of objecting on sensitive grounds.

And now let me, for the last time, thank you all very kindly for having made it possible for me to gain my ambition. Remember, if it hadn't been for you, personally and collectively, I could not have done what I have done, for if you hadn't been readers of Short Stories, I couldn't have controlled the "In Confidence" page, could I? So, you see, with your penny every week, you have helped to make me the happiest girl in the world.

The Editor tells me that I have been of great assistance to hundreds of young men and girls in their love troubles, and that I have smoothed out many tangled heart-knots. If so, I am sincerely glad—I can't say more.

Anyway, my heartfelt wish is that the dear little paper you hold in your hand may continue to flourish and grow in popularity. And that you and the rest of its readers may always be as happy as I am.

I understand that Miss Cynthia Hamilton is going to conduct this feature in future, and I am sure that she is more capable of the work than I am. We have spent some hours together to-day—I have been putting the reins into her hands, as it were—and I can assure you she is a great authority on affairs of the heart. She has seen more of life than I have, poor little girl, and her experience has been dearly bought. But she is a brave girl, and I heartily wish her success.

And now, dear friends, good-bye, and let me once more thank you a thousand times for your very great kindness to me—a girl whom you have never met.

Madge Morris.

TO MY READERS.

By CYNTHIA.

Miss Morris is, as you already know, leaving this office to get married. The Editor has asked me to take up the control of this page, and I have accepted the offer. I am not entirely a stranger to the majority of readers, and I hope soon to be on still more friendly terms with them.

A few letters have been held over to make room for Miss Morris' good-bye, but they will appear next week.

I am sure that you will all join me in wishing Miss Morris every happiness in her married life—happiness that both she and her husband fully deserve. Cynthia Hamilton.

THIS WEEK'S REPLIES.

Another Case of Deformity.

Nonsense, "H. L." You are quite wrong in supposing it to be your duty to give up your sweetheart, because of your loss of a finger. You have done all your duty in offering to set her free, and as she has definitely replied that she is as much devoted to you as ever, and more so, there is no reason whatever for you to cut yourself off from her. It would be a dreadful state of affairs if the fingers and not the heart governed one's affections. You are a very lucky fellow to have such a staunch sweetheart. Stick to her, and make the best of your little accident. Evidently it is not very serious, seeing what a good hand-writing you manage to secure from a deformed hand.

Should Cousins Marry?

So, "Relative," you are enamoured of your first cousin, but both your parents naturally object to such a match. They are, however, wrong in saying it would not be legal. There is no restriction to the marriage of cousins. But, as you must know, such matches are very undesirable indeed, for many reasons. If you are really so fond of your cousin as you say, no counsel will, of course, be of much use. But as a piece of cold advice, I think it would be very much better if you remained simply on terms of intimate friendship with her and dismissed the thought of marriage.

Bachelors and Christmas Cards.

Thank you, "Cusack," for your congratulations. It is not usual for an unmarried man living with his family to send out Christmas cards. These are nearly always worded as from "Mr. and Mrs. —— and family," in which you would be included. In the case of your own personal friends, there is nothing to prevent your sending out whatever you may like. In the case of the two sisters of your acquaintance living together, to whom you wish to send greeting, if they are living at home I should send the card to the parents, including the girls. If they are not living at home, send the card to both the girls. Of course, you could send a telegram if you think it necessary. There is no law against young men doing so. But it is rather the resource of the lazy and extravagant man, and does not really impress anybody.

How to Deal with Shyness.

"Laly" is very fond of Bert, but Bert is shy, and shows no signs of returning her affection. She believes he is fond of someone else. Well, "Laly," there is no reason why you should not hint to Bert that you are very fond of him. Perhaps he really likes you, but is afraid to make advances, for fear they should not be returned. There are a lot of men who are too shy to make a start in love-making. Send Bert a nice Christmas card, by way of a start, and give him a few more hints of the same kind. If he is not fond of you he will probably not alter in his manner, in which case you must conclude that he does not return your affection.

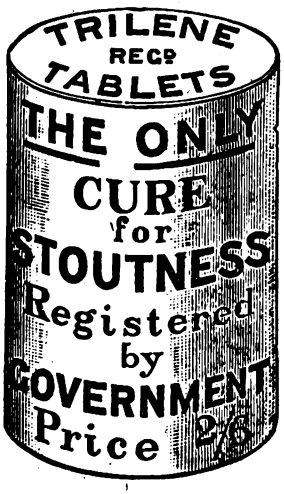
Printed by Horace Cox, Brem's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 16lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 2lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 26 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. BOLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets.

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

TO BE FIRST

is to occupy an enviable position. Many aspire for first place, but few attain it. To acquire the lead, aspiration and push alone are not sufficient—merit is required. This is exactly why

BEECHAM'S PILLS

stand foremost among medicines—they possess real merit, and have proved themselves worthy of a permanent position in the family medicine-chest. Trial purchasers become regular users, because they find nothing to equal BEECHAM'S PILLS for dispelling

Bilious and Nervous Disorders,

Indigestion, Sick Headache, Languor,

and other such troubles which arise from a Disordered Stomach.

They regulate and tone up the entire system. The genuine worth of BEECHAM'S PILLS has obtained for them the unique position of having the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1s. 1½d. (56 Pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 Pills).

Short Stories.

No. 728. Week ending December 13th, 1902. Price One Penny.

"STAND BACK!" CRIED THE SANDWICHMAN. "THIS LADY IS MY PROMISED WIFE!"

(An Incident from our Complete Story, "A WOMAN'S TROTH." See Inside.)

Digitized by Google

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

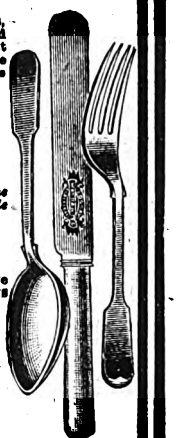
THE "ENTERPRISE" . PARCEL . 25/-

Household Cutlery & Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white "Ivorette" Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of 'Columbian' Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.



HOW TO PAY.

Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if the Goods are not perfectly satisfactory in every respect.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No. Risk Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

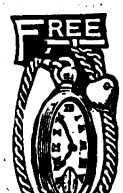
Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints, etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.



We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1¼ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Headaches Cured Free—Try ZOX.

Sure Relief from NEURALGIA, TOOTHACHE, HEADACHE, and all NERVE PAINS.

ZOX IS FREE TO EVERY READER OF "SHORT STORIES."

The Proprietors of ZOX have such belief in its efficacy that they offer any reader of Short Stories, who will send a stamped envelope, two Free Sample Powders. They will be quite satisfied to abide this test.

NEURALGIA, HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, AND NERVE PAINS.

NEURALGIA is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch which are most liable to the attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple and Sure Remedy, certified free from injurious substance by Dr. A. B. Griffiths. The Proprietors of the Remedy offer to send two free sample ZOX powders to any reader of "Short Stories" who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX Powders can be obtained of Chemists, Stores, etc., at 1s. and 2s. 6d. a box, or post free from

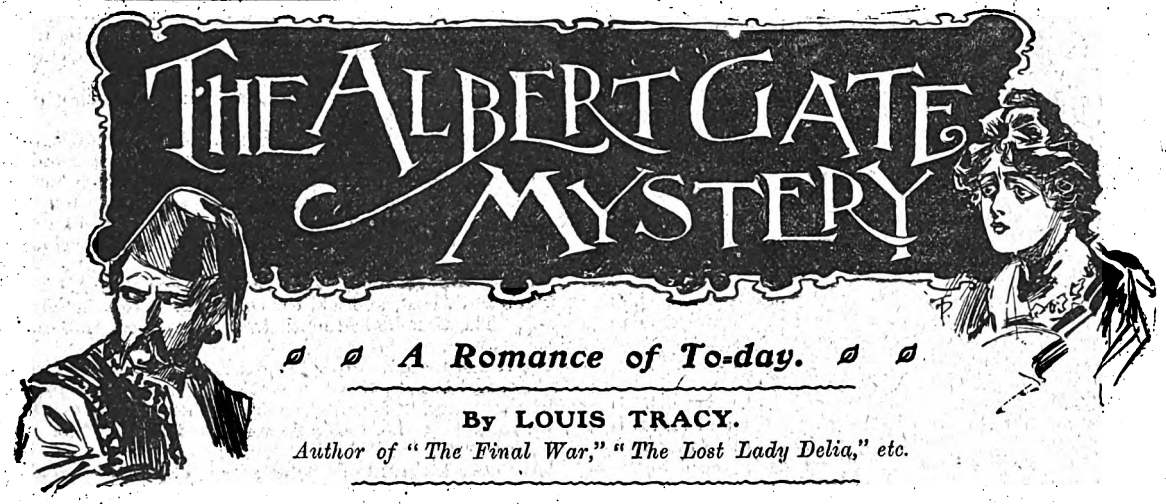
THE ZOX CO., 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Short Stories.

No. 728. For the Week Ending December 13th, 1902. One Penny.

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.



By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

FIRST INSTALMENT.

A Mysterious Crime.

Reginald Brett, barrister-at-law and amateur detective, had seldom been more at peace with the world and his own conscience than when he entered the dining-room of his cosy flat this bright October morning.

Since the famous affair of Lady Delia Lyle's disappearance and death, he had not been busy, and the joy of healthy idleness is only known to the hard worker. Again, while dressing, he had received a letter inviting him to a quiet shoot at a delightful place in the country.

All these things blended with happy inconsequence to render Brett contented in mind and affable in manner.

"It's a fine morning, Smith," he said cheerily, as he settled himself at the table where his "man" was already pouring out the coffee.

"Bee-utiful, sir," said Smith.

"Smith!"

"Yessir."

"Not even the best English autumn weather can stand being called bee-utiful. Don't do it. You will open the flood-gates of Heaven."

Smith laughed decorously. He had not the slightest idea what his master meant, but if it pleased Mr. Brett to be jocose, it was the duty of a servant who knew his place, to be responsive.

The barrister fully understood Smith's delicate appreciation—and its limits. He instantly noticed that the morning paper, instead of reposing next to his folded napkin, was placed out of reach on a sideboard, and that the eggs and bacon made their appearance half-a-minute too soon.

As an expert swordsman delights to execute a pass en tierce with an umbrella, so did the cleverest analytical detective of the age, resolve to amaze his servitor.

"Smith," he said suddenly, composing his features to their most severe cross-examination aspect, "I think the arrangement is an excellent one."

"What arrangement, sir?"

"That Mrs. Smith and yourself should have a few days' holiday, while Mrs. Smith's brother takes your place during my forthcoming visit to Lord Northallerton's—why, man what is the matter? Is it too hot?"—for the cover Smith had lifted off the bacon and eggs clattered violently on to the table.

"'Ot, sir. 'Ot isn't the word. You're a fair licker, that's wot you are."

Smith invariably dropped his h's when he became excited.

"Smith, I insist that you shall not call me names. Pass the paper."

"But, sir——"

"Pass the paper. Utter another word and I refuse to accept Mrs. Smith's brother as your locum tenens."

Smith was silenced by the last terrible epithet. Yet he was so manifestly nervous that Brett resolved to enlighten him before plunging into the day's news.

"For the last time, Smith," he said, "I will explain to you why it is hopeless for you to think of concealing tradesmen's commissions from me."

The shot went home, but the enemy was acquainted with this method of attack, and did not wince.

"You knew that Lord Northallerton had recently invited me to his October pheasant-shooting. During the last few days a youth who grotesquely reproduces Mrs. Smith's most prominent features, has mysteriously tenanted the kitchen, ill-cleaned my boots, and bungled over the studs in my shirts. This morning a letter came with a crest and the Northallerton postmark. Really, Smith, considering that you have now breathed the same air as myself for eight long years, I did not expect to be called upon for an explanation. Besides, you have destroyed a masterpiece."

"Sir—" began Smith.

"Oh, I understand, there is nothing broken but your reputation. Don't you see that the mere placing of the newspaper at a distance, so that you might have a chance to speak before I opened it, was a subtle stroke, worthy of Lecocq. Yet you demand feeble words. What a pity! Know, Smith, that true genius is dumb. Speech may be silver but silence is surely gold."

The barrister solemnly unfolded the paper, and Smith faded from the room. On a page usually devoted to important

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

announcements, the following paragraphs stood forth in the boldness of leaded type.—

MYSTERIOUS OCCURRENCE IN THE WEST END.

An affair of some magnitude—perhaps a remarkable crime—has taken place in an Albert Gate Mansion.

Owing to the reticence of the authorities, it is at present impossible to arrive at a definite conclusion as to the nature or extent of the incident, but it is quite certain that public interest will be much excited when details are forthcoming. All sorts of rumours attain credence in the locality, the murder of several prominent persons being not the least persistent of these. Without, however, giving currency to idle speculation, several authentic statements may be grouped into a connected form.

Four weeks ago a party of Turkish gentlemen of high rank in Constantinople, arrived in London and took up their abode in the house in question, after some structural alterations pointing at great security within and without, had been planned and executed.

Attending these Turkish gentlemen, or officials, was a numerous suite of Moslem guards and servants, whilst, immediately following their arrival, came from Amsterdam, some dozen noted experts in the diamond-cutting industry. These were lodged in a neighbouring private hotel, where they were extremely uncommunicative as to their business in London. They were employed during the day at the Albert Gate house. The presence in the mansion, both day and night, of a strong force of Metropolitan police, tended to excite local curiosity to an intense degree, but no clear conception of the business of the occupants was allowed to reach the public.

Whatever it was that took place, the full particulars were not only well-known to the authorities—the presence of the police hints even at Governmental sanction—but matters proceeded on normal lines until yesterday morning.

Then it became clear that a remarkable development must have occurred during the preceding night, as the whole of the Dutch workmen and the Turkish attendants were taken off in cabs by the police, not to Morton Street Police Station, but to Scotland Yard, this in itself being a most unusual course to adopt. They are unquestionably detained in custody, but they have not yet been charged before a magistrate.

The police, later in the day, carried off some of these men's personal belongings, from both hotel and mansion.

A sinister aspect was given to the foregoing mysterious proceedings by the presence at Albert Gate, early in the day, of two police surgeons, who were followed, about twelve o'clock, by Dr. Tennyson Coke, the greatest living authority on toxicology.

Dr. Coke and the other medical gentlemen subsequently refused to impart the slightest information as to the reasons that led the police to seek their services, and the Scotland Yard authorities are adamant in the matter.

The representative of a news agency was threatened with arrest for trespass when he endeavoured to gain admission to the Albert Gate house, and it is quite evident that the police are determined to prevent the facts from leaking out at present—if they can by any means accomplish their wishes.

Brett read this interesting statement twice slowly. It fascinated him. Its very vagueness, its admissions of inability to tell what had really happened, its adroit use of such phrases as "Turkish gentlemen of high rank," "noted experts in the diamond-cutting industry," "the greatest living authority on toxicology," betrayed the hand of the disappointed journalistic artist.

"Excellent," he murmured aloud. "It is the breath of battle to my nostrils. I ought to tip Smith for my breakfast. Had I read this earlier, I would not have eaten a morsel."

He carefully examined the page at the back. It contained matter of no consequence—a London County Council debate—so he took a pair of scissors from his pocket and cut out the complete item, placing the slip as a votive offering in front of a finely executed bust of Edgar Allen Poe, that stood on a bookcase behind him.

Within three minutes the scissors were again employed. The new cutting ran—

> There is trouble at Yildiz Kiosk. A Reuter's telegram from Constantinople states that a near relative of the Sultan has fled to France. The Porte have asked the French Government to apprehend him, but the French Ambassador has informed Riaz Pasha that this course is impracticable in the absence of any criminal charge.

"These two are one," said the barrister, as he turned towards Poe's bust, and laid the slip by the side of its predecessor. This time he had mutilated a critique of an Ibsenite drama.

The rest of the newspaper's contents had no special interest for him, and he soon threw down the journal in order to rise, light a cigarette, and muster sufficient energy to write a telegram accepting Lord Northallerton's invitation for the following day.

He was on the point of reaching for a telegraph form when Smith entered with a card. It bore the name and address—

"The Earl of Fairholme, Stanhope Gate."

"Curious," thought Brett. Where is his lordship?" he said aloud. "At the door, or in the street?"

His flat was on the second floor.

"In a kab, sir."

"Bring his lordship up."

Talbot's Disappearance.

A rapid glance at "Debrett" revealed that the Earl of Fairholme was thirty, unmarried, the fourteenth of his line, and the possessor of country seats at Fairholme, Warwickshire and Glen Spey, Inverness.

The Earl entered, an athletic, well-groomed man, one whose lines were usually cast in pleasant places, but who now was in an unwonted state of flurry and annoyance.

Each man was favourably impressed with the other in the first moment. His lordship produced an introductory card, and Brett was astonished to find that it bore the name of the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

"I have come——" commenced his lordship hesitatingly.

But the barrister broke in. "You have had a bad night, Lord Fairholme. You wish for a long and comfortable chat. Now, won't you start with a whisky and soda, light a cigar, and draw an easy chair up to the fire?"

"'Pon my honour, Mr. Brett, you begin well. You give me confidence. Those are the first cheerful words I have heard for twenty-four hours."

The earl was easily manœuvred into a strong light. Then he made a fresh start.

"You have doubtless heard of this Albert Gate affair, Mr. Brett?"

"You mean this?" said the other, rising and handing to his visitor the longer paragraph of the two he had selected from the newspaper.

"That is very curious," said the earl, momentarily startled.

But he was too pre-occupied by his thoughts to pay much heed to the incident. He merely glanced at the cutting and went on:

"Yes, that is it. Well, Edith—Miss Talbot, I mean—vows that she won't marry me until this beastly business is cleared up. Of course, we all know that Jack didn't slope with the diamonds. He's tied up or dead, for sure. But—no matter what may have become of him—why the dickens that should stop Edith from marrying me is more than I can fathom. Just look at some of the women in Society. They don't leave it to their relatives to be mixed up in a scandal, I can tell you. Still, there you are. Edith is jolly clever and awfully determined, so you've got to find him, Mr. Brett. Dead or alive, he must be found, and cleared."

"He shall," said Brett, gazing into the fire.

The quiet, self-reliant voice steadied the young peer. He checked an imminent flow of words, picked up the newspaper slip again and this time read it.

Then he blushed.

"You must think me very stupid, Mr. Brett, to burst out in such a manner when you probably have never heard of the people I am talking about."

"You will tell me, Lord Fairholme, if you get quietly to work and try to speak, so far as you find it possible, in chronological sequence."

His lordship knitted his brows and smoked in silence. At last he found utterance.

"That's a good idea of yours. It makes things easier. Well, first of all, Edith and I became engaged. Edith is the daughter of the late Admiral Talbot. She and Jack, her brother, live with their uncle, General Sir Hubert Fitzjames, at 118, Ulster Gardens. Jack is in the Foreign Office; he is just like Edith, awfully clever and that sort of thing, an assistant secretary, I think they call him. Now we're getting on, aren't we?"

"Splendidly."

"That's all right. About a month ago a chap turns up from Constantinople, a kind of special envoy from the Sultan, and he explains to the Foreign Office that he has in his possession a lot of uncut diamonds of terrific value, including one as big as a duck's egg, to which no figures would give a price. Do you follow me?"

"Each word."

"Good. Well—I can't tell you why, because I don't know, and I could not understand it if I did—there was some political importance attached to these gems, and the Sultan roped our Foreign Office into it. So the Foreign Office placed Jack in charge of the business. He fixed up the envoy in the house at Albert Gate, got a lot of diamond cutters and machinery for him, gave him into the charge of all the smart policemen in London, and what do you think is the upshot?"

"What?"

"The envoy, his two secretaries, and a confidential servant were murdered the night before last, the diamonds were stolen, and Jack has vanished—absolutely gone clean into space, not a sign of him to be found anywhere. Yesterday Edith sends for me, cries for half-an-hour, tells me I'm the best fellow that ever lived, and then I'm jiggered if she didn't wind up by saying that she couldn't marry me."

The Earl of Fairholme was now worked up to fever heat He would not calm down for an appreciable period, so Brett resolved to try the effect of curiosity.

He wrote a telegram to Lord Northallerton:—

"Very sorry, but I cannot leave town at present. Please ask me later. Will explain reason for postponement when we meet."

He had touched the dominant note in mankind.

"Surely!" cried the earl, "you have not already decided upon a course of action?"

"Not exactly. I am wiring to postpone a shooting fixture."

"What a beastly shame!" exclaimed the other, in whom the sporting instinct was at once aroused. "I'm awfully sorry my affairs should interfere with your arrangements in this way."

"You mean this?!" cried Brett, rising and handing the Earl a newspaper cutting.

"Not a bit," cried Brett. "I make it a sacred rule of life to put pleasure before business. I mean," he explained, as a look of bewilderment crossed his hearer's face, "that this quest of ours promises to be the most remarkable affair I have ever been engaged in. That pleases me. Pheasant-shooting is a serious business, governed by the calendar and arranged by the headkeeper."

An electric bell summoned Smith. The barrister handed him the telegram and a sovereign.

"Read that message," he said. "Ponder over it. Send it, and give the change of the sovereign to Mrs. Smith's brother, with my compliments and regrets."

Then he turned to Lord Fairholme.

"Just one question," he said, "before I send you off to bed. No, you must not protest. I want you to meet me here this evening at seven, with your brain clear and your nerves restored by a good, sound sleep. We will dine, here or elsewhere, and act subsequently. But at this moment I want to know the name of the person most readily accessible who can tell me all about Mr. Talbot's connection with the Sultan's agent."

"His sister, undoubtedly."

"Where can I find her?"

"At Ulster Gardens. I will drive you there."

The barrister smiled. "You are going to bed, I tell you. Give me a few lines of introduction to Miss Talbot."

The earl's face had brightened at the prospect of meeting his fiancée under the favourable conditions of Brett's presence. But he yielded with good grace, and promptly sat down to write a brief note explanatory of the barrister's identity and position in the inquiry.

The two parted at the door, and a hansom rapidly brought Brett to the residence of Sir Hubert Fitz-james.

A stately footman took Reggie's card and its accompanying letter, placed them on a salver with a graceful turn of his wrist, which oddly suggested a similar turn in his nose, and said:

"Miss Talbot is not at home, sir."

"Yes, she is," answered Brett, paying the driver of the hansom.

The footman deigned to exhibit astonishment. Here was a gentleman—one obviously accustomed to the manners of Society—who declined to accept the courteous disclaimer of an unexpected visit.

"Miss Talbot is not receiving visitors," he explained.

"Exactly. Take that card and the letter to Miss Talbot and bring me the answer."

Jeames was no match for his antagonist. He silently showed the way into a reception room and disappeared. A minute later he announced, with much deference, that Miss Talbot would see Mr. Brett in the library, and he conducted this mysterious visitor upstairs.

On rejoining Buttons in the hall he solemnly observed: "That's a swell cop who is with the missus—shining topper, button-hole, buckskin gloves, patent leathers, all complete. Footmen ain't in it with the force, nowadays."

Jeames expanded his magnificent waistcoat with a heavy sigh over this philosophical dictum, the poignancy of which was enhanced by his knowledge that the upper housemaid had taken to conversing with a mounted policeman in the Park during her afternoon off.

The apartment in which Brett found himself gave ready indications of the character of its tenants. Tod's "Rajasthan" jostled a volume of the Badminton Library on the bookshelves, a copy of the Allahabad Pioneer lay alongside the Field and the Times on the table, and many varieties of horns made trophies with quaint weapons on the walls.

A complete edition of Ruskin, and some exquisite prints of Rossetti's best known works, supplied a different set of emblems, whilst the room generally showed signs of daily occupation.

"Anglo-Indian uncle, artistic niece," was the barrister's rapid comment, but further analysis was prevented by the entrance of Miss Edith Talbot.

The surprise of the pair was mutual.

Brett expected to see a young, pretty and clever girl, vain enough to believe she had brains, and sufficiently well endowed with that rare commodity to be able to twist the good-natured Earl of Fairholme round her little finger.

Young, not more than twenty—unquestionably beautiful, with the graceful contour and delicately-balanced features of a portrait by Romney—Edith Talbot bore few of the marks that pass current as the outward and visible signs of a modern woman of Society. That she should be self-possessed and dressed in perfect taste were as obvious adjuncts of her character as that each phase of her clear thought should reflect itself in a singularly mobile face.

To such a woman pretence was impossible, the polite fictions of fashionable life impossible. Brett readily understood why the Earl of Fairholme had fallen in love with this fair creature. The honourable, typical, British peer had simply bent in worship before a goddess of his own creed.

To the girl Brett was equally a revelation.

Fairholme's introductory note described the barrister as "the smartest criminal lawyer in London—one whose aid would be invaluable." She expected to meet a sharp-featured, wizened, elderly man, with gold-rimmed eye-glasses, a queer voice, and a nasty habit of asking unexpected questions.

In place of this commonplace personality, she encountered a handsome, well-groomed gentleman—one who won confidence by his intellectual face, and retained it by invisibly establishing a social equality. Fortunately, there is yet in Britain an aristocracy wherein good birth is synonymous with good breeding—a freemasonry whose pass-words cannot be simulated, nor its membership bought.

Brett read the wonder in the girl's eyes, and hastened to explain.

Mehemet Ali's Note.

"The Earl of Fairholme," said Brett, "thought I might be of some service in the matter of your brother's strange disappearance, Miss Talbot. I am not a professional detective, but my friends are good enough to believe that I am very successful in unravelling mysteries that are beyond the ken of Scotland Yard. I have heard something of the facts in this present affair. Will you trust me so far as to tell me all that is known to you personally?"

"My uncle, General Fitzjames has just gone to Scotland Yard," she began, timidly.

"Quite so. Perhaps you would prefer to await his return?"

"Oh, no, I do not mean that. But it is so hard to know how best to act. Uncle expects the police to accomplish impossibilities. He says that they should long since have found out what has become of Jack. Perhaps they might resent my interference."

"My interference, to be exact," said Reggie, with the pleasant smile that had fascinated so many women. Even Edith Talbot was not wholly proof against its magic.

"I, personally, have little faith in them," she confessed.

"I have none."

"Well, I will do as you advise."

"Then I recommend you to take me into your confidence. I know Scotland Yard and its methods. We do not follow the same path."

"I believe in you and trust you," said the girl.

So ingenuous was the look from the large, deep eyes which accompanied this declaration of confidence, that many men would have pronounced Miss Talbot to be an experienced flirt.

Brett knew better. He simply bowed his acknowledgments.

"What is it that you want to know?" she continued. "We ourselves are no better informed than the newspapers as to what has actually happened, save that four men have been killed as the result of a carefully-planned robbery. As for my brother——"

She paused and strove hard to force back her tears.

"Your brother has simply vanished, Miss Talbot. If the criminals did not scruple to leave four dead men behind, they would not draw the line at a fifth. The clear inference is that your brother is alive but under restraint."

"I can see that it is possible he was alive until some time after the tragedy at Albert Gate. But—but—what connection can Jack have with the theft of diamonds worth millions? These people used him as their tool in some manner. Why should they spare him when success had crowned their efforts?"

"We are conversing in riddles. Will you explain?"

"You know that my brother is an assistant Under-Secretary in the Foreign Office?"

"Yes."

"Well, early in September, his chief placed him in charge of a special undertaking. The Sultan had decided to have a large number of rough diamonds cut and polished by the best European experts. They were all magnificent gems, exceedingly valuable it seems, being rare both in size and purity; but one of them was larger than any known diamond. Jack told me it was quite as big as a good-sized hen's egg. Both it and the others, he said, had the appearance of lumps of alum, but experts said that the smaller stones were worth more than a million sterling, whilst the price of the large one could not be fixed. No one but an Emperor or Sultan would buy it. His Excellency, Mehemet Ali Pasha, was the especial envoy charged with this mission, and he brought credentials to the Foreign Office asking for facilities to be given for its execution. He and the two secretaries who accompanied him have been killed."

Digitized by Google

"Yes?" said Brett, whose eyes were fixed intently upon the hearthrug.

"Jack was given the special duty of looking after Mehemet Ali and his companions during their residence in London. It was his business to afford them every assistance in his power, to procure them police protection, obtain for them the best advice attainable in the diamond trade, and generally place at their disposal all the resources which the British Government itself could command if it undertook such a curious task. He had been with them about a month—not hourly engaged, you understand, as once the preliminary arrangements were made, he had little further trouble—but he used to call there every morning and afternoon to see if he could render any assistance. Matters had progressed so favourably until the day before yesterday, that in another month he hoped to see the last of them. He was always saying that he would be glad when the business was ended, as he did not like to be officially connected with the fate of a few little bits of stone that happened to be so immensely valuable."

"Did your brother call there as usual on Monday afternoon?" said Brett.

"Yes; he came straight here from Albert Gate, and had tea with uncle and myself. He sat in the very chair and in the very position you now occupy. I can remember him saying: 'By Jove! the Hen's Egg'—that is what he used to call the big diamond—'is turning out in fine style.' He even discussed the possibility of bringing us to see the collection when it was finished and before it left this country."

"Did your brother say why the diamonds were brought to this country in the first instance?"

"Yes; the Sultan and his advisers seemed to think the work of cutting them could be performed more safely and expeditiously here than anywhere else. Even the Turk has a high regard for the manner in which law and order are maintained in Britain. Yet the sequel has shown that the diamonds and their guardians were perhaps in greater danger here than they would have been in Constantinople."

"Was that the only reason?" said Brett, who had apparently made up his mind with reference to the pattern of the carpet, and was now gazing into the bright fire which danced merrily in the grate, for the day though fine was chilly.

The girl wrinkled her brows in thought before she answered: "I think I do remember Jack saying that he believed there was some State business mixed up in the affair, but I am quite sure he did not know the exact facts himself."

"Can you recollect any of the special precautions taken to protect the gems? Your brother may have mentioned some details in conversation, you know."

"Oh, I think I know all about them. In the first instance, the house at Albert Gate had previously been tenanted by a rich banker, and it was well defended by all ordinary means against the attacks of ordinary burglars. But, in addition to this, before the diamonds left their safe at the Bank of England, the building was practically torn to pieces inside by workmen acting under the direction of the Commissioner of Police. It was absolutely impossible for anyone to enter except through the front door, unless they flew out of the second storey window. Servants and workmen, like everybody else, had to use this door alone, as the windows and doors in the basement had all been bricked up. Inside the entrance-hall there were always twelve policemen, and an inspector in charge.

"Everyone who left the house was searched by the inspector on duty, and Jack used to say that he was very glad he invariably insisted upon this examination, although the police were at first disinclined to meet his wishes in the matter, he being, so to speak, their direct superior for the time. Beneath the entrance-hall were several Turkish and other servants. Mehemet Ali himself, in the presence of his secretaries, used to open the door leading to the suite of apartments in which the diamond cutters worked, and two of the Turkish gentlemen would remain there all day until the men left in the evening. The envoy and both secretaries used to meet Jack when he visited the place, and for the last three weeks he had nothing to do but see the diamonds, count them, drink an excellent cup of coffee, and smoke a wonderful cigarette, made of some special Turkish tobacco, cultivated and prepared only for the Imperial household."

"Ah!" sighed Brett, with a note of almost unconscious envy in his voice. He knew exactly what that coffee and those cigarettes would be like. "I beg your pardon," he went on, perceiving that Miss Talbot did not understand his exclamation. "Will you tell me as nearly as you can the occurrences of Monday evening?"

"They were simple enough," said the girl. "My brother dined at home. We had one or two guests, and were all in the drawing-room about 10.15, when a note came for him from Mehemet Ali. I know exactly what was in it, as I looked over his shoulder whilst he read it. The words were: 'I wish to see you to-night on important business. Come, if possible, at once.' I have to tell you that it was in French, but this is an exact translation."

"Your brother was quite sure that it was from Mehemet Ali himself?" said Brett.

"Quite sure," was the reply. "He knew his handwriting well, having had several communications from him during the progress of the business."

"Did your brother leave the house immediately?" asked Brett.

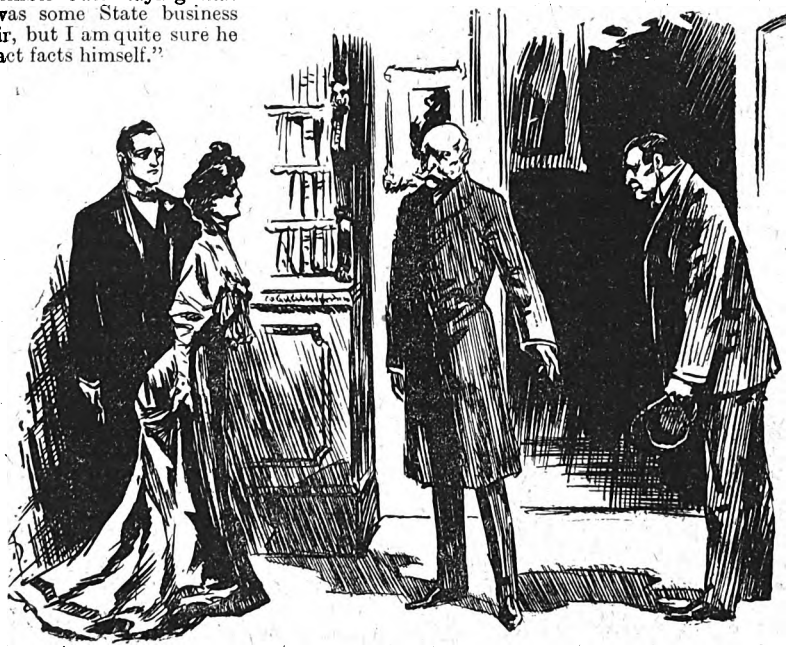
"That instant. He went downstairs, put on his overcoat and hat, and got into a cab with the messenger who brought the note."

"Do you know who this messenger was?"

"One of the policemen on duty in the house itself."

A slight pause ensued, and Brett was about to take his departure, having no further questions to ask at the moment, when someone was heard hastily ascending the stairs, talking to a companion as he advanced.

"This is my uncle," exclaimed



"This, my dear, is Mr. Winter, of Scotland Yard."

Digitized by Google

Miss Talbot, rising to go to the door. Before she could reach it an elderly gentleman entered, bearing upon him all those distinguished tokens that stamp a man as a retired major-general.

He exclaimed impetuously:

"I have brought a gentleman from Scotland Yard, my dear." Then he caught sight of Brett, and said: "Who is this?"

Edith was about to explain when another man entered, a strongly-built, bullet-headed man, with keen eyes and firm mouth, and a curious suggestion in his appearance of having combined pugilism with process-serving as a professional means of existence. His face extended into a smile when his eyes fell upon the barrister.

"Ah! Mr. Brett," he cried. "Now we have something to do that is up to your mark. You are on the spot first, as usual, but this time I can honestly say that I am glad to see you."

Sir Hubert Fitzjames glanced in astonishment from his niece to the barrister, but could find nothing better to say than:

"This, my dear, is Mr. Winter, of Scotland Yard."

Where the Crime was Done.

Brett promptly cleared up the situation by explaining to Sir Hubert, in a few brief words, the reason for his unexpected presence, and when the Major-General learnt the name of the distinguished personage who had sent Lord Fairholme to the barrister he expressed a ready acquiescence in the desire to utilise his services. Nor was the effect of such a notable introduction lost on Mr. Winter, whose earlier knowledge of the barrister's remarkable achievements in unravelling the tangled skein of criminal investigation was now supplemented by a certain amount of awe for a man who commanded the confidence of His Majesty's Government.

"Well," said Sir Hubert Fitzjames, with the brisk animation of one accustomed to utter commands that must be instantly obeyed, "we will now proceed to business."

For the moment no one spoke. The Scotland Yard detective evidently wished his distinguished colleague to take the lead, and no sooner did Brett perceive this fact than he rose, bowed politely to Miss Talbot and her uncle, and said:

"The first thing to do is to trace the whereabouts of Mr. Talbot, and this should be a comparatively easy task. The other features of this strange occurrence impress me as highly complex, but it is far too early a stage in the investigation to permit any definite opinion being expressed at this moment."

Every one seemed to be surprised at Brett's evident resolve to take his departure.

"Where are you going to, sir?" said Mr. Winter.

"That depends largely upon you," was the smiling reply. "If you come with me we will go direct to Albert Gate, but if you decide upon prosecuting further inquiries here, I will await your arrival at my flat."

"That is as much as saying that there are no facts worth inquiring into to be learnt here?"

"Exactly so," replied the barrister. "Miss Talbot has told me all that is material to our purpose. Her brother was unexpectedly sent for after dinner on Monday night and left the house hurriedly, without affording any clue as to his subsequent movements beyond that contained in a brief note sent to him by Mehemet Ali Pasha. Indeed, it was impossible for him to afford any explanation, as he himself was quite unprepared for the summons. Meanwhile, every moment that we lose in the endeavour to follow up his actions is precious time wasted."

The barrister's manner, no less than his words, impressed Mr. Winter so forcibly that he also rose from the seat which he had occupied with the intention of conducting a long and careful examination of each member of the household.

"Then I will come with you at once," he said.

"Oh," cried the Major-General, "I understood you to say as we came here that there were many questions which required immediate inquiry in this house, on the principle that the movements of the missing man should be minutely traced from the very commencement."

Mr. Winter looked somewhat confused, but Edith Talbot broke in:

"I think, uncle dear, it would be well to defer to Mr. Brett's judgment.

"Do you really believe," she said, turning to the barrister, "that you will soon be able to find my brother?"

"I am quite sure of it," he replied, and the conviction in his tone astonished the professional detective, whilst it carried a message of hope to the others. Even Sir Hubert, for some reason which he could not explain, suddenly experienced a strong sense of confidence in this reserved, distinguished-looking man. He stepped forward eagerly and held out his hand, saying:

"Then we will not detain you, Mr. Brett. Act as you think fit in all things, but do let us have all possible information at the earliest moment. The suspense and uncertainty of the present position of affairs are terribly trying to my niece and myself." The old soldier spoke with dignity and composure, but an involuntary quiver of his lips, as he uttered the concluding words, betrayed his anguish.

Brett and Mr. Winter then quitted the house; they hailed a hansom, and were soon driving rapidly towards Albert Gate.

"Do you know," said the man from Scotland Yard, breaking a silence of some moments' duration, "you surprised me by what you said just now, Mr. Brett."

"I thought you were too old a hand to be surprised at anything," was the reply.

"But, come now, you know well enough what I mean. You said you thought it would be a comparatively simple matter to find Mr. Talbot, whilst the other features of the crime are very complex. Now the affair, thus far, impresses me as being the exact opposite to that statement. The crime is simple enough. A clever gang of thieves get into the place by working some particularly cool and daring confidence game. They don't hesitate at murder to cover up their tracks, and they make away with the plunder under the very noses of the police. All this may be smart and up-to-date in its methods, but it is not unusual. The difficult question to my mind is, what have they done with Mr. Talbot, and how did they succeed in fooling him so completely as to make him what one might almost call a party to the transaction?"

The barrister pulled out a cigar-case.

"Try one of these, Winter," he said. "You will find them soothing."

"I never smoke whilst on business," was the testy reply.

"I invariably do," and he proceeded to light a cigar, and smoke with keen zest.

"I do not know how it is," went on Mr. Winter, "but whenever I happen to meet you, Mr. Brett, in the course of an inquiry, I always start by being very angry with you."

"Why?" There was an amused twinkle in Brett's eyes, which might have warned the other of a possible pitfall.

"Because you treat me as if I were a precocious youth. You listen to my theories with a sort of pitying indulgence, yet I have the reputation of being one of the best men in Scotland Yard, or I should not have been put on to this job. And I am older than you too."

"I may surely pity you," said Brett, "even if I don't indulge you too much."

"There you are again," snapped the detective. "Now, what is there silly about my theory of the crime, I should like to know?"

Our New Serial. Begin To-day.

Digitized by Google

"You shall know, and before you are much older. Bear with me for a little while, I beg of you. You may be right, and I may be quite wrong, but I think there is much beneath the surface in the investigations we are now pursuing. My advice to you is to drop all preconceived theories, but to note every circumstance, however remote it may appear in its bearing upon events, and in any case not to act precipitately. Whatever you do, don't arrest anybody."

"But," said the other, somewhat mollified by Brett's earnestness, "half-a-dozen people may be arrested at any moment."

"Pray tell me how?"

"Well, you know, descriptions of the stolen diamonds and of the suspected persons are in every police office in Great Britain and in most Continental centres by this time. Passengers by all steamers are most carefully scrutinised. Every pawnbroker or diamond merchant in the country is on the look-out, and, generally speaking, it will be odd if somebody does not drop into the net before many hours have passed."

"It will, indeed," murmured Brett; "and no doubt the somebody in question will experience a certain amount of inconvenience before he proves to you that he had nothing whatever to do with the matter. Now, don't answer me, Winter, but ponder seriously over this question: Do you really think that the intelligence which planned and successfully carried through an operation of such magnitude will be trapped by plain-clothes constables watching the gangways of steamships, or by any pawnbroker who has ever lent half the value of a pledge?"

Almost impatiently the barrister waved the subject out of the hansom, and the detective had sense enough to leave him alone during the few remaining minutes before the vehicle pulled up near the Albert Gate mansion.

Brett stopped the driver some little distance short of the house itself, as he did not wish to attract the attention of a knot of curious sightseers in the street. He asked Winter to go on in front and make known the fact that he was coming, so that there would be no delay at the door. This the detective readily agreed to, and Brett rapidly took in the main external features of the house which had become the scene of such a remarkable tragedy.

It was a palatial structure, built on the sombre lines of the Early Victorian period. Miss Talbot's brief description of the measures taken to protect its occupants from interference was fully borne out by its aspect. There was no access to the basement; the main entrance was situated at the side; all the ground-floor and first-storey windows facing on the street were fitted with immovable wooden venetians. Presumably those on the Park side were similarly secured, whilst the back wall abutted on to that of another mansion, equally large and strongly built, tenanted by a well-known peer.

Truly, it required a genius almost unrivalled in the annals of crime, to murder four people and steal diamonds worth millions in such a place whilst guarded by twelve London policemen and under the special protection of the Home Office.

What the Police Saw.

The appearance of Winter at the door caused the gaping idlers in the street to endeavour to draw nearer to the mysterious portals. Thereupon three policemen on duty outside hustled the mob back, and Brett took advantage of the confusion thus created to slip to the doorway almost unperceived. One of the police-constables turned round to make a grab at him, but a signal from a confrère inside prevented this, and Brett quickly found himself within a spacious entrance-hall with the door closed and bolted behind him.

Winter was talking to two uniformed inspectors, to whom he had explained the barrister's mission and credentials.

"We have here, Mr. Brett," he said, "Inspector Walters, who was on duty until ten o'clock on Monday night, and Inspector Sharpe, who relieved him. They will both tell you exactly what took place."

"Thank you," said the barrister; "but it will expedite matters if you gentlemen will first accompany me over the scene of the crime. I will then be able to understand more accurately what happened. Suppose we start here. I presume that this is where the police guard was stationed?"

Inspector Walters assumed the role of guide.

"I was in charge of the first guard established here a month ago," he said, "and the arrangements I then made have been adhered to without deviation night and day ever since."

He then led the way. But the internal construction of the house will be better comprehended if the inspector's verbal description be dispensed with.

From the outer door a short passage of a few feet led up half-a-dozen steps into the spacious central hall, the entrance to which was closed by a light double-door, half glass. On both sides of the first short passage were two small rooms, such as are often used in London mansions for the purposes of cloak-rooms during a reception or ball. The doors from these rooms opened into the inner hall. A large dining-room was situated on the left or Park side, and on the right was a breakfast or morning-room. At the back of the entrance-hall a handsome staircase led from left to right to the upper floors, whilst a doorway in the extreme right of the hall, and beneath the staircase, showed the way down to the kitchens and basement offices.

"Here," said the inspector, pointing to the foot of the staircase, "two police-constables were constantly stationed. Another stood there," indicating the passage to the kitchen, "and a fourth at the glass door. As the outer basement entrance was not only securely fastened by bolts and bars, but actually bricked up inside, it was absolutely impossible for any person to enter or leave the house save by the front door, nor could any one go from the kitchen to the upper part of the house without passing under the observation of all four constables. I arranged my guards in military fashion, having three men for each post, with one hour on duty and two hours off, but the same men were never on guard together at definite hours, as they were relieved at varying times. You will understand that I considered it a very responsible task to safeguard these premises, and thought it best to render it impossible for any section of the force at my command to take part in a conspiracy, even though such a thing was in itself most improbable."

They then ascended the staircase and found themselves on the first floor, where were situated the chief reception-rooms.

There were six spacious apartments on this storey, and all of them had originally opened out on to the landing. The special precautions taken to guard the diamonds of the Turkish mission, however, had altered all that. Five doorways had been bricked up, the result being that admission to the whole set of rooms could only be obtained through the first door that faced the top of the staircase.

This apartment was luxuriously furnished, and Inspector Walters explained that the Turkish Envoy and his suite passed the working hours of each day there, after they had personally thrown open the other apartments to the diamond polishers, and unlocked the safes in which the gems had been stored when work ceased on the previous day.

"His Excellency," said the inspector, "kept the keys of this room and the others, together with those of the safes, in his own possession night and day. He slept upstairs, and so did the other two gentlemen. No one was allowed even to come to this floor except the confidential servant, named Hussein, who used to bring coffee, cigars, and newspapers or other things the gentlemen might require, together with their lunch in the middle of the day. The workmen used to bring their lunch with them, so that they came in and out once a day only."

Digitized by Google

"Where did this confidential servant sleep?" said Brett.

"I believe he used to lie curled up on the rug outside his Excellency's door."

"And the other servants?"

"They all slept in the basement."

"What were they, Turks or Christians?"

"Well, sir," said the inspector with a smile, "two of them were Turks in costume, whilst three were Christians in appearance. That is the best I can say for them, as they were Frenchmen, though certainly the cook was a first-rate chef. Of course, we all got our meals here whilst on duty."

"Did his Excellency and the other members of the mission eat food prepared in the ordinary way?"

"Oh, yes; they appreciated French dishes as keenly as anybody might do."

"It was in this room, then," continued Brett, "that the murders took place?"

"Yes; I suppose that must be so," said the inspector. "But my friend here," pointing to Inspector Sharpe, "can tell that part of the story better than I can."

They passed into the inner rooms, which were quite silent and deserted, and presented a strange appearance considering the character of the house and its locality. Although the ceilings were decorated with beautiful paintings and fringed with superbly emblazoned mouldings; although the walls were papered with material that cost as much per yard as good silk, each apartment was occupied with workmen's benches and curious devices for cutting and polishing diamonds.

In the first room were two small safes, one of which was intended to receive the gems under treatment at the close of each day's work; the other held certain valuable materials required in the diamond-cutters' operations. Three of the rooms were on the Park side, and it was here that the small colony of skilled artisans had been installed.

The other two rooms were not used, nor had any communicating doors been broken through the walls in order to gain access to them.

The windows of the three apartments occupied by the workmen were not only guarded by strong iron bars, but possessed the additional security of external wire blinds of comparatively small mesh. Each window admitted plenty of light, and could be raised to allow a free circulation of air, but it was seemingly quite impossible for any active communication to take place with the outside. The three rooms looked on to a small inclosed lawn, which was separated from the Park by a brick wall surmounted by iron railings. All the fireplaces had been closed with bricks and mortar.

"You will see, sir," said the inspector, when he had called Brett's attention to these details, "that, mysterious though the murders were, they were as nothing compared with the disappearance of the diamonds. Every person who came downstairs was most carefully and methodically searched each time he passed the constable on duty at the bottom. It may be admitted that a few small stones could be so secreted as to escape observation, but some of these stones were so large that such a notion is not to be thought of, whilst the size of the great diamond which Mr. Talbot christened the 'Hen's Egg' rendered its transference past the searchers beneath absolutely impossible. There was no humbug about the search, you will understand, Mr. Brett. People had to take their boots off, open their mouths, and hand over their hats, coats, sticks, or umbrellas for inspection. Every part of their clothing was scrutinised, and the contents of their pockets, money, watches, keys, and the rest, thoroughly examined. These were our orders, and they were strictly obeyed, Mr. Talbot himself being the first to insist that the regulation should be carried out rigidly, so far as he was concerned. Why, one day a Cabinet Minister came here to see the diamonds. He was elderly and stout, and did not at all like having to take off his boots, I can assure you. And in spite of all this the diamonds have gone!"

(A further long instalment will be published next Tuesday.)

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

December 9.—Those whose birthdays fall to-day will do well to attend closely to business during the next twelve months, or trouble may come.

Girls born near seven p.m. will have friction and discord in love affairs.

The day is evil for travel and speculating; favourable for dealing with landlords.

A child born here will be active, stubborn, and hot-tempered.

December 10.—A good birthday; business and domestic affairs prosper. Those in employ will be promoted.

Girls should make new friends; if engaged they marry.

The day is favourable for most things; buy, sell, visit, engage servants, and marry.

A child born to-day will be affectionate, cheerful, generous, brave, and will rise in life.

December 11.—Many unexpected events are indicated for those whose birthdays come to-day; attend to the health, and keep the affairs well in hand.

Young girls will need much care and prudence in love matters; attentions from married men.

The day is one on which to go quietly; let others make the first move.

A child born this day will be moody, cautious, and cunning. It will be fond of pleasure and the opposite sex.

December 12.—An unsettled year; danger of heavy losses; much anxiety.

Girls meet with disappointment through opposite sex; they should place little faith in any promises.

The day is not good for pleasure, marriage, buying, selling, or changing residence.

A child born here will be improvident and dislike work. If a girl she will be unhappy in marriage.

December 13.—A favourable year for business; much activity and movement. Beware of law and quarrels.

Rather a dull time for girls; they need care with letters and in speech.

The day is good for doing business with farmers, builders, and elderly people. Be careful in signing papers and agreements.

A child born to-day will be active, thoughtful, and clever. Will be fond of travel, of science, and figures. The wit will be keen and sarcastic.

December 14.—Rather a fortunate year for health and business; avoid new enterprises and promising things.

Girls will find love matters quiet, but should be cautious where they place confidence.

A child born here will be rather fortunate in life, but be subject to many ups and downs. Will be fond of travel and change.

December 15.—This is a bad birthday, and promises much anxiety over business, money, domestic affairs, and health. Go quietly and use great caution. Insure against fire and accident.

Girls meet with obstacles and crosses in love affairs; engagements are broken; much care and prudence will be needed with opposite sex.

The day is evil for most matters. Beware of quarrels and mishap.

A child born to-day will be restless, crafty, improvident, and a wanderer. Will need constant care and firm handling.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

The Human Way.

A Little Tale for the Discontented.

"I WONDER," muttered young Mrs. Perry, jerking a hat-pin from the cushion, "if I'll ever in this life possess suitable and seasonable things to wear?"

She thrust a hat-pin rather viciously through the dainty summer creation that crowned her head.

"One would suppose I didn't know," she indignantly told her reflected image, "that a trim tailor-made dress and walking hat are the correct dress for autumn. One would suppose I didn't realise how shabby and out of taste is this absurd combination of summer hat, winter skirt and odd spring jacket. But what use to know these things, when one has no money?"

She sighed despairingly and rummaged in a box for her oft-cleaned tan gloves. The sight of them lying beside a small pile of newly washed neck ribbons provoked a fresh burst of scorn.

"Oh, the littleness of it!" she cried bitterly. "To spend one's God-given energies in cleaning and mending and turning and dyeing—all because of a miserable, soul-pinching lack of money."

Catching up gloves and pocket-book she passed into the sitting-room of the little flat.

"Be sure to take good care of Freddie while I'm gone, Dora," she adjured her cousin, who bent above her school book, the two-year-old youngster playing at her feet."

"I'll try," was the rather weary answer. "He's always getting into mischief, though, no matter how I watch him."

The mother sighed impatiently. "I suppose," she said aggrievedly, "that I ought really to stay with him. But it does seem as if I might have some recreation once in a while even if it's no more than going to do a little shopping. But then, I'm always made to feel guilty whenever I demand any release from the daily grind."

She kissed the child hastily. "Good-bye, Freddie—mamma's coming back soon. Gracious! how dirty that dress is, and I just put it on an hour ago. I must make him some new things this week. Oh! the hundreds of things crying to be done. Shall I ever, ever have any leisure?"

"It isn't right," she protested, as she hurried along the street, "that any human being should be obliged to waste precious powers on miserly economies and paltry strivings. There should be time for something else than getting meals and making beds and keeping clothes in order. There should be leisure! Time to think and study and develop the higher regions of one's being. Time to appreciate the beauties of the finer things of life. Oh, there's something wrong with the system of things!"

The sight of gorgeous shop windows only accentuated her bitter mood. Mrs. Perry did not possess the philosophy that enables one to enjoy beauty regardless of possession. The display of exquisite garments only filled her with wretchedness.

"It is cruel!" she persisted. "Cruel to be deprived of these things, when one has the taste and the artistic ability to appreciate them so keenly."

It was half an hour later, as she stood at a counter making modest purchases that the sound of a woman's voice near by arrested her attention. There was something exceedingly familiar in the well-modulated tones.

Glancing up, she saw that her surmise was correct. The perfectly appareled woman who stood looking at silks was no other than a friend of her girlhood.

The recognition was mutual. The friends moved towards each other with outstretched hands and glowing eyes.

"Why, Clara! Is this you?"

"And you, Margaret?"

Then followed the rush of questions and comments most natural under the circumstances.

"Come with me," said Clara Eberly, drawing Mrs. Perry from the counter; "we'll go to my hotel, where we can talk over old times to our hearts' content. Shopping can wait for a day or two."

She was so sweet, so cordial, so like the Clara of former days, that Mrs. Perry forgot for the moment that her dress showed a disheartening contrast to the exquisitely fitting gown of grey.

Once in the street, however, the realisation smote her. A hansom was waiting for Clara. The two women got into it, and again the questions and comments ran on.

It was but a few minutes' ride to the hotel. Mrs. Perry followed her friend into the handsome entrance, trying very hard not to be envious.

"And now," cried Mrs. Eberly as they reached her room, "we can have a cosy afternoon all by ourselves."

She rang the bell and ordered refreshments.

"Do sit back and relax and forget if you can all about the duties waiting for you at home. I shan't listen to your going under two hours at the least. Dinner to get? Oh! well, can't you let it go for to-day? There! Perhaps it is thoughtless for me to talk so. You see, I have no responsibilities whatever. I've lived in hotels ever since I married. Howard is out of town so much, it really wouldn't be sensible to keep house. And then I travel with him most of the time."

Mrs. Perry leant forward impulsively. "What an ideal life!" she cried. "Just what I've always wanted. You have leisure—time to think and study and see the world and accomplish great things. Oh! Clara, you should be very thankful."

Mrs. Eberly laughed rather helplessly. "Accomplish great things!" she repeated. "Why, Margaret, I don't accomplish anything. If you ask me why, I am sure I cannot tell. All I know is that I am constantly on the go and yet I do nothing. My life is absolutely of no use to the world. Doesn't it sound dreadful? Especially when you think of my essays at school on the subject of higher living and all that. I'm sure you must be shocked——"

"I'm not shocked, but greatly astonished. I thought—I was sure—that having money and opportunities would make a difference. You don't have to spend your forces worrying about dress——"

"Dress! 'Tis the bane of my existence. That is just it. The tailor and the milliner and the modiste and all the rest of the terrible train take up so much of my existence that I sometimes long to cry out for release. Fashion makes greater demands upon women every year. Oh, it's a problem! I don't pretend to know the solution of it. But I sometimes yearn for a simple, quiet life—for a life utterly free from all this foolish frippery and nonsense. I would like a little home that I could care for myself. Oh! what joy I would take in making it sweet and attractive for my husband! And I would be willing to wear simple clothes and to have only a few of them—numerous clothes are such a burden—and I would be happy—oh, so happy!—for to me that would be living."

On her way homeward an hour later Mrs. Perry gazed musingly at the shop windows.

"Strange!" she sighed. "People always want what they do not possess. And somehow I really believe Clara meant what she said."

Angela Morgan.

Digitized by Google

THE STORY OF THE WEEK.
SEE OUR COLOURED COVER.

A WOMAN'S TROTH.

A True Romance of the London Stage.

(The real names of the chief persons concerned are well known to you.)

Two Meet Strangely.

"You'll be wise to spare me a minute, Mr. Prout, you will, indeed! Take the word of a desperate man for it. 'Tisn't likely John Horrocks is going to do without so much as the price of a pint and see you swaggering round as if you was a lord, instead of a cheeky young actor as can't act, when all the time, if he only cared, he could ruin you—ruin you, you mean hound!"

A shrug of the shoulders was the only answer to the threat so savagely concluded, and its object, a tall, dark, rather slight figure in irreproachable frock-coat and glossy "silk," went on buttoning a glove indifferently. The other, a well-built but slouching personage of a superior working-class type, stepped up closer, so that his raised voice might not carry across the gloomy, flagged alley in which they stood, to a low, plain entrance hard by. A pane of the unlighted lamp above it bore, in red letters, the inscription, "Stage Door."

"Come," continued the speaker, roughly, "are you going to give me a pound or two, or are you not?"

"I am not!" he was informed. "You lost your situation here—a situation that I obtained for you—through your own drunken habits, henceforth I shall do nothing more for you, threats or no threats."

John Horrocks, late "property-master" at the Crescent Theatre, gnawed his large, drooping moustaches.

"So that's your tone, is it?" he said. "I've got to bring you to heel, Mr. Lewis Prout, have I? That's not difficult. Suppose I was to write a polite note to pretty Miss Audrey, eh?"

He pointed significantly in the direction of the stage-door behind them. On either side of it, in staring capitals, was billed a woman's name—that of "Miss Audrey Cowper."

"A polite note," pursued the ex-property master, "mentioning that I happen to know the whereabouts of poor Mr. Walsh?"

Lewis Prout started. "She could tell you that much herself," he retorted, "some wretched country gaol. I forget the place."

Horrocks grinned.

"Not much," Prout was assured, "his three months is up. He's out again, and in London, poor beggar. I saw him yesterday in a fourpenny doss, a common lodging-house, he didn't see me, but I made certain it was him. He's as much down on his luck as I am. And yet it'd not matter to her if she knew, I'll bet. She always swore he was innocent, ay, and believed it, too. Shall I drop her a line, Mr. Prout? She loved his little finger better than ever she'll do your whole body!"

Slowly, very slowly, Lewis Prout put a hand in his pocket and took out a couple of half-crowns. "There," he said, "that is for the last time. Dare to trouble me with another request for money and I will have you arrested as a persistent and objectionable mendicant."

He flung the coins into the ex-property master's palm, and turned away. A stride, and he had disappeared within the stage-entrance of the Crescent Theatre. John Horrocks slipped his booty into a shabby purse.

"The stingy bully!" muttered the ex-property-master. "Five bob instead of five quid, and he'll have me arrested, will he? And perhaps I shan't have something to say when I'm in Holloway, oh no, perhaps not!"

Thus grumbling to himself, Horrocks moved out of the narrow alley that led to a great West End thoroughfare. As he left the neighbourhood of the stage-door, Lewis Prout, watching him slyly from the shelter of that dingy portal, uttered an oath. John Horrocks had come face to face with a piquante little lady, whose rich furs, smart Paris hat, and costly jewellery seemed to lend a sudden brightness to the dull autumn day.

"Audrey!" murmured the actor, "he—he must not speak to her in his present mood. But no, he was merely trying to bluff me, he dare not, he dare not."

The phrase died on Lewis Prout's lips. John Horrocks had stepped in front of the new-comer.

"Miss Cowper," he was saying, hesitatingly. "Miss Cowper, may I be so bold?"

The little actress paused.

"Why, it's Horrocks!" she exclaimed. "Dear, dear, you know I'm so sorry about you, Horrocks, and your wife and children. But you've been forgiven so often that they won't hear of my interceding for you again. You really do get terribly drunk, Horrocks!"

"Yes, miss," admitted the ex-property-master, "I do, miss, and it's been my ruin in more ways than one." He leant towards her, so closely that she shrank, involuntarily, from his beery breath. "You've always been kind to me, miss," he added, confidentially, "do you know, I could tell you something—something you'd be rare glad to hear—something about——"

A hasty clasp was laid on Horrocks' arm, and he was violently displaced. His interrupter was Lewis Prout.

"Here!" observed the actor, and his voice had a curious gasp in it, as if of suppressed excitement, "We can't have you worrying Miss Cowper with your eternal troubles. If you're all that hard-up I'll see what can be done for you myself. Meanwhile, take that!"

He had a coin in his fingers—Horrocks perceived that it was a sovereign, and snatched at it greedily. Prout motioned him sharply to begone, and, with a doubtful air, and a thoughtful glance at Audrey Cowper, Horrocks pocketed the piece of gold and slouched off.

"I'm afraid Horrocks was beginning to be unpleasantly familiar," said Lewis Prout, as he stepped back towards the stage-door with the dainty, fur-clad figure at his side. A popular beauty, and the one real "star" of the Crescent company, Audrey Cowper was yet, and in full daylight, a young, sweet-faced and natural woman. Hers had been a rapid success; a year or two before she had been a struggling girl-actress on tour in the provinces.

"Yes," she answered, a shadow of disgust crossing her expressive features. "I was not sorry that you intervened at that particular moment."

Lewis Prout held open a swing-door for her to pass into the dusky recesses of the theatre. "I esteem myself fortunate," he observed, meaningly, "that for once my appearance was not disagreeable to you."

Audrey sighed, and quickened her own steps across the dark and draughty stage towards the stair which led to her dressing-room. The actor kept determinedly by her.

"Please, Mr. Prout, don't let us talk about that any more. I have told you that what you wish can never, never be. I cannot even deny that the sight of you will always cause me pain when I —when I think of poor Mr. Walsh."

Digitized by Google

Prout ground his teeth.

"You are obstinate in your self-deception," he snarled. "Stephen Walsh was guilty. If I prosecuted him it was to show him to you in his real colours."

The actor drew out a flat silver case and took a cigarette, closing the spring of the case with a snap. Audrey Cowper stopped, with her foot on the lowest stair.

"Mr. Prout," she responded, "you say you care for me, it is false. If you did you could not stoop to torture me in mean, unmanly ways. You are never tired of—of toying with that case—of reminding me that——"

"That Stephen Walsh, your lover and protegée," said Prout, bitterly, "went to gaol for three months for stealing it from me. The only decent bit of acting he ever did in his life was when he very nearly convinced those sleepy country magistrates that he was the victim of a plot. A plot—ha, ha! Why, the fellow was worth so little, even as 'general utility,' that he was always hard-up. He pawned the thing, as you know, for a few shillings."

The bright, womanly countenance, so familiar to London playgoers, looked steadily into the sullen visage of Lewis Prout.

"Let us end this once for all," she answered; "I have borne with you, Mr. Prout, because you are not the only person who, blinded by a horrible combination of circumstances, believes Mr. Walsh guilty, and also because your unfortunate passion helps to embitter you. But I will bear no more; speak to me again of Mr. Walsh or of your supposed affection for me, and I will see that either you or I leave the company. Judge for yourself if it is likely to be me."

She caught up her skirts and went proudly up the winding stairs to her room. It was still early in the afternoon, but she had some instructions to give to her dresser respecting the alteration of a costume. They served as an excuse for momentarily dismissing the woman. Left alone, Audrey sat down in a wicker chair and wiped away a tear or two.

"Poor Stephen!" she murmured. "Oh, why, why, didn't you write to me, why don't you let me know where you are?"

She opened a drawer and took out a photograph. It was that of a young and gallant face with kind, grave eyes, and sensitive, clean-shaven lips. Audrey kissed these last impulsively, then put away the portrait.

Four or five months previously, Stephen Walsh and she had been in the same touring company—it had been his first experience of "the profession." She had coached him in his parts, he had been her loyal, faithful cavalier—they had ended by falling in love.

Then there had happened a strange and terrible thing. Stephen had been accused by Prout of stealing a silver cigarette-case, the matter had been placed in the hands of the police, and, horror of horrors, Walsh had been identified by a local pawnbroker as the person who had pawned the case in question on the morning following its disappearance.

The case had been a cheap one—worth about a couple of guineas—and Stephen had been summarily sentenced by a country bench of magistrates to three months' imprisonment. These three months had brought her fame, and their end had blotted out her gladness in a bitter pang. Stephen had left his prison without communicating by word or sign with his betrothed, though she had written to him, in care of the governor of the gaol, sending him money, and telling him that she believed as passionately as ever in his innocence. Her duty at the theatre prevented her meeting him on his liberation, but she begged him to come direct to her in town. The request had received no answer, the money had been returned, the governor wrote, by Stephen's own desire. Audrey dried another and yet another tear as she vainly rebelled against that stern silence, which she understood all too well. He had refused to fasten upon her the stain that had fallen on his own life and reputation.

At length her dresser returned, and, with a sigh, Audrey rose, descended the stair, and passed out of the theatre. Someone followed her, she glanced round and saw Lewis Prout. He stepped abreast of her and commenced to mumble an apology.

"Miss Cowper—Audrey," he stammered. "I—I didn't mean to—to offend you, really. If I didn't love you so desperately I should be able to bridle my tongue. Say you forgive me, won't you?"

Audrey Cowper answered him coldly; she was walking so rapidly that he had to hasten to keep up with her. Already they had gained the more public streets—a turning brought them in sight of Piccadilly Circus.

"The only thing you can do to gratify me, Mr. Prout," she said, "is to relieve me henceforth of your company, except upon the stage. Surely you will not deny me the privilege of choosing my own friends!"

"That is to say," retorted the actor, angrily, "that you do not choose me for one?"

"Certainly not," said Audrey with spirit, "since you put it that way. And as I have some shopping to do in Regent Street, I cross here, so you can take the opportunity of saying good-afternoon."

She gave him a haughty little nod and stepped off into the roadway, to hasten across. Confused by the interview so abruptly terminated, she did not look carefully to her path, and, in an instant, found herself in a medley of vehicles. Avoiding a brougham, she darted before a motor-car, escaped it by a hair's-breadth, and plunged under the very noses of a bus-team. Her foot slipped on the greasy wood-paving, a second more, and the iron-shod hoofs would have been upon her.

All at once she felt herself seized by a powerful hand, that snatched her out of danger in a twinkling and steadied her gently upon her feet. The last of a line of sandwichmen, passing by with a highly-successful play advertised upon their boards, had darted forward and rescued her in the nick of time. Swinging round to protect her from the traffic, the horses of the 'bus came heavily against him—he recovered himself with difficulty.

A cry broke from Audrey as she saw his face. "Stephen! Stephen!" she said, and the two, oblivious of the world about them, gazed each at the other. Shabby, moustached, dejected as he was, she recognised in the sandwichman her lover, Stephen Walsh, and hung upon his arm.

"Allow me," intervened a harsh voice, "the lady is in my care."

At the sound the sandwichman turned, still limping from the shock of collision with the 'bus-team. Lewis Prout had crossed the road and approached them. The passers-by began to linger, a policeman drew near.

Stephen Walsh's eyes flashed fire as he looked at the speaker. "Is that so?" he demanded sternly. The question was addressed to Audrey and there was something in it that struck her to the heart.

"No, no, a thousand times no!" she murmured; "he has persecuted me ever since—oh, Stephen, Stephen!" she whispered, "my poor darling, why did you not take the money I sent you?"

Lewis Prout was hailing a cab. "Miss Cowper," he said, "you are shaken even if not hurt. Allow me to see you home."

The sandwichman was tottering curiously and he had grown very pale. But he drew himself up and answered fiercely. "Stand back," he exclaimed; "this lady is my promised wife and she confides herself to me!"

The actor stared, amazed at the cultivated speech and masterful tone. "You——" he began, then recoiled suddenly. "Great heavens!" he cried; "Stephen Walsh!—a gutter-bird and in this get-up."

SPLENDID CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER NEXT TUESDAY. 2d.

Digitized by Google

"Yes," added Audrey, maintaining her hold upon the shabby shoulder; "and in it he has just saved my life."

There was a low moan from the sandwichman, and, without warning, he collapsed. Audrey flung herself on her knees beside him—he was in a dead faint, and a pool of blood was forming round his right foot. One of the iron hoofs from which he had snatched her had caught him, cutting the flesh of his ankle to the bone and severing an artery. Audrey wrung her hands.

"Is it a case for the hospital, ma'am," asked the policeman, coming up, "or only a faint?"

Before she could answer, someone stepped out of the fast-forming crowd, knelt down, and, with a dirty handkerchief, began to make a tourniquet for the injured man's limb, stopping the flow of crimson fluid. It was Horrocks, the ex-property master.

"Excuse my chipping in, constable," he said, "but this poor fellow is bleeding to death. Well, I'm blowed—Miss Cowper!—Then it was you as was nigh under the 'bus!"

Audrey gasped, staring incredulously from her unconscious lover to the ex-property master of the Crescent theatre.

Now that both were moustached, unkempt, and stamped with the dread hall-mark of poverty, the faces of Stephen Walsh and John Horrocks were almost counterparts.

A Question of Identity.

"Please, Mr. Walsh, do sit down for a few moments. Your foot cannot be really healed yet and Audrey will be so vexed when I tell her how disobedient you have been."

Stephen Walsh laughed and continued his restless striding up and down the small, cosy apartment. He was a very different figure from that which he had presented a week or so earlier, when he had plucked Audrey Cowper from under a London omnibus. Clean-shaven once more, well-groomed, and correctly-dressed, he looked his old professional self, the self that had gazed back at Audrey out of the photograph in her room at the theatre.

"It is a luxury to be able to walk about again, Mrs. Cowper," he answered, "and besides, it helps me to be patient."

His critic—a little, white-haired lady in a brown satin gown, sighed and went on plying her big bone knitting-needles. "Audrey said twelve o'clock," she responded, "and it is nearly that now, so you haven't long to wait. She will be back from the theatre herself soon—there was a new song to try over or something and she had to go."

Stephen Walsh stopped in his irritable progress and leant over the couch where the other sat.

"Mrs. Cowper," he said, "what if the test doesn't turn out right? It's a chance, you know, and if the result is adverse it may spoil everything. I have allowed Audrey to stake recklessly upon a fortunate issue. She has lent—that is to say, given—me money, helped to nurse me, treated me as if our engagement were still a binding reality. And all the time I am a convicted criminal, supposed to be in a public hospital. It is but hoping against hope to dream that I may be able to prove my innocence. Proof, that is what we want, confessions are useless, coincidences useless—proof, proof!"

The old lady placed her withered fingers on his arm. "Courage, Mr. Walsh," she told him, "and as for Audrey, you mustn't be too proud, you know—Audrey owes you her escape from terrible injury, possibly death. Then she knows you to be innocent, and it would break her heart to turn her back on you because you were in trouble. S-s-sh! that is her step, remember, she has forbidden us to talk of the subject."

"Still on your feet, oh, you bad, bad man!" said a gay voice, and Audrey, her cheeks glowing from the keen air of the crisp autumn day, hastened into the room. She put her hands on her lover's shoulders, pushed him into a chair, and kissed him gaily.

"Mummy doesn't mind, do you, mummy?" she laughed; "and now, dear, keep a stiff upper lip, and hope for the best. I've got Horrocks with me—regularly transmogrified—and the other gentlemen, I believe, are in the parlour."

"Yes," said her mother anxiously, "they arrived ten minutes ago, I suppose the detectives thought they would be in plenty of time."

Audrey threw off her furs and went to the brass bell-pull beside the fire-grate. She paused and returned to her lover.

"How handsome you look without your moustache," she observed, "you'll be back on the boards before long, winning a reputation for yourself." She stooped and gazed into his eyes. "Stephen," she whispered, "you know, whatever happens, it won't make any difference—to me!"

Stephen covered his face—he could not speak. Audrey started away with a great air of cheerfulness and rang the bell.

"Ask the gentleman who is waiting in the hall to step up," she told the maid who answered it. The girl disappeared and they heard her descend the stairs. A moment afterwards a tall, well-dressed man entered the room, carrying a smart Homburg hat in his fingers. It was Horrocks, the property-master, almost unrecognisable in his present attire. He was clean-shaven and his skin had been sponged over with something to give it the brown smooth look so characteristic of the actor.

He came forward awkwardly and an exclamation burst from Stephen's lips. He had glanced towards a mirror—the two faces reflected there were more marvellously alike than ever. In shabby clothes, with limp, dark moustache, Stephen Walsh had been like John Horrocks, now John Horrocks was like Stephen Walsh.

The ex-property master fumbled with his hat. "You see it all now, sir," he said; "it was a dirty trick and worthy of him as put me up to it and sent me to pawn his blessed cigarette-case at a pawnbroker's near your diggings. But I bore you no malice, sir, though I did let him bribe me, and I'm doing what I can to set it straight, for Miss Audrey's sake."

Audrey intervened. "There's no time for apologies," she exclaimed, "you made those once for all, Horrocks, when you came to us and confessed. Let us have in the detectives and that little Jew of a pawnbroker."

She brought a soft hat of the Homburg shape from a side table, gave it to Stephen, and touched the bell again. "We'll have up the people from the parlour," she said to the maid. The latter descended once more and the three in the sitting-room waited. Audrey's hand stole to her lover's and pressed it encouragingly. Then the door opened and a stout man entered, with quick, black eyes and greasy curls on his temples. Behind him were two others in heavy, plain garments and big boots. They saluted Audrey respectfully.

"Now then, Isaacs," said one of them, "here are the two gentlemen who are not unlike each other. Which is the person that pawned the case with you?"

The Jew studied thoughtfully the two well-dressed figures. Finally he shook his head.

"Let them speak," he remarked, turning to the detective who had questioned him; "let them ask me what I will give on it." The police-officer glanced at Stephen, who parted his dry lips with difficulty.

"What—what can you allow me on—on this cigarette-case?" he faltered. The Jew knitted his brows and looked at the other of the two persons confronting him. The ex-property master put out his hand, as if laying some small article on the counter.

"How much on that?" he demanded. The Jew struck his fat palms together.

"That is him!" he ejaculated, "the very man it is. I will swear to him in a million. And the other is the gentleman I swore to at the police-court. I made a mistake, I see it—that is the one, the one with the rough voice and the yellow teeth."

Stephen Walsh sat down suddenly on the couch from which he had so recently risen. Audrey sprang to him. The chief detective motioned to the pawnbroker.

"That will do," he said; "we've other fish to fry and you can be off, Isaacs, for the present."

The Jew shrugged his shoulders and went towards the door. As he did so a peal from the house-bell below reached their ears and Audrey started from her lover's side, Stephen Walsh was already recovering from his momentary faintness.

Digitized by Google

"There is your man," she said sternly, "get behind the door, inspector, I told the maid when I came in that I expected him. She will show him right up. The fool!—he thinks he is to lunch with me. I wrote him that at last I saw Mr. Walsh in his true colours."

The detectives obeyed, drawing the Jew with them and pulling the ample portière to hide themselves.

"Mr. Lewis Prout," said the maid, appearing suddenly in the room, and stepping aside for the actor to pass. Audrey moved forward and Prout came to take her hand.

"I—I was more than delighted, Miss Cowper," he observed, "to receive the extremely kind little note you left at the theatre."

He stopped—a forefinger tapped him on the back. "Lewis Prout," he was informed, "I arrest you on a charge of committing wilful and corrupt perjury, at Lichbourne petty sessions in July last, during the hearing of a charge of theft against Mr. Stephen Walsh."

The actor faced about—his visage had blanched from brow to chin. His glance fell on the almost identical figures of John Horrocks and Stephen Walsh. Then he darted towards the former.

"Hang you!" he cried, "you blackguard, you've betrayed me."

"Yes, you mean cur," said the ex-property master, "and righted an innocent man."

Lewis Prout raised a clenched fist to strike him. But there was a sharp click and a pair of steel bracelets pinioned the actor's wrists.

* * * * *

The penalty for perjury is no light one, and only a day or two ago, at the assizes in an old county town, Lewis Prout was sent to prison for as many years as he had caused Stephen Walsh to spend months in gaol. Stephen was not vindictive but a prosecution for perjury was the one effective fashion of ridding his reputation from the stain Prout had placed upon it.

John Horrocks', confession and co-operation with the authorities of Scotland Yard secured him from proceedings of any sort and Audrey is to see that the ex-property master and his family have a new start in a British colony, where Horrocks may yet overcome his tendency to look upon the wine when it is red.

Puzzling as was the perjury case in question to the general reader of the newspapers, a section of the public knew all about the affair before it reached the publicity of a definite hearing. This may explain why Stephen Walsh, on returning to "the boards" in the new Crescent Theatre piece, in a very modest capacity, has had a most enthusiastic reception. Inspired thereby no doubt, and by the presence of Audrey—whom he had privately made his wife at a Strand registry office—Stephen achieved a genuine little success, and is, at present nightly adding to his laurels. There is even some talk of the librettist and composer doing for them a special "sandwich-board duet," which may yet take the town by storm.

It must however be confessed that Audrey is not Audrey Cowper at all, but Miss——, and Stephen is not Stephen Walsh but Mr.——. Nor do they play at the Crescent, but at the —— Theatre. And what they will think when they see all this in print had better not be asked.

R. Norman Silver.

SPLENDID ❧ CHRISTMAS
DOUBLE ❧ NUMBER ❧ ❧
NEXT ❧ TUESDAY ❧ 2d.

Your Editor Chats.

By the time you turn to this page, you will doubtless have read the first instalment of our new serial story, "The Albert Gate Mystery." Well, how do you like it? Having read the whole of the story myself, I personally think that it is the strongest and best story which Mr. Louis Tracy has ever given to the reading public. But as in the case of our last serial, I am extremely desirous of knowing your own individual opinions in the matter and if you care to drop me a line I should very much like to hear how the opening instalments of the story impress you.

OUR CHRISTMAS NUMBER.

Now, just a word as to our Christmas Number. As I told you last week, this is to be a Double Number, price twopence, and will be published next Tuesday. Experience has taught me that there is bound to be a large extra demand for this issue; I would therefore ask you in your own interests, as well as in mine, to order your copy from your local newsagent early. Then he will be prepared to supply you with your copy and we, in turn, shall be prepared to supply him.

LOVE PROBLEMS SOLVED.

In our Christmas Number I start a new series of which I told you some time ago. This is the Love Problem series. Instead of dealing with such problems by means of argumentative articles on such a subject as, let us say, "Should a husband keep a secret from his wife?" I have had several pretty little stories written which answer such questions in an interesting and far more convincing manner than any amount of argumentative chatter. Next Tuesday's problem will be: "Ought a Man to Give up all his Bachelor Pursuits upon Marriage?"

* * * * *

Those of my readers who sent letters of congratulation to Miss Madge Morris upon the occasion of her marriage, and are anxious to know whether their names are among the lucky hundred and one prize-winners, will be glad to know that their suspense will be allayed next Tuesday, when the list of successful competitors will be published.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Those Boots.

****

The Tragic Love Story of Mr. Augustus Sniper.

****

Mr. Augustus Sniper stood in his second-floor back bed-room surveying himself in a small looking-glass. He was arrayed for conquest and contemplated himself with a smile of complacency.

His necktie was most correct, his coat was a marvel of tailoring though somewhat aggressively new, as was also the rest of his attire down to his crimson socks, but here the newness suddenly ceased, for on his feet were a pair of the most disreputable old boots which have ever been worn since boots were invented.

That they had once been patent leather was apparent, but of their former elegance, their white stitching, and pristine brilliancy there was now no sign. They had been patched, sewn, blacked, inked, scratched, battered, trodden down at the heels, and kicked out at the toes to such a degree that a costermonger would have refused to convert them into a "flower for the dinner-table," even accompanied by a shilling, when they had reached half the state of dilapidation in which Mr. Sniper wore them.

And why did he wear them? Among his friends, his boots were a constant source of "envy, hatred, and malice;" his toes were the most pointed, his fit the most perfect, his leather the most shiny, and his fashion the newest. His lady friends talked of them and one of them had even been known to refuse a man because "his boots were not to be mentioned in the same breath with Mr. Sniper's, and she had once seen him wear one that was patched."

But then no one ever saw him in the boots he wore in the privacy of his bedroom. Such toes as he showed to an admiring world were not compatible with the broad foot he unquestionably possessed, and the agony they made him suffer was only to be allayed by wearing those comfortable old friends in his moments of retirement from the stage of suburban society where he played no unimportant part in his own estimation.

Having surveyed himself carefully, beginning at the top and only lamenting that the new fashion in ties precluded him from wearing a breast-pin, his glance at last rested on his crimson silk socks, and, the boots. As he eyed the latter he gave a chuckle and looked with pride towards a pair of irreproachable "patents" which stood on his chest of drawers in a state of immaculate brightness and glass-like hardness.

"It wouldn't do to forget to change them," he said with a grin; "by Jove, what would the dear Katie say? Why, my chance would be clean gone directly. It's only the other day I heard her say to Jack McDonald that she thought a man who did not wear patent leathers was not fit to be spoken to, and a patch was perfectly inadmissible in a lady's drawing-room. And if she was to see these! Oh, it makes me all of a flutter to think of it. Now I must be cool. What shall I do to calm myself? I know; I'll read that book she lent me, it will do to open the conversation with." So he sat down in his easiest chair and began to read.

The book, however, was very exciting, and he never noticed the time till the clock struck four, the hour he should have been at his adored one's house. So, with an exclamation which one couldn't exactly say to a Sunday school class without having difficulties with the superintendent, he hastily glanced at himself in the glass, picked up his carefully-brushed hat and hurriedly left the house. Fortunately his destination, the house of Dr. Gunn, was not far off, and in six minutes he was standing on the doorstep waiting for the door to be opened that he might be ushered into the presence of his Katie, to whom he meant that very afternoon to offer his hand, his heart, and—his boots.

He heard the welcome footsteps of the housemaid, and his heart was beating high with expectation when—looking downwards—he saw he had forgotten to change his boots.

There was no time to retreat, already the door was open, and, before he could collect his thoughts, he found himself in the drawing-room in the presence of his divinity and several other visitors of both sexes.

"Oh, I am so glad you have come, Mr. Sniper," said Katie, a pretty girl with sparkling dark eyes and a neat figure, as she hurried to meet him at the door. Then she lowered her voice to say: "Such a nuisance those people coming."

"Er—er—not at all—er—I assure you—I——" he stammered convulsively, too much unnerved by the discovery of the state of his feet to have the slightest idea of what she was saying, beyond a vague idea that she was apologising for something.

Katie gave him one look of contemptuous anger and turned away without another word. When a pretty girl tells a man she is glad to see him and in the same breath laments that anyone else should be present, and he answers as Augustus Sniper did, is it anything to be surprised at that she feels mortally offended?

So Augustus was left stranded by the door where he had entered, too much overcome by the paralysing fear that someone would look at him and discover those boots to heed Katie's anger or to be aware in what way he had offended her.

However, he dared not remain in the open space and, seeing an ottoman, he determined to reach it or perish in the attempt. Happily it was near Mrs. Gunn, which afforded him an excuse to go to it. Where he stood, he felt as though he was on the edge of a fearful precipice, any moment someone might look round, there was nothing for it but a rush. He rushed. Happily he was able to pull himself up in time and avoid tumbling over Mrs. Gunn.

"How do you do, my dear Mrs. Gunn?" he gasped, shaking hands with her violently, hoping thereby to draw her attention from the eccentric manner in which he had crossed the room.

"How do you do?" she answered coldly, adding to herself: "If it were not so early in the day, I should say that man had been drinking. I hope he has no vicious habits. He comes here very often. I must drop a hint to Katie."

Here the conversation languished. Augustus remained wrapt in his own thoughts, which were far from pleasant. At last he decided he would outstay every one, propose to Katie, and then, if accepted, he would be asked to dinner and would make his escape under cover of the night, and if refused, well, it would not much matter then whether she saw the boots or not. He was suddenly aroused from these reflections by hearing Mrs. Gunn say: "Won't you sit down, Mr. Sniper?"

And awakening to the fact that he had been standing all the time in silence, he seated himself on the ottoman. But he had put himself in the worst place in the room, viz., next to the tea-table. Presently Mrs. Gunn again spoke. "Ah, here is the tea. May I trouble you, Mr. Sniper, to take this cup of tea to Miss Neville. She is at the other side of the room near the window."

There was nothing for it but to go, so with a cup in one hand and a plate of cake in the other, he started on his perilous journey. Behind the sofa, round a fat old lady, between a lady and gentleman in the midst of a flirtation, occasionally darting in a zig-zag course from the edge of a curtain to a foot-stool and back again to the vast outlaying flanges of some old dowager, gingerly skirting the groups of laughing, chattering girls, he made his erratic way, taking advantage of every cover with the care of a Boer, and at last reached the farther end of the room where sat Miss Neville in the bow window.

"At last," he said to himself as he handed her the cake, "I've done it, but I wouldn't go through that again for £1,000." And he sat down beside Maggie Neville, determined nothing should move him from his haven.

"What a cosy place you've got over here, I thought so directly I came in, so I got Mrs. Gunn to let me bring you your tea and come over here for a talk."

"Did you? I watched you crossing the room, but I could not tell where you were going."

He turned hot at the bare idea of his being watched. Had she seen the boots?

"Did you—er—did you notice anything—er peculiar—about—me?" he stammered.

"No," she said wonderingly, "except perhaps, your manner of walking. You didn't look as if you were trying to get here."

"Oh, that's nothing—I often—er—do that. It's a way I've got."

"Indeed."

This was not encouraging, anything to turn the subject, he rushed on: "But I assure you, Miss Neville, now I am here, I could wish for no greater happiness than to remain here for ever. At least, that is to say, until you go away."

This was perfectly true.

"I'll leave a little margin for your politeness, Mr. Sniper, and won't consider you bound by that," she said with a laugh, and then added slyly, "what would the others—what would Katie say if you sat here all the afternoon?"

"I don't care what they say. My present position is the only one to give me happiness. I would not exchange it for a throne," he said with fervour.

He was getting desperate. Anything to keep her attention from his boots, and all these speeches which she took to mean a sudden desire to get up a flirtation, were no empty compliments, but terribly true expressions of his painful position.

Meanwhile Katie was watching him with great wrath. What did he mean by this behaviour? She was not going to stand such treatment. He had not once looked at her, and now to see him flirting with that minx Maggie Neville was more than flesh and blood could put up with.

"Here is your tea," said young McDonald at this moment, "can I fetch you anything to eat, Miss Gunn?"

"Yes, please; I should like some cake," she answered, fixing Augustus, who still held the plate of cake, with her eye.

"Where the dickens can it be gone to?" he muttered some minutes later, after hunting high and low. "Well, I'm blessed if there isn't Sniper hugging it on his knee, I'll go and interrupt him."

And he went in Sniper's direction. Poor Augustus saw him coming and moved a little closer to Miss Neville, hiding his feet under the edge of her gown, little thinking all this was perceived by Katie. "The wretch," she said to herself, and when Jack McDonald returned she flirted desperately with him, keeping one eye on Augustus, however. "Well, Mr. Sniper," said Miss Neville in answer to one of his pretty speeches; "since you say your pleasure is in serving me, will you be so kind as to fetch me another cup of tea."

Poor Augustus!

"Of course, my greatest pleasure is to serve you, Miss Neville, but—er—when that service—er—necessitates my leaving you—er—being deprived of your society, I cannot fly to accomplish your wish as I would otherwise do——" He had the cup in hand, and was balancing it idiotically and he stammeringly sought an excuse for remaining where he was.

Just at this critical moment a friend passed at about the distance of a yard and a half, here was his chance

"Thomson," he said, reaching over to touch him and nearly overbalancing as he did so, "Miss Neville says will you get her a cup of tea, please."

Thomson, who had long worshipped Maggie Neville, flew off with alacrity on this errand.

"Really, Mr. Sniper, this is going too far," said Miss Neville in an offended tone; "if you did not wish to get my tea I would not have you do it for worlds, but I think you need not put speeches into my mouth."

"My dear Miss Neville—not wish to get your tea? I assure you—I——" And then a happy idea struck him. "The thing was, I knew that fellow wanted to come and join us—and I—er—I—didn't want him. See."

Just then Thomson returned, carefully steering his way across the room with the desired cup of tea.

"Thank you, Mr. Thomson," she said with a gracious smile; "it is lucky you've come as Mr. Sniper has declared he can no longer keep away from Miss Gunn and I shall be left all alone."

Poor Augustus!

Thomson beamed, and there was nothing for it but for him to rise and give up his seat and make his way to Katie.

"Oh that I had skirts," he groaned, "why wasn't I born a woman?"

By this time many of the guests had departed and to cross the room was a matter of still greater difficulty than before. However, by making darts, when no one was looking, from cover to cover, he at length managed to place himself behind his beloved Katie's chair. She, however, took no notice of him but continued chatting gaily with Jack McDonald. So there he stood (sitting was out of the question) in silence, till the last guest had departed and when Katie returned from bidding them good-bye at the door, he advanced and said: "I am so glad all those bores are gone."

"You have the advantage of me there," she said haughtily.

He ignored this remark and continued:

"I've been waiting to speak to you all the afternoon, Miss Gunn, Katie, you know what I've come for—I want to tell you——"

"Please tell me nothing, Mr. Sniper, after your disgraceful behaviour this afternoon nothing you can say will have any interest for me."

"But, Katie, listen to me—you know I love you, have always loved you from the first time I saw you and I thought you did not dislike me."

"Sir, you force me to speak more plainly. In short, your language to me in the state you are in, after your outrageous flirtation, is nothing short of an insult. A gentleman does not come to ask a lady to be his wife and begin by flirting with someone else, nor does he expect to be received in respectable houses when he cannot even walk straight, nor does he," as her glance travelled downwards, "come to pay a visit in such boots."

Augustus fled. Poor Augustus! L. Hughes.

GUEST: "How is this? My bill this time is twelve shillings a day, and last December I had the same room and it was only ten shillings a day." Clerk: "Yes, I know; but the days are much longer now."

"I DON'T think Mr. Bunker is much of a conversationalist," observed Miss Elder. "Well, he came to me last night," replied Miss Young, as she carelessly twirled a new ring on the third finger of her left hand, "and I found his conversation quite engaging."

YOUNG Farmer Medders (at supper): "What in Heaven's name is the matter with the cake, Gloriosa?" Bride (a London girl): "Why, darling, there can surely be nothing the matter with it! I followed the recipe exactly. Maybe it was the fault of the eggs. I thought eggs were soft and yellow inside, but these were white and brittle all the way through, and I had to powder them with the flat-iron, and——" "Where did you find them?" "In the hen-house, darling. There was only one egg in each nest, and——" "Gloriosa, you have used my china nest-eggs!"

Digitized by Google

ASTOUNDING SOCIETY REVELATIONS. BEGIN TO-DAY.

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

LORD REGINALD DAVENANT. Another of Belinda's suitors.

LADY HONORIA. The Duke's sister.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister, who visits Cairo.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

HOW LADY PEGGY FINDS BELINDA.

Lady Peggy undertakes, for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, to chaperon Belinda, and to marry her to a son of some old and titled family. Staying at the same hotel in Cairo are the Duke of Eastacres and his mother, the Duchess. Lady Peggy and the Duchess agree that nothing could be better than a union of the Duke's title and Belinda's millions; everything is therefore done to bring this about. One evening, under the guidance of a fine looking Bedouin, they all go to witness a religious festival. They manage to arouse the wrath of the fanatics, but are delivered by the dragoman, who turns out to be David Carr. Belinda signifies her gratitude by publicly hugging him.

The dragoman is dismissed, and back at the hotel the Duchess of Eastacres takes Lady Peggy to task for the occurrence. Lady Peggy retorts that not long ago she saw the Duchess' own daughter Honoria in the arms of a real Egyptian. The Duchess is furious, calls Honoria, and after storming at her, is slapping her face when Belinda rushes in, rescues Honoria and takes her to her room. Shortly afterwards a fearful shriek is heard, followed by an impassioned appeal for "Help!" The voice is Belinda's!

Rushing upstairs, we discover that Belinda has just prevented Honoria from poisoning herself.

The next evening, Lady Peggy discovers the Duke of Eastacres and a new comer, Stanley Forbes, about to fight a duel. Realising the possible disastrous consequences to her matrimonial plans for Belinda, Lady Peggy rushes forward and places herself between the two men.

Sending Eastacres off on some errand, she takes Forbes aside, and after telling him she knows that the quarrel is connected with a girl named Sheila Kenwyn, whose whereabouts Forbes wants to find out, promises to extract the address from Eastacres if Forbes will forego a scandal. Forbes consents.

Lady Peggy then finds Eastacres and refuses to allow his suit with Belinda till he gives her the address. Eastacres gives it.

Later on Lady Peggy is rewarded by discovering Belinda in the Duke's arms.

She is congratulating them both when Belinda breaks out in a torrent of rage with the Duke, whom she states she hates. Lady Peggy then tells her that her action in allowing the Duke to caress her in public will be taken by Society as tantamount to an engagement, otherwise she will be put down by Society for a forward and impossible girl. Belinda is then persuaded to agree to an engagement for a month, after which it is to be broken off. David Carr is told of the engagement but not of the length of its duration.

Everything is now being got ready for the Khedive's Ball. Belinda is to be presented, and Lady Peggy tells her that she must wear her necklace of pearls. Belinda replies that they are lost, and adds that Lady Peggy would be sorry to know who had taken them.

Full of this fresh trouble Lady Peggy goes to the Duchess' room, and is entering when she sees the Duchess, who is unconscious of Lady Peggy's presence, and Honoria in the middle of the room, and in the Duchess' hand Belinda's pearls.

The Khedive's Ball and Belinda's Triumph.

So overwhelming was my surprise that I was within a hair's breadth of betraying myself. So tense was the situation, so breathless my expectation as to what strange scene I might be about to witness, that I could barely command myself to silence.

How did the Duchess come to possess Belinda's pearls? I feared the explanation while on the tip-toe of desire to learn it.

The Duchess broke the silence.

"What do you want?" she asked her daughter sharply.

Honoria crept a little nearer, her mouth twitching, her whole frame expressive of terrified suspicion.

"Mother!" she laid a shaking hand upon the other's arm, "those are Belinda's pearls."

"Well?"

Digitized by Google

"How did you—when did you—oh!"—the thin hand dropped from her mother's arm and clasped its fellow convulsively. "Belinda lost them," she gasped, "she said so, and when she told me she looked at me so strangely I felt uncomfortable. I—mother, give them to me, I'll take them back. Oh, dear, oh, dear, what shall I do?"

The Duchess gazed at her in cool contempt.

"Stop behaving like an infant if you can," she replied. Then, with a sudden rush of indignation—"A pretty state of things when my daughter tells me to my face that she's been suspected of taking a person's property and doesn't even change colour! Had you any spirit you would have shown the girl her proper place. Look at you strangely, indeed, the daughter of the Duke of Eastacres! What next?"

Honoria showed no resentment at this unexpected turning of the tables. She only gazed the more intently at the pearls.

"Belinda—" she commenced again with timid insistence, "Belinda——"

"Belinda gave the pearls to me to take care of," her Grace snapped. "Pray, is there anything very remarkable in that?"

"Why did she tell me she'd lost them?" urged Honoria, with more courage than I had thought her capable of showing.

"For the same reason that other people tell you absurd things—because you've no sense. Don't argue with me; you've no sense, and that's the beginning and end of it all. Go back to bed at once, it's all you're fit for. To think," the Duchess glared fiercely at the girl, "to think I should have an idiot for a daughter."

Under this shower of words Honoria's strength succumbed. She was so accustomed to blame and to reproach that it had become second nature to her to bear them meekly. She retreated ignominiously to her bed-chamber, and the Duchess safely locked her in.

Having routed her opponent. Her Grace placed the pearls upon the table and gazed at them with an air of pride, not to say appropriation, that filled me with alarm. Supposing she refused to give them up, whatever could be done?

After a few minutes of ecstasy, however, the enjoyment appeared to pall. She walked away from the table towards the bed. Stooping with some amount of pain and difficulty, she drew from under the bedstead a small black trunk, evidently of considerable weight. Having placed the box in a position favourable to the examination of the contents, the Duchess drew up an armchair, seated herself, and produced from her capacious pocket a small bunch of keys. Selecting one, she fitted it into the lock, turned the bolt, raised the lid, threw it back upon its hinges, and slowly drew forth, one by one, the articles the box contained.

The next five minutes were amongst the strangest, most thrilling of my life!

From the box in front of her the Duchess drew forth one by one things of the most varied description, ranging from a gold bracelet to a shoe-horn, and including a pair of steel scissors and a diamond buckle! All sorts of unconsidered trifles were added to the rapidly increasing pile beside her, an ivory-backed hair brush, an oxydised waist-belt, a pair of pince-nez, a cigarette case, a pocket-knife, nut-crackers, a silver serviette ring, a writing-case—my mind could not keep pace with the pile. I gave up cataloguing in despair, and resigned myself to a feeling of intense bewilderment.

This condition of mind, however, was soon dissipated. Her Grace, nearly at the bottom of the box, selected a small tissue paper parcel for examination, and proceeded to unwrap the covering. I watched intently, and as the thin folds of the paper gradually revealed the thing inclosed, I was hard put to it not to call out.

In the Duchess' lap lay a fan, an exquisite, hand-painted trifle in white satin and ivory, my fan, the gift of Lord Lesborough when he was at the Embassy in Paris.

In a minute the mystery of the box and its contents was plain to me as daylight.

The Duchess, the Duchess of Eastacres was a kleptomaniac!

I remembered with a sudden flash of understanding, certain peculiarities of her Grace's. Now were made plain to me the uses of the capacious reticule she always carried. Attached by a stout chain to what was once her waist, the Duchess and her bag had furnished amusement to our set these many years.

To think how many of our pet belongings that respectable reticule had swallowed!

Really it was too much. She simply should not have my fan. So great was my indignation that to insure my self-control I was obliged to retire from the room. I couldn't look at her in silence any longer.

The cool air of the corridor brought me composure. It was necessary to act quickly, sharply, but with the greatest possible tact. The pearls—if possible, my fan—must be obtained from her Grace that night. The operation, however, would be a delicate one, and would require the nicest handling.

On one point, however, I was much relieved. From what Honoria had said it was evident that Belinda had suspected her of taking the pearls. Loyalty to her friend had prevented the girl telling me of their loss. This same loyalty would prevent her mentioning their return. It was a great mercy it was Honoria whom she suspected, not—anybody else.

I quickly settled my plan of campaign, and with a calm front walked smartly down the corridor, paused outside the Duchess's door, and tapped with emphasis upon the panels.

Immediately all was silence therein. The rustling of paper ceased as if by magic, there was no stir nor sound. A second later and the faint ray of light that streamed under the door disappeared—the Duchess had switched off the electric light.

I softly retraced my steps and waited some short distance off, in order to give the Duchess time to readjust the—well, the black trunk beneath her bed. After a suitable interval I again presented myself, and knocked as before.

No answer, still silent, still dark. At this I lost my patience, and rapped loud and long upon the door.

"It's I, Duchess, Lady Carstairs," I explained reassuringly.

"Whatever is the matter? I'm asleep, I can't see anyone to-night."

For answer I recommenced my rapping, and continued it until, in self-defence, her Grace appeared upon the threshold.

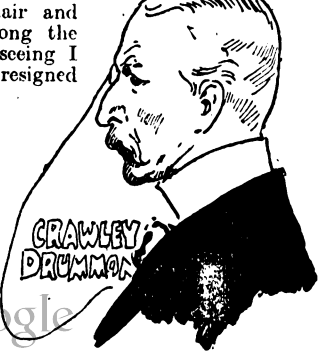
"So sorry, Duchess," I said sweetly, adroitly slipping past her substantial form. "I wouldn't have disturbed you for worlds if I'd known. I never thought you went to bed as early as this?"

"Early," said her Grace, with an unpleasant smile, "it's long past midnight."

"My dear Duchess," I glanced at the clock, "why, so it is! Dear me, my watch has stopped! I must apologise profusely. I came to see you about such a trifle, too; it could easily have waited till the morning. Pray forgive me, it's an atrocious thing to have done; I thought it was not yet eleven."

"As you are here," said her Grace, somewhat grimly, "what do you want?"

"May I stay a little while?" I said evasively. "That is very nice of you. Really, this fire is very pleasant, it's quite cold to-night." I drew up a chair and settled myself snugly among the cushions. The Duchess, seeing I was not to be put off, resigned herself to the inevitable, and took a seat opposite mine.



"I've just been trying on Belinda's dress," I remarked. "I had it specially made for the Khedive's ball. Worth designed it himself. She looks perfect—really, she's very lovely, Duchess!"

The Duchess nodded. I thought I discerned a faint pucker in her forehead at the mention of Belinda that bespoke a touch of anxiety. I hailed it with delight, I was going to give her Grace one of the worst quarters of an hour she'd yet experienced.

Digitized by Google

"She'll wear jasmine in her hair," I continued, "and, as for jewels, I don't think she can do better than decide upon her pearls." I gazed at the grim, set face before me, but the Duchess was too old, too brave a warrior to show that she was touched. She courteously inclined her head and glanced half apologetically at the clock, as who should say—"What does the woman mean by maundering about a girl's first ball at such an hour?"

"That reminds me," I sat bolt upright, meeting the steel grey eyes that so unflinchingly regarded me with so stern a gaze. "I came here to speak to you about the pearls. I understand Belinda gave them to you to take care of!"

The Duchess gasped, changed colour, cast a threatening look towards Honoria's door, and then, with courage and calmness rarely equalled, rose to the occasion.

"Oh, yes," she said, "she brought them here to me a day or two ago. She's rather young, I think, to have the charge of such valuable things, don't you?" As she spoke her Grace advanced to the dressing-table, opened a drawer, took out a leather case and handed it to me.

I opened it; with joy I saw that it contained Belinda's pearls!

My success inspired me to make a further effort. I determined to try and secure my fan. In my eagerness I forgot one all important point. The pearls had lain at hand, their reappearance entailed no dragging forth of grisly skeletons in the shape of black trunks filled with other people's property.

Not so the fan, it lay in the deepest depths of that black box. I was destined never to hold it more.

"Do you remember, Duchess," I continued, when we had finished admiring the necklace, "do you remember that lovely fan Lord Lesborough gave me? I mislaid it, you know, and it has just occurred to me that I may have left it in your room the night we returned from that dance at the Gheyhezah Palace, just about six weeks ago. Have you come across it?"

"I remember the fan perfectly," said her Grace. "You did not leave it in my room. You—" she gave a grim, hard smile, "you gave it me downstairs in the vestibule; at least, I understood you gave it me. I had forgotten my own fan, and you requested me to use and keep yours in its place."

For the moment I was too astounded to do more than gaze in wonder and astonishment. Positively she was marvellous! With a nervous little laugh I hastily disclaimed all desire for the return of my gift, and, bringing the interview to a somewhat hurried close, parted with her Grace the best of friends.

All the same I smarted with the sense of my defeat. I had Belinda's pearls, but the Duchess kept my fan.

Next morning I took the opportunity of Belinda's absence to replace the necklace in her jewel-case. She made no comment then or after as to its return, and what, if any, explanation Honoria gave, I do not know.

For the remainder of our stay at Cairo the Duchess kept her kleptomania severely in check, so far as my property was concerned, which was, all things considered, as well for both of us. The incident had passed off wonderfully, but had the Duchess been treated with indiscretion or a lack of tact, I shudder to think what might have been the consequences.

Her Grace, if anything, was more impolite to Honoria after the occurrence than before. Indeed, that unfortunate young woman had fallen upon rough days, and, but for Belinda's sustaining influence, would, I think, have quite lost the small remnant of intellect she still retained.

Mark Striven, when not engaged in gambling, horse racing, or billiards found considerable amusement in tormenting his fiancée. He would subject her to a searching cross-examination, and so bewilder the poor wretch that she returned astonishing and impossible answers to the simplest questions. I had heard or seen nothing of the Egyptian person—El Hamed—as Honoria called him, and was beginning to think he had vanished from the scene. I was, however, deceived in this particular, as I shall tell you.

Late one night, or to be quite correct, very early in the morning—I was returning to my room from Midge's apartments. About six or seven women of our set used to congregate there once or sometimes twice a week to talk scandal, make bets, play cards, eat and drink. There were no men admitted—the most stupid of men are apt to be critical, and at times a woman doesn't want to be criticised.

Play always runs high among women; for some of us, indeed, gambling with cards is not sufficiently exciting. Betting is a more feverish and fascinating form of speculation. What bets have I not seen lost and won! Nothing is too trifling to form the subject of a wager. I was present on the night the young Duchess of M——, just newly married, lost twenty thousand pounds to the Marchioness of A—— all over a raindrop! It was a wet day, and a few splashes of rain had fallen on the window from the coping up above. Two drops in particular attracted attention as they slowly glided down the pane.

"Twenty thousand that this drop reaches the bottom first," cried the Marchioness.

"Done," answered her friend.

The two watched the insignificant globules slowly meander the length of the window amid immense excitement. As I say, the Duchess lost, and paid, the wager.

Bets didn't run quite so high in Cairo; there would have been a difficulty in cashing up so far from home. But they ran into a big sum all the same, and, failing ready money, jewels, furs, laces, and even clothes, were available.

On the evening in question Midge was very unlucky. She had staked her set of sables on the certainty that the buttons on Mrs. Courtney's black silk dress were odd in number. Little Lady Saxby booked the bet against her diamond bracelet. A visit to Mrs. Courtney's apartment—she was a most respectable old lady, wife of a clergyman—revealed the fact that there were twenty-four buttons and two hooks and eyes. The good woman was horribly frightened at our incursion into her bedroom; she thought we were burglars, and begged us to take all she had and spare her life!

After that Midge grew reckless. She dropped a thousand over the length of time a match would keep alight, and literally threw away a Brussels lace scarf on the assertion that my eyes were blue! I had a special liking for that scarf, and when Lady Saxby declared that she was ready to wager the lace and fifty pounds against my chatelaine that Honoria would not marry Mark Striven, I closed with the offer.

"It's more than probable that the marriage will take place before they leave Cairo," I said. "The Duke mentioned it to me the other day."

"They're leaving in a week?"

"Quite so. A week is time enough to get married."

Lady Saxby laughed. "You'll have to hand over your chatelaine, Lady Peggy," she said. "Within a week Honoria will take the law into her own hands. She's going to elope! Oh, no," as I started to my feet. "I'm not going to let you into the secret—I've a particular fancy for that chatelaine. I overheard her ladyship and your dear, innocent Belinda discuss the matter, that's how I know. Honoria was intensely affecting—quite dramatic, in fact. She flung her arms round the girl's neck, and prayed Heaven to bless her. These were her very words. Imagine poor Honoria! 'It seems too good to be true,' she said. 'If only I can get away to El Hamed how happy, how happy I shall be!' And then—" Lady Saxby smiled at the remembrance, "then she fell to kissing and crying over Belinda till I felt quite sorry for her.

Digitized by Google

It's bad enough to be kissed by a woman at all. But a damp woman—ugh!" And she shuddered at the thought.

I felt alarmed, as you may suppose, at the intelligence. Really, the Eastacres family were very trying; no sooner had one scandal been averted than another threatened. Of course Honoria's elopement must be stopped, otherwise the Duke's chances with Hardy North might suffer. All the same, I did not see for the moment how it was to be done.

At this moment Midge, having lost all her money, and most of her jewels, declared that she must go to bed.

She was not much troubled at her losses; the husband in Chicago would quickly furnish her with supplies. Other women, of course, are not all so fortunate; their husbands not being in Chicago, are inclined to interfere with their wives' personal expenditure. Not that marital authority ever stops women betting with each other. There are many ways of raising money in Society. The easiest and safest, perhaps, is the following:

Have you ever met a smart woman, titled, may be, and turned out to perfection, at a suburban "At Home?" A function given by wealthy and respectable, but entirely plebian persons. Have you not wondered what the aristocrate was doing in that place? The explanation is simple in itself. She graced the "At Home," imparted style to the occasion for so much hard cash, the fee ranging in proportion to her rank and to her host's banking account.

There are always plenty of people who will gladly pay a high price for a distinguished guest; for the matter of that, there are several agencies in the West End of London who make it their business to arrange the matter.

I retired to rest, as I say, troubled about Honoria. The fact that in place of my peignoir I found a smoking jacket on my door did not improve my temper. It was an amiable practice of Reg and various other kindred spirits to misplace our things on the evenings that we women met together. It was not an uncommon thing to find a snake, harmless, but none the less alarming, in one's water jug, or for an empty meat tin to fall with an awful clatter on one's head from over the door. Crawley was just as foolish as the youngest and silliest of them all. I recognised the smoking jacket as his property, and spent a good half hour in sewing it up into an impossible shape. My maid took it to him next morning with my compliments!

It wanted three days now to the Khedive's ball. Those three days I gave up to watching Honoria and pumping Belinda. Neither process gave me any information. I was in doubt how best to act. If I questioned Belinda outright as to the proposed elopement, it would, I feared, only precipitate matters. She would tell me nothing and warn Honoria. The same fear held me back from consulting the Duke. He would fall so heavily upon his sister that from sheer fright she would break into open rebellion.

I decided to communicate my suspicions to Mark Striven. He heard me in silence, then, with a horrid sort of laugh, thanked me for my warning.

"Within the next week, Lady Peggy? Is that it? Well, I think I can name the date more exactly than that. The night of the Khedive's ball you will find is the evening my fair cousin has fixed for the elopement. She shall meet this El Hamed right enough—only I shall be there to keep him company. Leave it to me, Lady Peggy, and thank you very much."

Mark Striven was certainly a sensible person. I felt much relieved at his assurance, and turned my thoughts and attention to Belinda and myself. I had had another letter from Hardy North expressing intense satisfaction in regard to his daughter's engagement. He proposed to meet us in Paris, where we were going on leaving Cairo, and hoped to arrange for Belinda's speedy marriage.

I also received a note from Stanley Forbes—as did Belinda. He told me he had found Sheila at the address I gave him, and thanked me for my help. I did not see Belinda's epistle, but from a letter she wrote him which I came across and read, I gathered he had asked for particulars in regard to her feelings towards the Duke, and had hinted that his Grace was not all he seemed.

I promptly burnt Belinda's answer; it would never do for her and Stanley to compare notes upon the Duke. And then I waited in nervous anticipation for the evening of the ball—the evening which would decide Belinda's future.

All my tact and cleverness had been brought to bear upon the situation. The Duke aided me in the best possible manner. Belinda would be congratulated, fêted, complimented at the ball, on her engagement; all that flattery and homage could do would be done. A girl must be more than human, I thought, to resist the influences thus brought to bear on her.

The occasion would be her first introduction to an important function. She would realise, for the first time, the prestige accorded to rank, the honour paid to a distinguished member of Society like the Duke.

Something of awe and trepidation stole over the girl as we drove to the Palace. She seemed to shrink from the ordeal through which she had to pass, to draw back from the gamut of criticism she had to run. She looked more than ever like a nymph from a Greek fable, tall, straight, fair, her neck and arms gleaming white, her plentiful brown hair, coiled in classic fashion low on her neck.

The Duke met us in the great hall of the Khedive's Palace. He looked very distinguished, and Belinda for once lost a little of her self-possession as he conducted her up the wide low stairs to where the Khedive received his guests.

The colour came and went in her cheeks; the splendour of the scene, the admiration of the men, the envious looks of the women, affected her as I had hoped they would.

It is a gorgeous affair, the Khedive's ball. The rooms are hung with roses, wreaths of the flowers festoon the walls, twine round the pillars, hang in fragrant masses from the ceiling. Innumerable lights—the Palace is lit by electricity—twinkle among the flowers. The air is heavy with scents full of the romance of the East. Egyptian officers high in the service of the Government throng the place, their gorgeous uniforms in strange contrast to the black coats of British diplomatists. British officers, brave in scarlet and gold, are much in evidence, and there is a good sprinkling of American civilians.

This year the assemblage was more than usually distinguished. Quite a number of our set were at Cairo scattered among the various hotels, and they all put in an appearance.

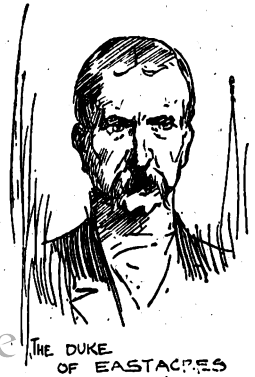
Belinda promenaded the rooms, the Duke in close attendance.

Her progress was a slow one. Every now and then the Duke would stop, and, with a courtly bow, ask permission to present this one or that among his friends to Belinda. And on each presentation followed a little congratulatory murmur, a reference to her engagement, a wish for her happiness.

The colour deepened in her cheeks, her eyes grew restless, she glanced round fearfully, casting anxious looks at me. She had not dreamt of this; the congratulations, the compliments, filled her with terror. It was as though a chain were tightening round her, a chain that each moment grew more difficult to break.

It was a fierce ordeal—an impossible ordeal. How could any girl stand out against the forces directed against her? How could she proclaim that she was not in need of congratulations, that she was not going to marry the Duke?

It was an incredible idea. I smiled and thought how cleverly I had arranged it all. Here in the midst of all that was brilliant the figure of David Carr must needs seem plain—existence with him would be a very different matter from life with the Duke!



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

A steady, monotonous future was all that he could offer—that and his love.

The Duchess murmured her satisfaction, forgetting in her pleasure to unduly snub Honoria. Her Ladyship was looking quite presentable, in a pretty gown of pale pink silk. The colour was kind to her skin, which did not look so sallow as usual, and her hair was very nicely done. She was in a great state of nervous tremor, and cast quick glances round the room in search apparently for El Hamed. I was gratified to note that he did not arrive.

Towards the end of the ball, when the success of the evening was at its height, the Khedive made known his desire that Belinda should be presented to him.

An attaché made his way down the room and informed me of the royal decree. My heart beat so fast that it was painful. The presentation of Belinda would prove the critical moment. How would Belinda behave? On her action hung the issue of her future and of mine.

£20,000—the price of a peaceful old age—my old age trembled in the balance.

That old and distinguished diplomat, Lord Melrose, presented her. The Khedive gazed at her in open approbation. Then with a charming smile—he is a singularly fascinating personage—entered into conversation.

"Did she like Cairo?"

"Very much," she answered quietly.

"You will be leaving shortly?"

"Yes, your Majesty, to my regret."

"Ah! but you are going to be very happy. You are going to marry this gentleman?" He glanced at the Duke. "He is to be envied. I wish you every happiness." The Khedive smiled, the Duke bowed. Belinda, crimson from brow to chin, remained speechless. I thanked Providence for her silence, another minute and it would be too late for her to speak. Too late, it would be impossible. She——

Belinda threw up her head, and advanced towards the Khedive. Then in a clear voice, audible to the whole room, made the following astounding statement. Think of it, a young girl of seventeen having the courage, the will, to openly defy the custom, the conventions of Society!

"It is very kind of you to give me such good wishes," she said simply, not at all as though she addressed a Prince, "but—but—" she paused, "I am not going to marry the Duke," she said. "I am not wise enough, nor clever enough. In fact, I will never marry him, your Majesty."

And without waiting to witness the effects of this moral bombshell, Belinda retired into the crowd, and from thence made her way into the ante-chamber, leaving me to bear the murmurs, the comments, the shocked surprise of the assembly.

I could have screamed in my mortification and my rage. To be set at naught by a chit like that, to have my schemes overturned, my future jeopardised by a girl in her teens!

I took a hatred to the girl. Henceforth I would deal differently with her. She should learn that I was not a woman lightly to be turned aside. Plans for the future I could make in plenty, but for the present I was weighed down with the sense of defeat.

My first attempt at marrying Belinda had failed!

Eager to escape from my friends I hurried towards the room where Belinda had taken refuge. One had to pass through an archway to reach it. Unconcealed by draperies or curtains, the interior of the room was in full view from the other side of the arch.

The Duke had followed Belinda, and they were in deep conversation. I wished much to hear what they were saying. Just a few feet from the archway, however, the Khedive approached and began to talk about Belinda, her beauty, her strange, not to say startling, conduct.

I was standing sideways, half facing his Majesty, half conscious of what was happening in that other room.

At length he turned to speak to an attaché—etiquette forbade me to move but permitted me to use my eyes.

I glanced quickly at Belinda and the Duke. They were on opposite sides of the apartments, she close to the windows, long French windows, opening on to the Palace grounds, he facing her, speaking with energy and force.

Suddenly through a door to his right the figure of a woman, closely veiled, stole into the room. Had she made no sign but steadily walked by him, she might have gained the window and passed through unchallenged, but the sight of Eastaeres appeared to terrify her. She uttered a faint cry, clutched her veil, lurched forward, stumbled, fell.

It was the wretched Honoria!

In a minute the Duke had grasped the situation. Honoria was going to meet the Egyptian, to make a last despairing effort after freedom.

With a muttered execration the Duke darted towards his sister.

Belinda rushed between them.

"You shall not touch her, nor hurt, nor stop her. She's going to leave you for ever, to live a free, a happy life. You shall not prevent her."

He waited coolly, quietly, till she had finished, then gently but firmly pushed her aside.

Honoria who by this time had staggered to her feet, was almost within touch of his fingers. Another moment he would have had her in his grasp. But there was still Belinda to be reckoned with. With a swift movement she rushed to the corner of the room where, in Moorish fashion, stood a lighted lamp upon the floor. Snatching it up she stood triumphantly before the Duke.

"Now," she cried, "move a step towards Honoria, and I dash this to the ground." She poised the lamp above her head. "Honoria quick, fly!"

Honoria started, the Duke moved, Belinda brought the lamp level with his face!

(What followed Belinda's action will be told next Tuesday.)

A little girl, hearing it remarked that all people had once been children, artlessly inquired: "Who took care of the babies?"

Mother: "What have you done to your little sister?" Boy: "Nothing." "Then, what is she crying for?" "She's cryin' because she can't think of anything to cry for."

"Yes," murmured the bald-headed man, "I've been married twenty years, but my wife and myself never had but one thought in common." "And what was that?" asked the thin man. "Oh, it was when the house caught fire, and we both thought we'd like to get out first."

Missionary: "Was it liquor that brought you to this?" Imprisoned Burglar: "No, sir, it was cleanin'—Spring house cleanin', sir." Missionary: "Eh? House cleaning?" Burglar: "Yessir. The woman had been house cleanin', and the stair carpet was up, and the folks heard me."

Managing Editor (to reporter): "Are you engaged to be married, Mr. Scarehead?" Mr. Scarehead: "Er—yes, sir; I——" Managing Editor: "Kindly draw on the office for forty shillings, get married immediately, and let me have two columns on 'Married Life in a Great City' by twelve o'clock. And—er—congratulations!"

An aristocratic lady, meeting a beggar in rags, gave him her card, saying: "Here is my address. If you will call at any time you can have some of my husband's left-off clothes." A few days later she saw the poor fellow again in the street. "Why did you not come as I told you?" "Please, ma'am, this is Wednesday, and on your card it says: 'At home on Thursdays.'"

Digitized by Google

Storyettes.

News to Both.

Mamma: "What is the matter?" Little Jack: "Me an' sister was playin' keep house, an' I was the papa, an' she was the governess, an' she told me to kiss her, an' when I did, she slapped me hard—boo, boo! I didn't know that was in the game." Mamma (thoughtfully): "Neither did I."

A Search for Pleasure.

Little Johnny: "I've got on my new boots." Little Tommy: "So've I." Little Johnny: "Have yer? Let's hunt for a puddle."

The Song of the Gay Coquette.

"I know," remarked the gay coquette, "I haven't caught a husband yet; but then," she added, softly sighing, "I've had some fun while I've been trying."

The Butcher's Way.

A young woman asked her butcher to weigh the baby. "With pleasure, madam." (After having examined the scales.) "Ah! thirteen and a half pounds, madam, with the bones."

To Amuse the Guests.

Hostess: "Dear me, the conversation is flagging dreadfully. What can we do to amuse these people?" Host: "I don't know, I am sure, unless we go into the other room for a bit, and give them a chance to talk about us."

A Kindred Feeling.

"Let me tell you, Mrs. Thomas," said a happy parent to a rustic neighbour, "my son, Ernest, has got a first prize." "Oh! I quite understand your feelings, marm; I felt just the same myself when our young pig carried off a medal at the agricultural show."

The Dream and the Reality.

After dreaming for three years of a fairy prince, riding into town on a fierce charger, with a glittering sword hanging by his side, a Colchester girl is about to marry a man who has a charger that is hitched to a milk cart, and she is doing remarkably well these hard times to get him.

A Thoughtful Spouse.

"I've a good mind to go and jump into the river," said Mr. N. Peck, at the end of a little domestic discussion, as he picked up his hat and started out. "You come back here," said his wife. "If you intend any such trick as that, just march upstairs and put on your old clothes before you start."

Why He Danced.

There is a story of an Imperial Highness waltzing thrice in the same evening with an English lady at a Court in Berlin. She naturally felt, and frankly confessed, herself highly flattered by the compliment. "I did not intend it as a compliment," was the answer. "Then," said the lady, somewhat upset, "your Highness must be very fond of dancing." "I detest dancing," was the still unsatisfactory response. Undeterred by her ill success, our fair Englishwoman still prosecuted her inquiries. "What then, may I ask, can be your Imperial Highness' motive for dancing?" "Madam," was the exalted personage's curt reply, "I dance to perspire."

The Lady's Retort.

He: "Really you must excuse me, but I thought it was Hetty Smith." She: "Well, you're excusable. A man that would want to kiss Hetty Smith is not responsible for his actions."

Easily Surmounted.

Millie: "I don't mind marrying you, Clarence, but I hate the idea of giving up my two pounds a week situation at the shop." Clarence: "Then, don't give it up, dearest. I'll give up mine. I'm getting only thirty shillings."

When a Girl Bets.

Clara: "Now remember you have bet me a box of gloves, and if I win, you must buy me just the kind I like." George: "Yes, and if I win——" Clara: "If you win, you have the privilege of buying me a cheaper sort—if you are mean enough to do it."

Why She Wanted Him Scolded.

Wife (to her husband): "Arthur, love, I want you to give Jack a good scolding to-morrow morning." Husband: "What for? I am perfectly satisfied with the fellow." Wife: "Well, you know, he has to beat the carpets to-morrow, and he strikes ever so much harder when he's in a bad temper."

True Philanthropy.

"Wasn't it sad about old Jobley's failure?" "What! Has he failed?" "Yes, gone clean smash." "That's too bad. He promised me something yesterday; but now, in his trouble, I will not hold him to it." "That's generous of you. What was it?" "His daughter's hand in marriage."

Sentiment and Business.

Young Man: "I cannot understand, sir, why you permit your daughter to sue me for breach of promise. You remember that you were bitterly opposed to our engagement because I wasn't good enough for her, and would disgrace the family." Old Man: "Young man, that was sentiment; this is business."

Quite a Little Matter.

As the girl rose from his knee, a look of deep concern appeared upon the young man's face. "Surely, my darling," he said, in anxious tones, "your love has not turned cold?" "No, George," the beautiful girl replied, "I only want to change to the other side; the ticking of your watch unpleasantly disturbs my ear."

Baiting the Situation.

Mr. Sidney Smith: "Are you the policeman on the beat near my house?" Police-Constable Toulson: "Yes, sir." Mr Sidney Smith: "Would you mind standing near our kitchen entrance next Saturday afternoon for a few minutes? We're having some trouble in getting a girl, and I want the one who comes on Saturday to have every possible inducement to stay."

Where Silence was Golden.

"Did you know that I passed your door last evening?" said the young man tenderly. "Of course," replied the beautiful girl, with reproach in her glistening eyes. "Do you think I would not know your step?" "Certainly," said the happy young man, as he directed the conversation away from the subject, and avoided remarking that he passed the door in a cab.

It Would not Harmonise.

"I want," she said hesitatingly, as she poised her basket in front of her pretty chin with a thoughtful air, "to get some lettuce." "Yes'm," said the market man; "here's some—very nice it is, too." "Is it all that colour?" "Why—er—yes'm; all lettuce is green, you know." "Oh, it is too bad. I got a lovely blue dish to put lettuce in; but I'm sure green would look horrible in it. I never thought about there not being any shades, you know." And as she turned away the market man was almost sure he saw a tear of disappointment in her eye.

Digitized by Google

The Wooing of Peggy.

The Difference between Peggy Smith and Lady Vesdris.

"I WISH to see Lady Vesdris Pendual." The soberly dressed little man, looked questioningly at the maid servant who opened the door to him.

"Nobody of that name in the house, sir."

"No? You surprise me," he smiled, then added: "However, as I am not blind, I can see her at this very moment playing tennis in that court."

He pointed casually in the direction of the distant lawn.

"That is Miss Peggy Smith, sir. The gentleman she is playing with, being the young master."

The little man coughed.

"Then, my good girl, would you have the kindness to tell Miss Peggy Smith, that Mr. George Brent, Solicitor to the late Earl of Porthawn, would like to see her for a few minutes."

The servant stared, then asking the solicitor into the house, she showed him into the drawing-room and departed on her errand. Brent had not long to wait, for ere many minutes had elapsed, the door opened and a pretty, winsome girl, entered the room, closely followed by the young fellow whom the solicitor had seen playing tennis with her, when he had entered the grounds a short while before. Like his partner in the set, he looked hot and somewhat moist-visaged.

"So you have found me out at last, Mr. Brent," she remarked by way of greeting.

"'Um, yes, my dear Lady Vesdris," replied the solicitor, his eyes twinkling with latent merriment. "And a fine dance you have led me, too! To come down to Yorkshire from London is quite an undertaking for a man of my age, you know. Now that I have at last arrived in this very pretty, if extremely out-of-the-way, locality, I should be pleased if you would accord me a few minutes private conversation—alone."

"Well, we are alone, dear Mr. Brent," said Vesdris smiling. "Bert being in the room does not alter that fact, for—we, you see, we have no secrets from each other."

"Ahem." The solicitor's eyes twinkled more than ever. "Am I to understand, by that confession, that you are engaged to this gentleman?"

"Not yet," replied Vesdris, hurriedly, before Bertram Wilmot had time to get a word in edgeways. "We—we——" She paused, then flushing hotly, said, "What was it that you wanted to see me alone for?"

"Ah, of course, I was forgetting the object of my visit in the pleasure of seeing you." The smile died from his lips, as he added, seriously. "It is my pleasant duty to inform you that my late client, the Earl of Porthawn, died intestate, and such being the case, you, as his lordship's only surviving relative, inherit alike his estates in the Duchy of Cornwall and his fortune." He paused, then added, "The title, of course, lapses though it could doubtless be revived, always supposing that you contracted a suitable marriage."

Vesdris laid a hand on the little man's arm.

"That, Mr. Brent, you know that I should always do," she said, smiling into his eyes.

"I am far from being certain on that point," said the solicitor, a slight note of testiness apparent in his voice. "I remember the time when you told me in all seriousness, that you wanted to marry the gardener's boy."

"But that was when I used to invite you up to the schoolroom to tea with my dolls, Mr. Brent." Always pretty, she looked singularly winning at that moment.

Brent being merely a man, suffered the smile to be wooed back to his face, as pinching her gently on the cheek, he said;

"Those were happy days, Vesdris, when I used to come and drink thimblefuls of tea with you, and listen to the respective family histories of your dollies! Eh? I little thought then that you would ever have been thrown alone on the world as Miss Peggy Smith. You should have come to my house, little girl, instead of hiding yourself away in the wilds of Yorkshire as a companion. Two years hard hunting it has taken me to find you."

"I knew that you would want me to come to you, if I let you know of my whereabouts." Vesdris said softly, "I did not want to be a burden on you, for I thought that I could earn my own living! Rather than do that, I would have accepted the hundred a year Uncle Walter offered me, when he stepped into everything at the death of my poor father." Her lips trembled ominously for a moment, then steadying, she continued, "I have been very happy here. Everybody has been so kind to me, and Bert has looked after me as carefully as if I were his own sister."

"Perhaps more so than if you were," said the solicitor drily, adding briskly as the young man coloured awkwardly, "Well, I must be off now. I am due at York at two, and——"

"But you will stay and have some lunch," said Wilmot, speaking for the first time. "I know Peggy—er—Lady Vesdris would——"

"Thank you, but I am afraid that I cannot. My train leaves at 12.43, and if the clock on the mantelpiece is correct, I have just ten minutes in which to get to the station." The solicitor spoke briskly. "Good-bye! Of course you must leave here, little girl, at once, and come up to town. You have a lot of documents to sign before you can enter into possession of your own. Let me see, to-day is Monday—I shall expect you at my office not later than Tuesday week. Good-bye! Good-bye! Remember what I said about the title and making a suitable marriage. As you are one of, if not the biggest heiress in England, you have enough money to revive it." And so saying, the busy little solicitor walked to the door and out of the house, pausing at the drive gate, to wave an adieu, before he stepped briskly out towards the station. Vesdris closed the door softly, and sped lightly back to the drawing-room, where Bert had remained, with unwonted discourtesy, whilst she had shown her visitor out.

He was standing by the window, his hands thrust down into his jacket pockets, gazing absent-mindedly out into space. So occupied indeed was he in his own thoughts, that he was unaware of Vesdris' presence till he felt her hand lightly placed on his shoulder.

"Bert," she said wistfully. "You told me this morning that you had something to speak to me about—it was just before Janet came to tell me that Mr. Brent was in the drawing-room."

He turned to gaze at the girl beside him in mute agony.

"Won't you tell me now, what it was you wanted to say to me, dear?"

"No, I am afraid that I cannot," he said hoarsely, as once again he turned to look out of the window. "I—I—to tell you the truth, I—I forget what I was going to say."

"Don't tell a fib, Bert," she said quietly, as putting her arm through his, she laid her head upon his shoulder. "You know really quite well what you were going to say. Won't you tell me—that is, if I really want to hear?"

A faint smile stole over his features.

Digitized by Google

"You—that is—I can never tell you what I was going to say, now."

"Why?" She raised her head from his shoulder, to glance inquiringly up into his face. "Why won't you tell me now, when half an hour ago you were willing to?"

"Why?" He placed his hands on her shoulders and looked straight into the violet eyes raised half-shyly to his. "A great deal has happened in those thirty minutes—and I wonder if you would be angry with me, if—I said—that you have hardly been quite fair with me."

"Hardly fair. Why do you say that, Bert?" she asked. A faint flush suffused her cheeks, mounting to the very temples where her soft golden hair strayed in unruly curls of gold. "Why do you think that I have been unfair?"

"I don't know why I should have said it," he said, "unless it is, that the world has suddenly seemed to grow cold and bitter to me," he added abruptly, his voice becoming oddly strained. "You came to us as Peggy Smith, nearly two years ago, and as Peggy Smith, I loved you! I——"

"Cannot you see your way to love—Vesdris Pendual as much—as you loved Peggy Smith?" The faint flush mantling her cheeks, deepened into a furious blush.

"It would not be honourable on my part to tell her so, even if I did, and——"

"But you have," she said, a ring of triumph in her voice. "And now will you explain to me why it would not be honourable for you to tell Vesdris Pendual that you love her, when you could do so without dishonour to Peggy Smith?"

"Ah, little woman, cannot you understand," he said fondly. "You are an heiress, and one of the richest women in England at that; whilst I—I am merely the son of a country squire, with a few hundreds to call my own! As Peggy, I might have found courage to ask you to be——"

He paused abruptly, to turn and gaze anew out of the window.

"Yes, dear—to be what?" She glanced up at his face pleadingly. "Bert, to you I shall always be Peggy. Don't let money prove a barrier between us! We have been so happy together, and, Bert, tell me what you were going to say?"

"Vesdris," he interrupted hoarsely, "do you know what you are saying? Do you know that you are tempting me?"

"I want to tempt you, dear," she said, as laying her head on his shoulder she hid her tear-blurred eyes from his view.

"Then Peggy, darling—for I shall always call you by the name I first learnt to love you under—will you be my wife, dearest?"

Though tear-stained, it was a happy face she raised to his, as she replied simply:

"Bert, dear, I shall be the happiest girl in the world if you will only have me!"

"If?" He pressed her closely to him, smothering her resistless lips with hungry kisses. "If? It will be more to the point to say, if Mr. Brent will let me have you."

"I am of age," she said, mutinously. "But somehow I don't think that he will find there is a just cause or impediment why we should not marry, dearest."

Vesdris proved a prophetess. Mr. Brent did not, and when the one time Peggy entered into her own, it was as Lady Vesdris Wilmot.

H. Morton Baird.

SPLENDID @ CHRISTMAS

DOUBLE NUMBER @@@@@@

NEXT TUESDAY@@@@@@2d.

A GRAMOPHONE FOR AN OPINION.

In order that those of our readers who have not yet managed to secure one of these splendid instruments may still have an opportunity of doing so, we offer ten more of our famous Gramophones this week.

These prizes, as every successful competitor will tell you, are well worth trying for. They reproduce splendidly both the human voice and musical instruments. With each instrument is presented two records, and as a Christmas party entertainer they are hardly to be equalled.

What you have to do to Win a Gramophone.

In Short Stories week by week, as you know, are several features, namely—(1) The Serial Story; (2) The Series, "How I Chaperoned Belinda"; (3) In Confidence page; (4) The Birthdays Information column; and (5) Editorial Chat.

I want you to tell me which of these features interests you most, which next, and so on.

What you have to do is to write on the back of a postcard the titles of the features in the order in which you like them best and send them to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., marking your postcard in the left-hand top corner "Feature."

To the ten readers whose opinions most nearly represent the concensus of opinion will be awarded a handsome Gramophone.

All opinions must reach us not later than by first post on Tuesday morning, December 16th.

Result of the "Anagram" Competition.

In the above competition a Gramophone has been awarded to each of the following competitors:

A. Fortheringham, 6 Greenfield Street, Govan.
J. F. R. Anderson, 2 West Mayfield, Edinburgh.
J. Smith, 51 Shakespeare Crescent, Patricroft, Lancs.
F. McClellan, 3 Mounsey Road, near Tranmere, Birkenhead.
A. Reoch, 123 Victoria Road, Dundee.
G. Humphreys, 19 Colville Street, Nottingham.
C. Payne, St. Aubans, Burlington Road, North End, Portsmouth.
F. Gale, 1 Park Place, Cheltenham.
E. Mill, 12 Green Street, Neath, South Wales.
R. Wild, care of E. Wilson, 2 Orchard Villas, Linden Road, Ashford, Middlesex.

Digitized by Google

The Conversion of a Tragedian.

By the Love of a Woman.

Mr. Treadwell was making a matutinal repast of a slice of corned beef and an olive, and thirstily watching the concoction of a roseate study in still life, when I first made his acquaintance on a morning two years ago. He paid for his libation and its more substantial accompaniment with the last coin that he possessed, but he did it with the air of majesty which characterised all his movements on and off the stage.

He was presented to me as "Mr. Treadwell, the tragedian," which implied the compliment that he was quite too well known to need any further description.

Mr. Treadwell, the tragedian, was sadly in need of a shave, and there was a haggard look about his eyes which bespoke hard lines of fate. A hair-cut would have altered his appearance greatly, and would have done him no material harm. His long, fur-caped and fur-cuffed overcoat was faded and threadbare, and was kept closely buttoned for the reason, it may be supposed, that his under coat was still less prepossessing to the eye. His shoes, which once had been patent leather, were cracked and seamed, but polished. His hat was not quite new—in fact, there was a bare dent in the background, which, carefully as the nap had been brushed, could not be concealed, but the rim was soiled and bent.

But notwithstanding Mr. Treadwell's seedy appearance, and the fact that he was almost a counterpart of many another stranded actor who has haunted the Rialto in years past, there was something about him which impressed one favourably and held the attention.

"Genius is nothing without opportunity," said Napoleon—and Treadwell had been thus far without the necessary opportunity to raise himself to the heights which he felt entirely competent to attain, and which he was modestly confident that he should attain eventually. For he was ambitious as few men are. Ambition was the warp and woof of his whole nature. It was honest, legitimate ambition, and it was backed up by a tenacity of purpose that was somewhat remarkable, considering the trials and tribulations he had borne in the pursuit of his aims. The spirit of humour and flippancy which characterises the dramatic age was so foreign to his nature that he was unable to understand that there was practically no demand for a new Hamlet or Othello, or Richard III. His world was one of solemnity and earnestness.

Treadwell came into my office one afternoon, looking more seedy than usual, but graver, more austere, and more majestic.

"I have just been insulted," he said, in suppressed, tragic tones, as he sat down in the easy-chair by the fire.

"No trouble, I hope," I said, by way of encouraging him to continue in explanation.

"Well, no; though I should have preferred to have struck the dog down. It was Conrad, the manager of the Metropolitan Theatre, where a crowd of giggling fools are amused nightly. You cannot imagine what the despicable scoundrel said to me. 'Treadwell,' he said, in that patronising way of his, 'you don't seem to be playing in much luck of late. Hang it, man,' slapping me on the back with disgusting familiarity, 'haven't you found out that tragedy is dead and buried? Heaven help you, sir! The people don't want it and they won't have it. You would starve ten times over while you were convincing them that you were a second Irving. The rattle-headed public wants screaming farce—that's what it wants. That's what it's willing to shell out its silver shekels for, and that's what we must give if we want to live. You've got to come to this view sooner or later, and make the best of the situation. Now, I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll give you £10 a week to join my 'Willy Wally' company at the Metropolitan, and appear just as you are, without one bit of make-up. Your duty will be to go on and act your natural self. Why, man, as the busted tragedian you would have the whole town holding its sides. You don't appreciate what a frightful guy you are. You mustn't even get a shave, you know. I want you just as you are. You don't say no? There's a good thing in it for you, old man, and it's the only sensible thing to do.'"

"What did you say?" I asked, amused, but disguising the fact.

"Say," thundered Treadwell, with a magnificent gesture, "I told him to go and boil himself! I was angered as I never was before. Burlesque myself, eh? I wanted to crush him to the earth! 'I may starve, sir, yes, starve,' I said, 'but I will not pollute myself and desecrate my noble art by accepting such a diabolical proposition as this of yours. You are a craven insulter, sir!' And with that I turned on my heel and left him."

"The offer was very ill-advised," I commented, "but perhaps he meant well. You can afford to be charitable, Mr. Treadwell."

I soothed his ruffled feelings as best I could, and presently he asked me to accompany him up the street to Chalmer's Theatre, where there was to be a benefit performance that afternoon.

"Some very good talent—worth seeing," he added sententiously.

I have always been more or less a Bohemian, and the idea of walking up the Strand in company with Gilbert Treadwell had no embarrassment for me. Furthermore I understood my obligations, and we pushed in the well-known yellow doors, and then pushed them out again, before we turned into the foyer of the playhouse.

Treadwell had a passing acquaintance with the man in the box-office, and by reason of his being a member of the "Profession"—a capital P—had no difficulty in securing passes for us both. The inconsistency of asking for tickets for a benefit performance did not seem to occur to him. If everyone gained admittance in this way the benefit part of the performance would scarcely materialise.

"Who is the beneficiary?" I asked casually, when we had gained our seats.

"One of the noblest little women that ever lived," he answered warmly. "Ramona Darling. You know of her, of course. She was rarely talented, but sickness and desertion by the man whom she loved have reduced her to absolute poverty."

"Yes, I remember Ramona Darling. In her palmy days, when she was at the height of her popularity, I thought her the most chic and cunning actress on the stage."

I felt almost a personal gratitude to those sympathetic artists who had volunteered to give their time and talents towards the benevolent project of relieving her distress.

The entertainment was made up of a medley of songs, dances, and portions of acts from plays which were at the time running at the different theatres in the city, and, altogether, was clever and interesting. But the fickle, thoughtless public, unfortunately, had not shown the interest in Ramona Darling's case which it was expected it would, and as a result the audience was not only small, but was composed in greater part of "deadheads," like Treadwell and myself. This incensed the tragedian greatly. The funniest things that were said and done on the stage only deepened his gloom. It was evident he not only disapproved of the audience, but of the acting as well. He had felt it his duty, however, to show his approval of the benefit, and its object, by lending the influence of his presence to the occasion, and in pursuit of this duty he retained his seat during the whole of the performance.

Digitized by Google

Just before the curtain went down on the final scene, Mr. Chalmers, the manager of the theatre and the organiser of the benefit, appeared on the stage.

"I am very sorry to say," he announced, "that the proceeds of this benefit amount to a trifle less than thirty pounds. And this sum, I fear, will be required to pay the expenses of a funeral. I have just heard that Ramona Darling is dying."

As Treadwell and I went slowly out of the theatre, I fancied he brushed a tear from his eye.

"If you'll pay the bus-fare, Felix," he said in a strained voice, "we'll go round to her house. I didn't know she was so bad as that. I want to see her once more before she goes."

There was humour in his pathos, for, despite himself, in all that he did, Treadwell was a humourist.

I was quite sufficiently interested in Ramona Darling to cordially agree with his plan to visit her, and in a few minutes we found ourselves ringing at her door. The place was one of the cheap boarding-houses which abound near King's Cross—one of those unpleasant abodes where the co-mingled odours of cabbages and onions salute the nostrils of the visitor as he enters the door.

We were conducted up two flights of stairs and shown unceremoniously into a dim, dull room, where the one time popular little favourite lay white and still upon a by no means luxurious bed. Everything about the place betokened poverty and suffering.

She was attended only by a stupid-looking German girl, who withdrew as we entered. A child, a sunny-haired girl of five, was kneeling pathetically by the bed clasping the white hand of the dying woman, and hiding her face in the covers.

We advanced softly to the bedside, and the child raised her tear-stained face and stared at us inquiringly. The woman opened her eyes wearily, and a gleam of pleasure shot into them as she recognised Treadwell.

"Gilbert," she murmured faintly, with a great effort holding up her hand to him.

He bent and kissed the hand, and groaned as he sank down on a chair beside the bed.

"Ramona," he said tremulously, "I never thought it would come to this. It is not your fault, I know."

He smoothed back the fine hair from her forehead with touch as tender as a ministering angel's, and the tears trickled down his cheeks upon the white pillows.

"The benefit was a success," he went on with spontaneous perjury, "there will be plenty of money now to provide for all your needs. You will be quite well in a week. I—I wanted to see you, and this is my friend, Mr. Felix, who used to write pleasant things about you in the Age. I am sure you will be well in a week, Ramona."

"No—no," she responded, "I am dying, Gilbert; oh, God, I am dying."

With a convulsive movement she caught the arm of the child and drew the little one's face close to hers. She held her thus silently for a moment, while the child sobbed as if her heart would break.

"Gilbert," she said, presently, "you loved me once."

He looked up at me and said, half apologetically. "Yes, I loved her once."

Then he fell on his knees beside the bed and continued, brokenly, "I love you now."

He seemed to me like a new order of Othello as he knelt there grief-stricken, unmanned, touched to the heart by this unwonted spectacle of the woman he worshipped, bending to catch the last words that fell from her fluttering lips. He was a tragedian in earnest for once.

"I want you to take her, my little Dollie," she went on. "Take her and see that she is cared for. She is my only one—mine and—his. I can trust you, Gilbert. She is all I have, and you will—cherish her—for my—sake. Do not let her love—unwisely, as her—mother did. Promise me, Gilbert?"

"I promise, Ramona. For your sake I will do anything—everything."

She sighed with relief, and for several moments lay silent and with closed eyes. Then, with a strenuous effort, she raised herself up and held her white arms aloft as if to pronounce a malediction.

"Never let him contaminate her with his touch," she cried, feverishly and wildly. "Should he come to you, tell him that I died hating him!"

Then she leant forward and kissed Treadwell, and took up the child in her arms and caressed her passionately. The following moment she sank back among the pillows, dead.

I notified the woman of the house, and a few moments later Treadwell and I went out and took a return 'bus.

Neither spoke. He seemed completely unnerved. When we had reached our destination he told me he was going to make arrangements for the funeral, and bade me good-night. Knowing that he was without money, I offered him a note, but he refused it.

We were almost at the door of my office, and I took his arm and pressed him to go in.

"Now, what are your plans?" I asked. "You are not exactly in a position to assume such a responsibility as you have undertaken. I speak frankly, old man. How are you going to take care of this child?"

"Can't I do it on an income of £10 a week?" he responded. "Didn't I have an offer of that for my services this afternoon?"

"Yes; but——" I began.

"The circumstances are changed now," he interrupted.

He strode majestically out of the door, and that was the last I saw of him for two days. I read the announcement in a daily paper of his engagement for a burlesque part in "Conrad's Popular Willy Wally Company," and I thus knew that his revised plans had been successful.

I had always cherished a certain faith and confidence in Treadwell, born, perhaps, of my admiration for his utter sincerity and his strength of purpose in clinging to his tenets against every adversity; now, I began to respect him. I knew what a sacrifice he had made as perhaps no one save himself did. I could imagine what torture the new order of things was to him. For whatever Treadwell's faults and deficiencies, he was a man of artistic soul, whose purposes were honourable and earnest, and whose ideals and standards were of the highest.

For the sake of the mother, the child had become more to him than his own future. He was to care for it, and cherish it, even as he had cherished the hope of his own eventual success. To do this it was no longer possible to continue in the old way; he must have money, and there was but one way open to him to get it.

He did not ask me to the theatre to witness his performance; but I went one night, and sat where he could not see me.

Conrad's predictions were well founded. Treadwell was a success. His appearance brought forth a storm of applause, and his extravagant manner was a continual source of merriment. I felt truly sorry for him, knowing what he suffered. There was an expression of the keenest pain on his countenance when the audience roared at his manœuvres, but it all intensified the humours of the character he so well impersonated, and few suspected that it was not assumed for that purpose.

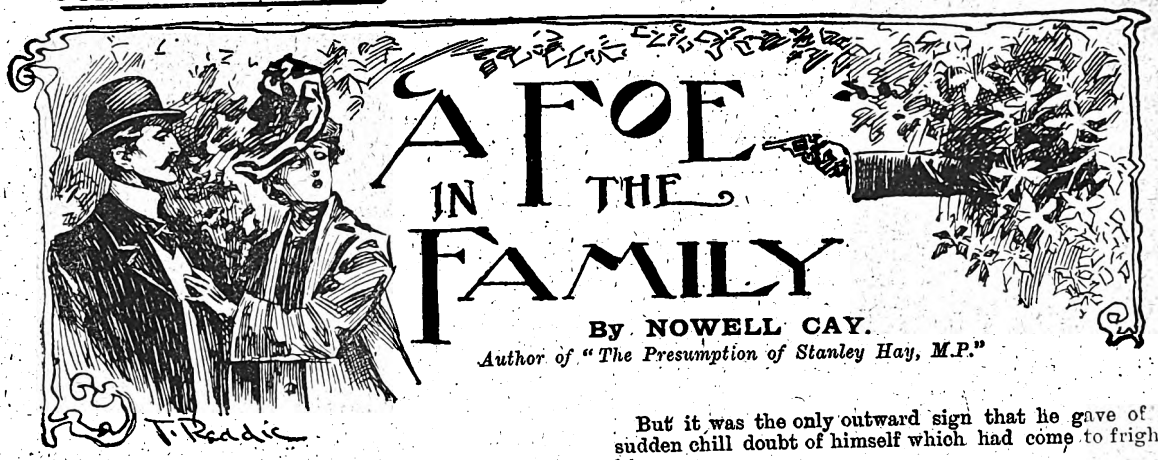
A day or two afterward he took me to see his new charge. She was harboured in the house of a kind old lady, who provided her with the utmost consideration and care, and took a motherly interest in "the little dear."

She was really the prettiest and sweetest child I ever saw. And as she ran to Treadwell and put her baby arms affectionately about his neck, he kissed her tenderly and smiled. Yes Gilbert Treadwell actually smiled.

G. Parkyn

Digitized by Google

OUR SERIAL STORY.



Wherein Grant's Hopes are Raised.

They still stood in the draped hall where they had met, but for the moment Cathie had forgotten her anxiety for her cousin.

At first she had been bewildered, but as his impetuous string of words allowed her to understand more and more clearly what was in his mind her cheeks flushed scarlet. Her heart beat rapidly with a strange tumult of emotions. She was angry and indignant, and yet in spite of her anger she was pleasantly conscious that the man she loved was admitting his preference for her. He had never spoken so clearly before. She could be almost certain now of something she had half believed, half felt ashamed of believing.

Grant had never looked quite so handsome to her as he stood with flashing eyes and flushed cheeks pouring out his undeserved condemnation. And he had said that he would have given his life for one kind word from her.

But to believe that she was in love with Lord Ilden, and had acted towards his wife as she had done at the Hall through a feeling of mad jealousy. Her eyes flashed as brightly as his.

She would not condescend to answer accusations so unfounded and unjust, and without a word she turned on her heel.

But as she turned with his denunciatory "where have you sent her?" sounding in her ears she found that they were no longer alone.

Florence had been unable to bear the suspense any longer. Grant must have brought bad news of George or Catherine would have returned to her, and she was now in the doorway.

"You have news of him?" she said appealingly. "Catherine dearest, you will not hide it from me."

Catherine shook her head.

"No dear. Mr. Ilden has heard nothing." She turned to Grant whose surprise showed itself clearly in his face. Catherine's had lost its flush and was quite calm. A strange smile played in her eyes.

"You asked where Lady Ilden was, but gave me no time to tell you that we came here together. By the way you have not yet been introduced to your new cousin. Florence dear, this is the real Grant Ilden."

Poor Grant's face was a study of bewilderment as he acknowledged the introduction. On one point at least his fierce denunciation of a moment before had been proved unjustifiable. There was no doubting the friendliness of the two girls. And he had accused Catherine of a jealous hatred of her rival. His face, that had been flushed, turned pale.

But it was the only outward sign that he gave of the sudden chill doubt of himself which had come to frighten him.

"And why the real Grant Ilden?" he asked, his tone polite and formal.

"That is a matter for Percival to explain," said Catherine with an animation which she tried in vain to control for Florence's sake. "But the time has come to tell you everything, now that we are depending upon your help."

"All the help that I can give is at your service," he said as she led the way back to the room from which they had come, and he listened in silence while Catherine ran hurriedly through the whole story of Despard's pursuit of Ilden, together with the recently-discovered explanation of his enmity, which showed beyond doubt that it was misplaced.

It was the story which she had been very anxious to share with him from the first moment when Ilden's account of the attempts on his life had made her eager for a confidant with whom to share her anxiety. But George, firm in his theory that his enemy was a member of the family, had bound her to secrecy. Now his theory was proved wrong, and the position was too serious to stand upon a merely theoretical point of honour. Catherine welcomed a new liberty, and told her story, not without a pleasant sense that it was making Grant very much ashamed of his accusations. Not that she made the slightest reference to them, or made any direct or apparent effort to meet them. But she confessed her mad suspicion against Lady Ilden, and turned to her to thank her again for the readiness with which it had been forgiven.

Grant's face became more and more strained as he listened, until Cathie felt quite sorry for him.

But, when she had finished, it was only of George's danger that he spoke, justifying her reliance upon him by his suggestions.

There was just a probability, he thought, that Ilden might have changed his mind after all and returned to Sydenham. They might, at least, wire to him there and inquire. It would be as well, too, to wire to Lochtarry, on the vague chance that he might actually have decided to go there and have taken Percival into his confidence, improbable as it appeared.

Grant was loth to believe his brother a complete scoundrel, in spite of the evidence which Percival had given him throughout his life. For himself, Grant proposed to make inquires along the line, in the hope of discovering at what point Ilden had left the train which Catherine herself saw him enter.

It was not till he was starting, and Cathie was left for a moment alone with him in the hall, that his eyes dared to meet hers.

Digitized by Google

"Can you ever forgive me?" he said, deeply, and Cathie managed to look judicial, although her heart was beating quickly.

"I do not think you realise yet how much there is to forgive," she said gravely.

"I realise that I have acted abominably. I ought to have known that you, the best woman in the world, could not have acted as I was mad enough to think."

"Despite my infatuation for cousin George?" she asked, coldly; and Grant hesitated, biting his lip.

Did she expect him to pretend that she was not in love with Ilden? He could not perjure himself, and Cathie took pity on his confusion.

"There is one more thing that I think I ought to tell you, after the horrible things that you have said," she proceeded severely. "I do not think that cousin George would mind now that he has found a perfect wife and realised how foolish it would have been to marry for convenience. But the day before he met Florence he asked me to be his wife. I refused because I did not think it right to marry one for whom I could feel only friendship."

Grant's face had flushed.

"You refused him!" he repeated, too surprised to quite conceal the incredulity in his voice, and Cathie's brow contracted.

"Forgive me," he said quickly, "I have been a jealous fool. I see it now that it is too late for you ever to forgive what I have said."

His tone was sufficiently penitent now to justify her in relaxing a little of her severity.

"I will forgive you," she said, "when you have found cousin George."

Something in the tone made it seem as though she had promised more than he had asked, more than he could ever allow himself to ask, unless the reading of his father's will on the next day fulfilled the hopes that he was building on it.

He raised her hand to his lips and kissed it with an intensity that thrilled and almost frightened her, and then without a word turned to leave the house and begin his quest.

His heart beat high with a hope that was almost pain. To know that Catherine Hay was free to be won, to dream that she might even now care for him, and not to know whether his father's will would put it in his power to try and win her.

The doubt tortured him, mingling its bitterness with the sweetness or what she had told him, and he put the thought of her away resolutely. She had demanded a service of him, and he gave all his mind to its fulfilment.

But as he passed from telegraph office to railway station and from one station to another, making inquiries everywhere, a question seemed to ring monotonously in his head not to be silenced: Shall I ever be able to ask her? Shall I ever be able to ask her?

At Shipton Gate his repeated inquiry met for the first time with success. The station-master recognised his description of Ilden without hesitation, and was sure that he had alighted there on the previous morning. He was equally sure that the gentleman had not returned to the station, and Grant wired off to the Castle where the two girls waited in suspense, Florence building her hopes on an answer from Sydenham which never came.

They started for Shipton Gate by the next train.

An Unjust Will.

It was not until the body of Rupert Ilden had been laid in the family vault without any sign of George's appearance that hope died finally in the heart of the seekers.

Catherine recalled how determined he had been to let no thought of his own danger interfere with the duty he owed his uncle.

(Continued on next page.)

For those Exposed to the Weather.

EFFECTS OF COLD AND WET ON THE SYSTEM.

Out-door workers, and those whose occupations necessitate their spending a good deal of time in the open air, should take steps to fortify their systems against bad results. Cold and wet throw extra work upon the internal organs, and liver chill, piles, and rheumatism are often contracted during the winter season.

One of the best-known figures on the high road from Breadsall to Derby was Mrs. Caroline Bennett, of the Mill Farm, Breadsall. Morning after morning, through sleet, or rain, or snow, she drove to the county town with the milk. One day she was missed, and an enquiry showed that she had contracted a severe chill which had attacked her liver and compelled her to keep to her bed. That other ailment which commonly results from cold and wet — piles — also affected her, and had it not been for Charles Forde's Bile Beans the results would doubtless have been most serious.

"I suffered terribly for three or four months," says Mrs. Bennett, "the piles being so painful and the liver complaint taking all power to fight against pain out of me. I could not walk, being so weak, and I was getting worse and worse no matter what medicine I took, when a relative advised me to try Chas. Forde's Bile Beans.

"I soon found out the worth of them. They commenced to do me good after I had taken the first dose. In a week or two the piles disappeared, and as I continued taking Bile Beans, the liver disorder I had suffered from ceased. It has now left my system completely, and I am as well and strong as ever. I shall always feel grateful to Bile Beans, and would advise those who suffer as I did to give them a fair trial."

All chemists stock Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, or they may be obtained post free for 1/1½ or 2/9 per box from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross St., London, E.C. They fortify the system against winter's trying weather, and cure liver chills, piles, rheumatism, headache, digestive disorders, and constipation. Avoid imitations.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED); absolutely pure: no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free. supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Digitized by Google

Percival too, who stuck staunchly to his story that Ilden had told him he was going to Scotland and denied as stoutly having given Lady Ilden any name but his own, made no secret of the fact that his cousin had promised distinctly to be present at the ceremony.

As a matter of fact he looked for his appearance there with considerable anxiety, and as the funeral cortège returned to the house felt inclined to congratulate himself that he was a decided step nearer to the Barony of Ilden than he had been two days earlier.

"Ilden is one of those fools who make much of a promise," he said to himself, "and if he were alive he would be here."

It was the thought which, differently expressed in Catherine's mind, forbade her even to speak of hope any longer to the dry-eyed woman at her side whom she had learnt to love, and who seemed to depend upon her so completely.

The remembrance of George's promise had brought the two as a last hope to Mordenhale, where they watched the last scene in the old-fashioned churchyard without joining the mourners. But the figure for which they watched did not appear to join the little group round the grave.

It was a reward perhaps for the lack of any human sympathy or emotion which the Honourable Rupert had shown during his life that so little personal thought of him was in the minds of those who paid to his body the last outward tribute of respect.

His brother was thinking uneasily of the chances of his own death, and impatiently waiting for the time when the ceremony would be over and he could drown his uneasiness in a debauch that would only bring the death he feared more quickly.

Percival was patently nervous and restless, and could not keep his glance from wandering round the churchyard. Sir Charles Barton showed a more perfect decorum outwardly, while he calculated for the hundredth time how much his wife was likely to benefit pecuniarily by her father's death.

And even Grant, although he was the sincerest mourner present, had received from the man who was dead too little of sympathy or affection to make his sense of loss conquer the anxieties which filled his mind.

He could not forget either, that the fate of his cousin was still unsolved, or that the next hour would decide whether he was a beggar—his interests, ignored as they had always been for the benefit of his brother—or the possessor of an income, modest enough, but sufficient perhaps to justify him in asking for the hand of the woman he loved without feeling disgraced by her wealth.

His suspense increased as they wended their way back to the rambling old house close by. It was indeed only a stone's-throw from the churchyard, from which its grounds were separated only by a narrow coppice.

The nearest cut was by a path through the coppice, but the mourners went round by the road, Grant with his eyes moodily cast on the ground, and his mind full of anticipative misgivings.

Sir Charles, walking at his side, tried to enter into conversation.

"I understand from your brother that your poor father made a new will at the Hall just before the end. It seems strange to me that Jane should have known nothing of the fact. I suppose that you did?"

"No," said Grant gloomily. "My father did not take me into his confidence at all. At the end especially he seemed to have a prejudice against me, and only cared for Percy to be with him."

The remembrance did not add to his hopefulness. He had felt at the time that his brother was intriguing against him for some purpose of his own. If his father had really made a new will at his instigation, the purpose was likely to be made patent now.

At the time he had scarcely cared. Money had seemed to matter so little when he believed that Catherine was in love with Ilden. Now he could be indifferent no longer; but whatever his father had done at Percival's instigation had been done irretrievably.

He walked onward with downcast eyes again, and did not notice, as he might have done had he turned just before entering the house, that Catherine was hastening after him at her utmost speed, distractedly seeking his assistance.

It was to Grant that her thoughts had instantly flown when the need presented itself; but it was too urgent for her to follow him. Some of the servants following the chief mourners had stopped, and Catherine appealed to them excitedly.

"Despard, the man who tried to kill Lord Ilden, is hiding in the coppice. Lady Ilden has followed him. I want you to come at once to her assistance!"

The story of the midnight intruder at Pennybrook Hall, for whose recapture Mr. Jasper had offered a reward, had already been carried from Pennybrook to Mordenhale, and Cathie's summons caused as much excitement as she could have desired. A little crowd followed her back to the point in the coppice where Florence had caught sight of Guy Despard's haggard face watching the mourners as they moved away from the churchyard.

"I must see him and make him tell me what he has done," Florence had cried, and Catherine was already inclined to regret the decision which had made her hasten for assistance instead of accompanying her; for in the coppice path was no sign either of the desperado or the brave girl who had gone alone in pursuit. The little party spread itself out among the trees in a vain search.

But in the house nothing was known as yet of this new sensation which had made the ordinary excitement of a funeral insignificant by comparison.

In the gloomy dining-room Mr. Murgatroyd was unfolding the last will and testament of the man who had just been laid in the grave, a will drawn up and signed only two days before his death.

Its reading was a matter of only a few minutes. For the will itself was a short and simple one. Apart from a trifling bequest to his daughter, Lady Barton, and an annuity of a hundred pounds a year to his second son, Grant, the dead man had left everything to his elder son and heir.

To Grant it seemed only a moment from their return to the house before it was all over, and he realised that his worst fears were fulfilled. His father had been as unjust in death as he had been in life, and had left him a pauper.

He rose dizzily, his voice breaking the silence that had fallen on the room.

"There is no mention made of my mother's money. It was understood that that should be mine on my father's death."

Mr. Murgatroyd rubbed his fat little hands together.

"If such an understanding existed, it is one to which my late client has not chosen to give effect. His late wife's fortune was left entirely to his disposal. His disposal of it which is

Digitized by Google

SATISFY YOURSELF

OF THE SPLENDID QUALITIES OF

H. SAMUEL'S FAMOUS "ACME" LEVER

BEFORE COMPLETING PURCHASE. H. SAMUEL ASKS YOU TO WEAR IT FOR SEVEN DAYS FREE!

SEND TO-DAY A P.O.O. FOR 5/- ONLY

Solid Silver Cases, fine 3-plate movement, jewelled, dust and damp proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Warranted for 7 years. Price 25s. Full amount returned if any dissatisfaction.

and receive the Watch by return. If you like it, as you undoubtedly will, send on balance, 20/-, and receive H. Samuel's Bonus Free Gift. If you return the watch you get your deposit back in full.

A SOLID HALL-MARKED SILVER ALBERT FREE!

to all who remit full amount, 25/-, with order.

BUY YOUR CHRISTMAS GIFTS DIRECT.

SEND A POST-CARD AT ONCE FOR THE GREAT FREE BARGAIN ALBUM.

Literally brings the Factory to your Fireside. Contains nearly 200 Pages, over 3,000 Engravings of Watches, Alarm Clocks, 16; Gold Gem Rings, 3/6; Gold Brooches, 2/9. Cutlery Plate, Silverware, Fancy and Leather Goods, Musical Instruments, &c., and all the Season's Novelties.

FACTORY PRICES. HALF SAVED. FREE BY RETURN MAIL TO ANY ADDRESS.

VALUABLE FREE PRIZES TO ALL BUYERS.

H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, MARKET STREET, MANCHESTER.

KSR · KSR · KSR ·

noluded in the document before us, is all that has ogal force. It is open, of course, to your brother, the residuary legatee, to give what effect he wishes to any private wish or understanding that is not mentioned here."

Grant smiled bitterly. To appeal to the generosity of his brother! That would be hopeless indeed.

But the thought of Catherine, which had nerved him to make the protest, might even have urged him to the hopeless appeal if Percival's face had not answered it already.

He turned upon him with a sudden outburst of anger.

"This is your doing," he cried. "My father would never have been so unjust."

"That is an opinion which I must indorse," said Sir Charles, who till now had been speechless with indignation at the bequest made to his wife. "When the will is so extraordinary in character, so inconsistent with those deep ties of affection which connected my poor father-in-law with his younger children, I must protest with Grant that there is prima-facie evidence in support of his theory that undue influence has been used to affect poor Mr. Ilden's mind at the last."

But Grant did not wait to take part in the wordy wrangle that followed. The thing was irretrievable. Henceforth he had no home and no brother. He must go out into the world, a wanderer, and he walked abruptly from the room to pack up his few belongings, leaving the irate baronet to fight his own battle, a battle doomed at the outset.

Percival was smiling with a consciousness of his triumph and its security.

"I cannot see how anybody can call the will extraordinary," he said indolently "My father was naturally anxious that Mordenhale should be kept up as it ought to be, and knew that such a thing would be impossible if he squandered among you all the income which he himself found barely sufficient for the purpose. I do not pretend that there has been any personal preference in the matter. If I had been the second son I should have been in Grant's position. If I die without an heir he will be in mine."

"And in any case your sister's interests are totally ignored," said Charles, hotly. "I protest that there has been undue influence brought to bear on my father-in-law."

Percival smiled complacently.

"This is scarcely the place to discuss the question," he said, rising. "If you care to carry it into a court of law, I can trust the defence of the will to Mr. Murgatroyd. I myself am leaving England, as you know, and start immediately. So I am afraid that I must leave the discussion, if you want it here, to Mr. Murgatroyd, and your entertainment to my uncle, who has kindly promised to act as host for me while I make my final preparations."

He left the room as he spoke, with a complacent smile on his handsome, wicked face, which faded away abruptly as he reached the hall; for entering through the doorway was the man whom he had almost felt justified in looking upon as dead and removed from the path of his ambition.

(The conclusion of this story will appear in next Tuesday's issue.)

Jack: "It's all over. I'm a cooked goose." Tom; "Wouldn't she have you?" Jack: "Confound it, no. Cool as a cucumber about it." Tom: "Any chance of—er—her exercising woman's peculiar prerogative?" Jack; "Changing her mind? Not a bit." Tom: "I suppose, too, you had planned to buy her a ring if she'd have you?" Jack: "Yes, I suppose so." Tom: "Had your money all saved up for it, hadn't you?" Jack: "I should say so. Had £10 all ready." Tom: "Ah, yes. I say, Jack——" Jack: "Well?" Tom: "You—er—couldn't lend me—er—a fiver till you find some girl who will have you, could you?"

Pedlar: "Is the lady of the house in?" Mr. Newlywed: "Yes; but there isn't a thing in the wide world we want." Pedlar: "All right, sir; I'll call again when the honeymoon is over."

Fat Lady: "I am going to ride on one of the donkeys, and will pay for one for you if you like to accompany me." Small Boy: "Thankee, mum, but I'd rather sit here and laugh."

"Goodluck has had his salary raised; was it for extra work?" "Yes. He always listens when the proprietor tells his baby's smart sayings."

Mr. N. Peck: "I think if anyone is entitled to a pension it's me." Mudge: "You were never in war, were you?" Mr. N. Peck: "No, but the fellow my wife was engaged to got killed at El Teb."

"Dear me!" cried the nurse. "The baby has swallowed my railway ticket. What shall I do?" "Go and buy another right away," returned the mother. "I'm not going to have the baby snipped."

Susy is a young lady of five years and also of a very difficult disposition. The other day a visitor at her father's house found Susy weeping bitterly in the corner. "Why, what are you crying about?" she was asked. "'Cause all my b-brothers and sisters have a h-holiday, and I don't have ny. Boohoo!" "And why don't you have any holiday?" "Cause I—I don't go to school yet!"

POULTRY KEEPING.

By F. E. WILSON.

Contributor to "Poultry," etc.

Price 1s., Post-free 1s. 2d.

A USEFUL BOOK.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send "Poultry Keeping." I inclose 1s. 2d.
" " "Etiquette for Men." " " 1s. 2d

Name .....

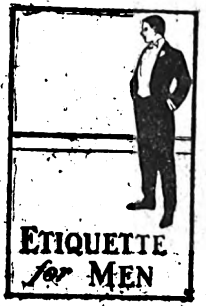
Address .....

ETIQUETTE FOR MEN.

By F. V. HOWARD.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 1s., Post Free 1s. 2d.

This volume gives in a simple style full and accurate directions for the due observance of modern etiquette amongst men.



Digitized by Google

Many will tell you that "Tatcho" is the only remedy they have found serviceable after years of trying.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back. Puts the hair right. Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

The Hon. Mrs. GORDON—

"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit fr. m 'Tatcho.'—3 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, August 28th, 1902."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account. — Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find 'Tatcho' excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

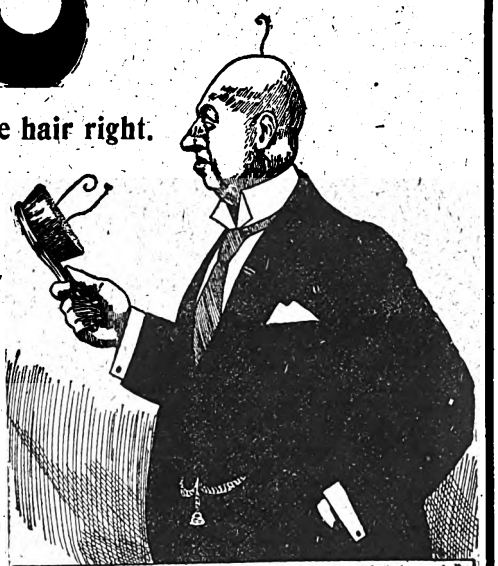
"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Colonel PERRY—

"My dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."



A hair on the Head, is worth two in the brush.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the World, in Bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

A 4/6 full size Trial Bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. or send 2d. in stamps for details.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 105 Oxford Street, London, W.

Order E. & T. PINK'S JAM

Undoubtedly the Best.

PURE.

No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

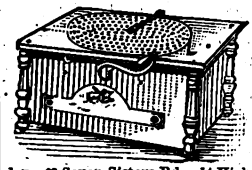
LADIES ONLY

Need read this and you will afterwards always look smart, and your hair keep beautifully curly and wavy.

WAVINE. A NEW HAIR WAVING AND CURLING FLUID.

Invaluable for keeping the hair in wave or curl, is not affected by damp or wet weather. Unlike other preparations, it imparts a brilliant gloss, is not sticky or greasy, and has a delightfully refreshing perfume, is inexpensive, and acts as a tonic. Can be used on the most delicate hair. Send for full-size sample bottle direct from manufacturers, post free, by sending P.O. for 1/1½. WAVINE CO., 19 Park Street, Highbury, London, N.

HAND-ORGANS from 20s



Made in 3 sizes, ebony and gold case. With 6 metal tunes. Full organ tone. Plays songs, hymns, dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, can be paid 4s. monthly. Write for terms, price list and tunes. ATLAS CO., 184a High St., Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Rd.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

PHONOGRAPHS, 10/6 MUSICAL ALBUMS, 10/6.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s 1½d. tins everywhere.

IS YOUR BIRTHDAY THIS WEEK?

IF SO, READ THE BIRTHDAY COLUMN.

If further information is desired, send for particulars to "ASTURAL," 52 Station Parade Harrogate.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 465.)

PAPER PATTERN

of a

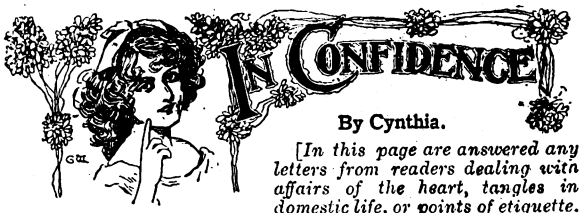
GIRL'S COAT

14—16.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google



By Cynthia.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must in future be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

A Word in Advance.

Naturally before you accept me as your adviser in place of Miss Morris, you will like to have a word or two from me as to the lines on which I am going to try and carry on her work. First, let me say there are very few things on which I do not share the views of Miss Morris. Like her, I shall not try to sit in judgment on anyone, but hope to find myself in sympathy with all my clients, whom I shall try and advise from a human, and not a judicial point of view. Nobody need be afraid to write to me out of fear that I shall think them foolish. We are all foolish in some form or another, and, oftener than not, in matters of the heart. Though a woman, do not let that fact prevent those of the opposite sex, if they feel disposed, from writing to me. I am no enthusiast about "Woman's Rights," and shall never attempt to champion one sex against the other.

* * * *

Further, I hope to have among my clients, not only young unmarried couples, but also married ones. Love does not end with matrimony, but only enters on a new phase. Any troubles between married people, therefore, will have my earnest attention. If you have any puzzling question about etiquette, or want a little advice as to how to behave under strange circumstances, I will try and counsel you how I should act myself were I in your position. So let me, before entering on my duties, hope that, as in the case of Miss Morris, I and my readers will soon become fast friends, and know each other as well as is possible through the medium of cold print.

❦❦❦

A Changeable Girl.

"R. E. G." met a girl three years ago, but she told him she could not like him as he wished her to. The other day he met her again. She now confesses that she likes "R. E. G." much more than she did. However, "R. E. G." has his doubts. He thinks that if anybody has once taken a dislike to another, they can never really alter that sentiment however they try. He asks me is it so with girls?

* * * *

No, it is not so, "R. E. G." Three years ago you may have had mannerisms which did not appeal to the girl. Further, she may have then had different ideas of men to those she at present holds. Time brings great changes. On her meeting you again, she may have perceived something about you which did not originally strike her, and quite possibly may have completely changed her views. I have known of scores of cases of persons ultimately learning to grow very fond of those whom they have once disliked. As has been pointed out in Pearson's Weekly, what we call "dislike" is only too often another name for unconscious love. To instantly "like" a person often means that their attractiveness is only on the surface, and is never likely to go deeper. To "dislike" them often means that one does not understand them. Further acquaintance brings out points in their character which one does not observe at first. So do not let any theory you may entertain stand in the way of your intimacy with this girl.

A Unique Case.

"W. L. W."—Your case is extraordinary. I have every sympathy with you, as I fear you are the victim of a wrong train of thought. I should imagine you have never had a very extensive acquaintance with the opposite sex. Too many men shut themselves off from women solely out of nervousness and reserve. Continued absence of meeting with girls makes many men delude themselves that they are women-haters, whereas all that is really wrong with them is this shyness. Let me advise you to try your hardest to meet as many women as you can. They will bring out many good qualities which your aloofness hides from view. I do not prophecy that you will readily meet the woman of your heart, as you are very likely a man of a distinct temperament. But continued meetings with women will enable you to form a right judgment as to which type of the sex is most in sympathy with you.

❦❦❦

Boy and Girl Love.

"Dick" is eighteen, and is in love with a very attractive girl of seventeen. Naturally, he is too young to become engaged to her, but, at the same time, wishes to have some understanding with her. They have, therefore, arranged that, if they continue to know each other in four or five years' time, they will resume the intimacy. Their parents do not know of this, and "Dick" asks me if it is his duty to tell them.

* * * *

You are very sensible, "Dick," to wait until you are in a position to become engaged, and your arrangement is, I think, the best you could make. Of course, as neither of you are in any way bound to each other, I do not see that you need reveal your understanding to your parents unless you think necessary. You should convey to her parents that you would like their consent to your friendship with their daughter, and if they are willing that you should meet each other you need not reveal anything about an understanding until it becomes necessary. There is nothing at all unusual in friendships between boys and girls (if you will excuse the expression), and I believe most parents prefer their daughters to be in the society of those of their own age than older and often less sincere suitors.

❦❦❦

A Photo Question.

"L. M." (Johannesburg) writes: "Would it be etiquette for me to send a photo to a gentleman friend whom I have known for six months? He asked me for one before he went away, but I had not one to give him. Then he asked me to send it to him.

* * * *

It all depends on your relationship with the gentleman friend. If he is a chance acquaintance, it is not usual for a girl to send her photograph. If you have promised to do so, of course, send it, but if not I should wait until you know more of the gentleman. If you have been very friendly with him, there can be no harm in an exchange of photos.

❦❦❦

See a Doctor.

Lil is constantly troubled with styes in her eyes, and has tried many remedies without result. Can I recommend anything? Well, Lil, styes in the eye are only an outward sign of disordered blood. Certain persons are more liable to them than others. If you have one only occasionally, the cure recommended is bathing at intervals with hot water until the stye bursts. But if you are very much the victim of them, you should ask your doctor to prescribe medicine which will put your system in order. In your case I recommend the latter. The doctor's fee is often an economy, seeing what bad results spring from neglecting oneself.

Printed by Horace Cox Brem's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HYPNOTISM

Its Increasing Use in Daily Life, by English People.

No Longer a Secret Art, But Now In the Hands of Thousands.

A London Publishing House Distributing Free Books on Hypnotism.

Some Strange Secrets of Personal Influence Laid Bare.

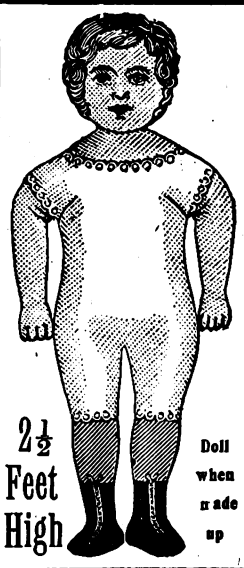
The London office of a well-known publishing house is creating a deal of surprised interest here in the subject of hypnotism and allied science by the novel method of giving away books absolutely free. By merely writing to the Psychic Research Publishing Company, Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C., you can, according to their advertisement, receive by return post a most remarkable, fascinating, and instructive illustrated book called "The Power Within." This book and accompanying literature contain some most startling information, setting forth not only how to set about to learn hypnotism at your own home, but revealing the fact that this mysterious art is now actually being used to advantage by English people in daily life.

According to the publishers, the aim of this startling little free book is to answer such questions as occur to all interested in the mysterious relation between mind and matter.

Such questions as these, for instance:—Can I learn how to hypnotise? Why is the art not more widely known? Just how should I set about it to learn at home, and practise it? Is instantaneous hypnotism possible? What is "personal magnetism," and how is it acquired? What is the mysterious secret of the wonderful success and influence of certain people who seem most ordinary in other ways? Is there really a scientific mode of life or thought which attracts health, success, and happiness? Is it possible to thus radically change one's whole life in a few days, as many claim to have done? Is it true that humanity in general is, in a sense, hypnotised by conventionality and thus blinded to splendid opportunities for success and happiness which lie on every hand? What can I do to arouse myself from this "hypnosis of custom," and rise to the attainments which my natural ability would warrant? What must I do to become a hypnotist? To develop a magnetic, attractive, forceful character? To acquire courage, ambition, cheerfulness? To kill fear and worry? To make myself a source of happiness and inspiration to my friends?

The reader will readily see that a book, especially a free book, dealing with such vitally interesting subjects as these is arousing a lively demand, and the edition provided by the Company is being rapidly exhausted. To obtain this book, which is entitled "The Power Within," it is only necessary to send your plainly written name and address, enclosing a penny stamp for return postage, to the Psychic Research Company (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C.

As the nature of the contents of this book is of such vital interest and importance to many, it is requested that no one write out of mere curiosity. It is desired to supply the book only to those having a genuine wish to be informed on these subjects.



LIFE-SIZE DOLL FREE!

"Baby's Clothes will now fit Dollie."

GIRLS can get this beautiful Life-size Doll absolutely free for selling only ten packages of the Electric Polishing Fabric, at 6d. a package Something new for cleaning and polishing Jewellery, Silver Ware, &c., without the use of powder, paste, or liquid. Sells at sight. Write to day, and we will send you the Fabric post paid. When sold send us the money (5s.) and we will send you post free this Life-size Doll, which is 2½ft. high, and can wear baby's clothes. When stuffed, this doll is an exact reproduction in fast colours of a hand-painted French creation, done on extra-heavy cloth that will not tear. The workmanship is perfect, the colour effects the very finest. The doll is intended to be stuffed. It is this century's model of the old-fashioned Rag Doll that Grandma used to make and would make Grandma open her eyes in wonder. Dollie is printed with Golden Hair, Rosy Cheeks, Brown Eyes, Kid-Coloured Body, Red Stockings, Black Shoes, and will stand alone. If Mamma can donate one of baby's out-grown dresses that her little daughter can put on and off, button and unbutton to her heart's desire, the Life-size Doll will live in that child's memory long after childhood's days have passed. If you do not care to sell our goods we will send the Doll postfree, upon receipt of 2s. These dolls are sold all the year round. A single packet of SHY-NALL sent post paid on receipt of 6d. ddress:

SHY-NALL,

Doll when made up

SHY-NALL CHEMICAL CO. (Doll Dept. 33N), 75, Queen Victoria St., London, E.C.

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,
Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

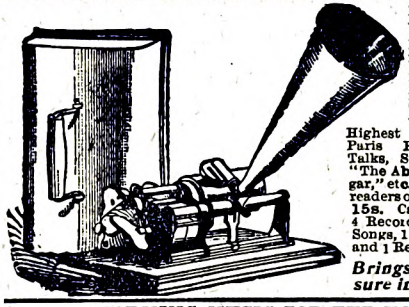
IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

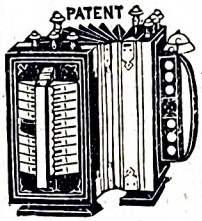
CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories.

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1902, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

IF

ALL BRITISH HOUSEWIVES purchased "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH in preference to Foreign Metal Polishes, it would enable us to give employment to a larger number of British workpeople. We manufacture

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

in England; also make all our own Tins, Cardboard Boxes, &c.

DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES.

Most of these set up Acid, and are of a very "sticky" nature, thus causing more labour in polishing. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH spreads evenly over the surface of the metal, can be easily removed, and produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

It is also guaranteed FREE FROM ACID, POISON, OR GRIT.

MANUFACTURERS:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

"MENE"

Ladies say these Towels are superior to all other makes for cleanliness, comfort, and economy. May be obtained from all Under clothing Houses and Chemists, or 2 doz. No. 1, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 3, 1/6; post free. No. 2, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 1 sent post free to any lady mentioning this paper. A Free Sample of

SANITARY TOWEL FOR LADIES.

MISS HAYNES, 55 Fann St., London, E.C.

Sole Proprietors: ROBINSON & SONS Ltd., CHESTERFIELD.

Best FOOD FOR Babies

Contains all the constituents of Wheat (Nature's Model Food).

The Lancet says: "We hope it will take the place of the purely starchy foods now in use."

CHAPMAN'S ENTIRE WHEAT FOOD

A splendid article of diet for children, and invaluable for Invalids.

Sole Proprietors: Chapman's Food Co., Battersea, S.W.

6d. 1/- & 3/- TINS of all Chemists.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

"TEMPUS FUGIT."

BUY A MAXEY WATCH

and always have Correct Time.

'TIS THE WATCH.

DEPOSIT.	PRICE.	1/3
5/-	50 -	PER WEEK.

DESCRIPTION.—It is a new English Lever, containing all the latest improvements, of highest possible finish, thoroughly accurate and efficient, entirely English work throughout, compensated chronometer balance, hard brass plates and screwed pillars, hairspring hardened and tempered, strong and carefully tempered mainspring, massive solid silver case, Government hall-marked throughout, and hard enamel dial. Fullest satisfaction guaranteed.

TERMS.—Send 5s. deposit and we will then forward one at once, carriage paid. The price is only 50s., and you pay 2s. 6d. fortnightly until paid for. If however you wish to pay Cash, the price is but 42s. 6d. if paid within one month.

Write for Catalogue of Furniture.

AGENTS WANTED.

MAXEY & Co., Meadow Street, SHEFFIELD.

Short Stories.

No. 729.
Dec. 20, 1902.

CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER.

2D.

(A Pathetic Incident from our Splendid Christmas Story, "Sylvia's Home-coming." See inside.)

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Costumes

THE WINTER . 'ELEGANT' PARCEL.

Lady's .... Complete Outfit. 36/-

CONTAINS:

Pretty Flannelette Blouse with Velvet Collar and Cuffs, Black Costume Skirt with deep fashionable flounce and 9 rows of braiding, Pair Model Corsets, very Durable Coloured Moreen Underskirt, Pair Black Cashmere Hose, Cream Lace Scarf, and Black Silk Shaped Belt with Clasp.

TERMS.

Send only 6s. with order, and if the parcel meets with entire approval, complete the purchase in five more monthly payments of 6s. each. If you are not PERFECTLY SATISFIED, return the goods and your deposit will be refunded.

Important. When ordering please state Length of Dress Skirt in front from below waist band, also size of corsets worn, or waist measurement over Dress.

Please send a Post Card for our No. 8 CATALOGUE of Drapery, Costumes, Capes, Jackets, Mantles, Boots and Shoes, etc., etc. Sent to your address Free on receipt of Post Card.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No Risk. ... Good Commission.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

IS YOUR BIRTHDAY THIS WEEK?

IF SO, READ THE BIRTHDAY COLUMN.

If further information is desired, send for particulars to "ASTUREL," 52 Station Parade Harrogate.

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. (or send 2d. in stamps for details.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Guaranteed 4 years. Will work by hand or treadle. To ensure satisfaction, machine sent on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL; if cleared, can be paid 5/- Monthly. Write for terms, designs, and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

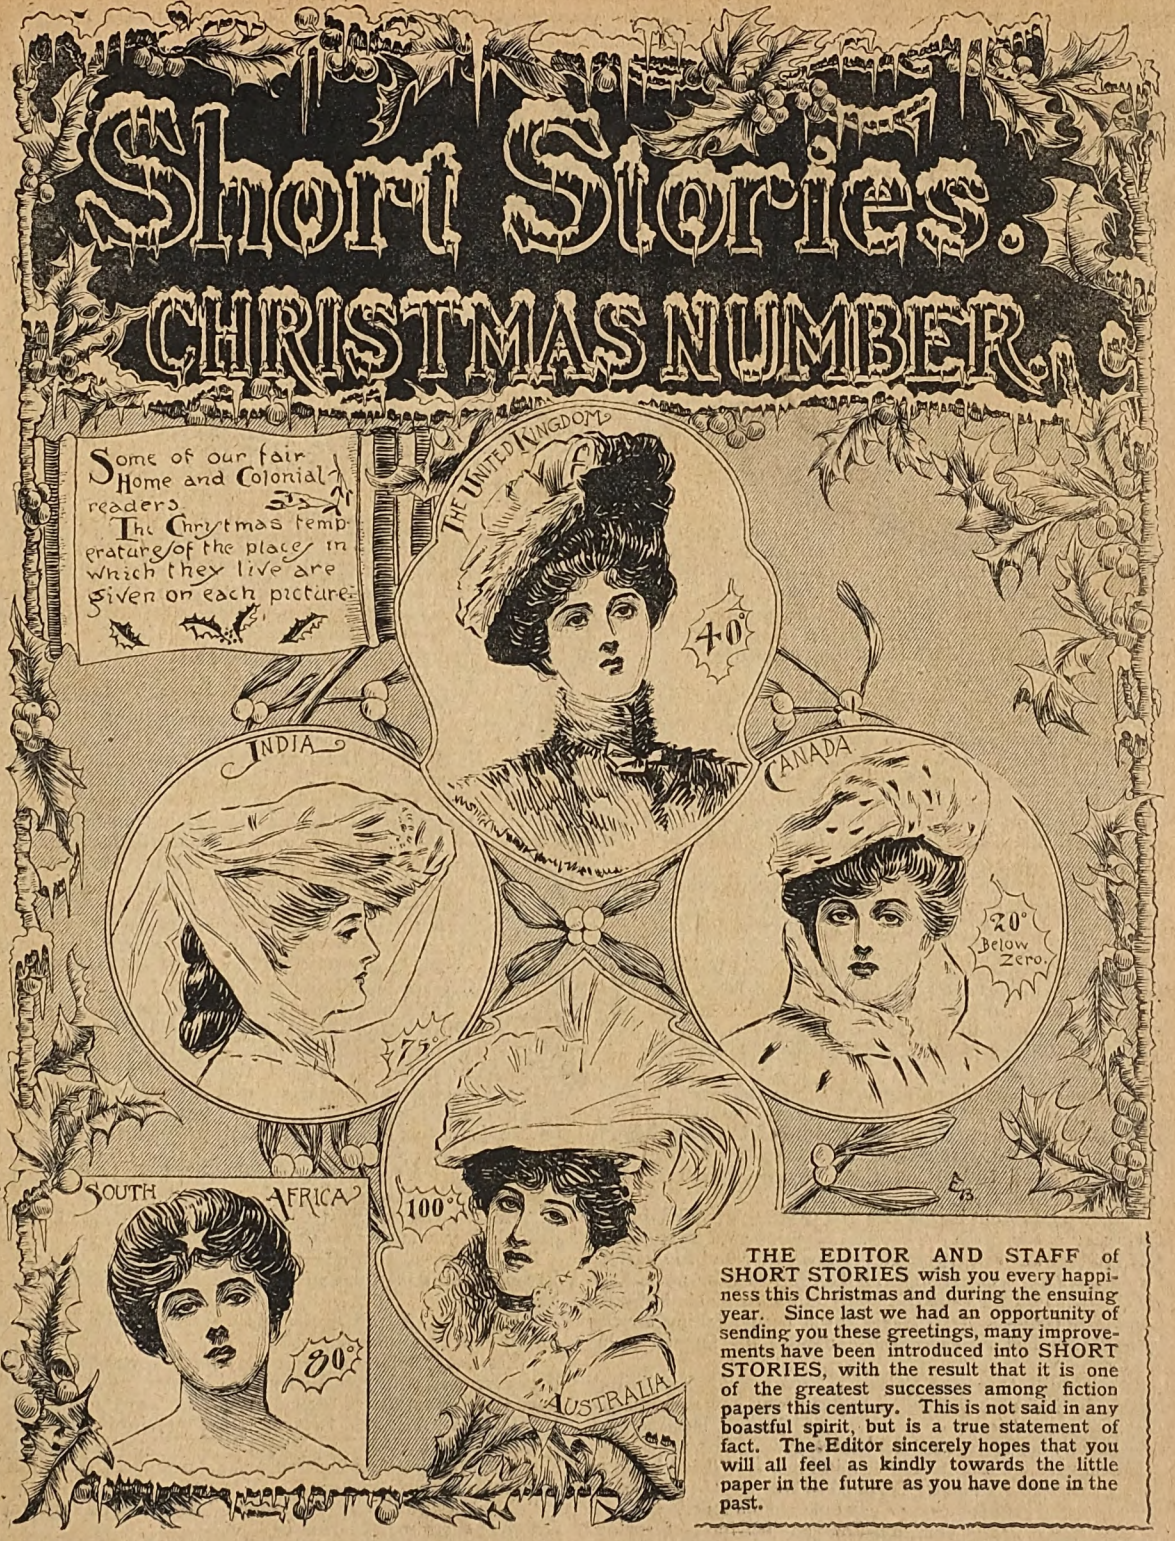
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Short Stories.

CHRISTMAS NUMBER.



THE EDITOR AND STAFF of SHORT STORIES wish you every happiness this Christmas and during the ensuing year. Since last we had an opportunity of sending you these greetings, many improvements have been introduced into SHORT STORIES, with the result that it is one of the greatest successes among fiction papers this century. This is not said in any boastful spirit, but is a true statement of fact. The Editor sincerely hopes that you will all feel as kindly towards the little paper in the future as you have done in the past.

No. 729.] TWOPENCE. [Dec. 20, 1902.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

SYLVIA'S HOME-COMING.

A Tale of Two Christmas Eves.

On the Christmas Eve when their baby came to them there could not have been found in the length and breadth of England a happier couple than Miles Denver and Sylvia his wife; and, of course, they were perfectly positive that never since the beginning of the world had there been so adorable, so wonderful a baby as the wee thing with the crumpled rose-leaf face who lay in Sylvia's arms!

"I never thought anybody could be so exquisitely happy," the young mother whispered, looking up into her husband's face with shining eyes. "I don't feel as if I should ever know the meaning of the word unhappiness again, now that I have got—this," and she pressed her lips to the soft, downy head upon her arm, "this—and you," she added, putting out her free hand to Miles and drawing him down towards her.

"Are you happy, too, Miles?"

Was there just a note of wistfulness in her voice? Just a shadow of anxiety in her sweet eyes? If so, both were dispelled by the young husband's eager reply and impetuous kiss.

"I should rather think I was happy," he answered boyishly. "I never thought a baby could be such a—such a jolly interesting sort of thing; and really, Sylvia, she seems to like me, she's gripping hold of my finger like mad with one of those queer little hands of hers."

And then the two happy young things laughed for sheer gladness of heart, until the nurse bustled in and hustled Miles unceremoniously out of his wife's room, to sit in his own den downstairs and dream most marvellous dreams of the future of that strange new being—his daughter!

His thoughts went back to his first meeting with Sylvia, and their early wedded life. They had been married a year and a half, and he was convinced that no man ever had so sweet, so lovely a wife. What though his family had been not a little vexed with him for selecting as the mistress of his beautiful home a nobody—a girl who had even been working for her living! He had metaphorically snapped his fingers at his family.

It was quite true that Sylvia had worked for her living; indeed, he had first met her when she was governess in the house of some friends of his own, and he had been at once attracted by her lovely face, her gentle, gracious ways.

But it was not true to call her ill-bred, and to declare—as his mother had frequently declared—that Sylvia belonged to nobodies, and that some day she would shame Miles.

"Blood will out," old Mrs. Denver was fond of saying, "bad blood as well as good. And I warn you, Miles, Sylvia's blood is probably bad, therefore beware. I never heard yet of any girl of decent family who had no relations at all."

Irritated though Miles was by his mother's words, he was fain to confess to himself that Sylvia's absence of relations of any kind or degree had struck him as strange, and sitting over the fire to-night, meditating on his new happiness, he thought again of his wife's lonely position, and wished for her sake that she could have had people of her own to be with her now.

Thinking this, he sprang suddenly to his feet.

"Thoughtless brute!" he exclaimed. "I might have suggested her having her own old-nurse instead of the creature my mother has sent to look after her. I wonder Sylvia didn't suggest Nurse Browne herself," and a puzzled frown crossed Miles' face as he remembered the affection with which Sylvia spoke of the old nurse she loved, and whom she insisted upon going to see at more or less regular intervals.

Nurse Browne lived in Surrey, and Sylvia's regular pilgrimages thither had been a source of a certain mild banter on her husband's part; but she had never allowed him to accompany her on her visits, declaring that Nurse would be terrified and overwhelmed by such an honour.

On that Christmas Eve when baby Sylvia came, Miles, sitting by the fire and calling Nurse Browne to mind, leapt, as has been said, to his feet, and repeating to himself that he was a brute, ran upstairs two steps at a time and softly re-entered his wife's room. She greeted him with a lovely smile, and held out her hand whilst the nurse advanced, frowning, from the dressing-room.

"Darling," Miles bent over Sylvia, "it has just dawned upon me what a thoughtless fool I am."

"Has it?" she laughed gently, and stroked his hand. "My dear old boy, what makes you abuse yourself?"

"Why, sweetheart, sitting down in my den by the fire, I began to think of you, and then I thought of Nurse Browne, and——"

"What?" A quiver came into Sylvia's voice, a curious intent look crept over her face.

"Yes, dear," Miles went on unheeding, "I remembered your old nurse, and your love for her, and I called myself names for never having suggested to you to have her here now that——"

"Have her here?" Sylvia's voice rose into a thin little scream. "Why, Miles, Miles!" She breathed quickly, and her eyes gleamed feverishly; an uncontrollable agitation seemed to have seized her.

"Wouldn't you like her to come?" the husband continued, a note of surprise in his voice.

"Like her to come? No, no; I mean it—is—impossible." Sylvia controlled herself by a tremendous effort, and the colour came and went upon her face. "Impossible," she repeated faintly.

Digitized by Google

My darling, I never meant to upset you so," Miles exclaimed remorsefully, "I only thought——"

"Oh, no!" she said, still speaking with big panting breaths, "I am not upset; at least, I mean—I think I was just surprised—startled. Old Nurse—is—is too old—to—to leave home."

That tremendous effort after self-control was making Sylvia very white and tired, and Miles, terrified by the result of his words, hastily summoned the wrathful nurse to his wife's side, and was turning away when Sylvia's voice said weakly,

"You—you won't send for Mrs.—for old Nurse, Miles, will you? I—she would fidget me; and I—I only want you, dear."

The smile that accompanied the words somewhat neutralised the effect of the strange, frightened look in her big blue eyes, but the whole incident left a curious impression on Miles' mind, an impression he only shook off when, on Sylvia's recovery, she herself laughed over what she called her "silly, hysterical behaviour over old Nurse."

"I was a goose," she said, clinging to Miles' arm and looking up bewitchingly into his face; "fancy my making such a fuss over poor old Nanna, as we used to call her! Only, dear, she is so old and—and fussy, and I imagined her worrying about me, and I pictured your being away all day, fetching her, and—and—it gave me the horrors."

After that Miles forget the affair altogether, or only remembered it when Sylvia went off on one of her regular visits to Mrs. Browne, visits which took up a whole day of every month. And as time slipped away the memory of it also slipped entirely from Miles' mind, not to be reawakened until the Autumn that preceded baby Sylvia's third birthday,

* * * * *

On an October morning nearly three years after her baby girl's birth, Sylvia stood looking out of her bedroom window with a troubled look on her face.

"Oh, I wish she wasn't coming! I wish she wasn't coming!" The words were uttered aloud, though there was no one to hear them. "I distrust Clara Metcalfe; she has always spied on me!"

Sylvia's blue eyes clouded. She no longer saw the loveliness of the Autumn world outside; the handsome face of her husband's cousin—the widowed Mrs. Metcalfe—danced before her vision instead, and seemed to mock her with triumphant smiles.

"It's jolly of Clara to want to come and spend a long time with us," Miles' voice exclaimed, as he entered his wife's room. "Clara and I have always been like brother and sister, and I shall like her to be with us for Christmas. She will be a companion, too, for you, darling, now that I have so much to see to at the other end of the estate."

"Yes," Sylvia said mechanically; whilst the thought of Clara's lengthy visit made her heart sink like lead. "I hope she—won't be dull here."

"Dull? Not she! Clara is never dull, she always has plenty on hand."

"Yes, plenty," mused the young wife bitterly, when Miles had vanished again. "She is always busy over other people's affairs. God grant she may not want to find——"

Her musings broke off suddenly, as she caught sight of her little daughter running across the lawn hoop in hand. Sylvia leant far out of the window to watch the child, a smile flickering over her face, a smile that fled quickly as she drew back into the room again.

"My little child!" she whispered passionately, "my little child. How could I bear it—if you ever knew—if Miles ever knew, if—— Ah, I wish Clara were not coming, I have a presentiment of evil. I feel as if a snake were coming into my house that will never leave it till she has wrecked my happiness!"

* * * * *

Clara Metcalfe sat alone in the luxurious spare bedroom at Denver Manor on the first night of her arrival there. Nearly three years had passed since she had last seen Miles and Sylvia, and during those three years her short married life abroad and the early months of her widowhood had kept her out of touch with her English relations.

During their boy and girl days, she and Miles had been—as Miles had told his wife—like brother and sister; at least, the sentiment on Miles' side had been purely brotherly; on Clara's a deeper feeling had existed, and to this fact, perhaps, was due the undoubted antagonism that existed between Miles' cousin and Miles' wife.

Clara's one previous visit, paid to the Denvers in the early days of their marriage, had left no favourable impression of the beautiful woman upon Sylvia's mind. Clara's inquisitiveness about herself, her past, her relations, had irritated the young wife; in her own mind she had designated Miles' cousin "a spy," and Clara's marriage and removal to foreign countries had produced in Sylvia a great sense of relief.

On the other hand, Clara, beneath all her outward professions of affection towards Miles' wife, hated the girl because she had won his love, and bore her a secret grudge for having dared to become his wife.

To-night, at Denver Manor, Mrs. Metcalfe looked at her own dazzling reflection in the glass, and laughed aloud.

"My poor Miles," she said, "you would have done better to make me the mistress of your house, instead of that poor, puny, silly thing with the great, frightened eyes. And what is her twopenny love worth, in comparison with mine?"

She drew herself up to her superb height and laughed again, a laugh half of scorn, half of triumph, as the light flashed upon the insolent beauty of her face, and shone upon the golden glory of her hair.

"The silly fool has found out my secret!" she went on, a dark look crossing her face. "She has found out that I love Miles. I saw it in her eyes to-night as she watched her husband's face and mine. Perhaps she has realised, too, that my love is to hers what sunlight is to moonlight; perhaps she knows that in a battle between us I must win. And—if—she—has found out my secret—I will find out hers," she added slowly, as she unclasped the diamonds from her throat. "I could swear she has a secret; I saw that, too, in her frightened eyes, and I swear I will find it out!"

* * * * *

"Dear Miles, she is so young; sweet, indeed, I grant you, but so young to have so much liberty!"

Clara's soft voice spoke the words as she and Miles paced up and down the rose garden on a November morning.

"Much liberty?" Miles looked surprised. "I don't understand, Clara. In any case, I trust my wife absolutely, but she rarely does anything without me. What do you mean?"

A perceptible hesitation followed the words, and Mrs. Metcalfe traced patterns on the path with the stick she carried.

"Miles," she said suddenly, raising her eyes candidly to his, "I can't bear to make you uneasy, or—or raise doubts in your mind, but—have you ever been with Sylvia to see that old nurse of whom she speaks?"

Such significance rang in her accents that Miles stopped dead and stared at her, a sudden recollection sweeping over him of Sylvia's strange conduct when he had suggested that Mrs. Browne might be a comfort to her.

"What do you mean, Clara?" he said sternly. "What are you trying to insinuate?"

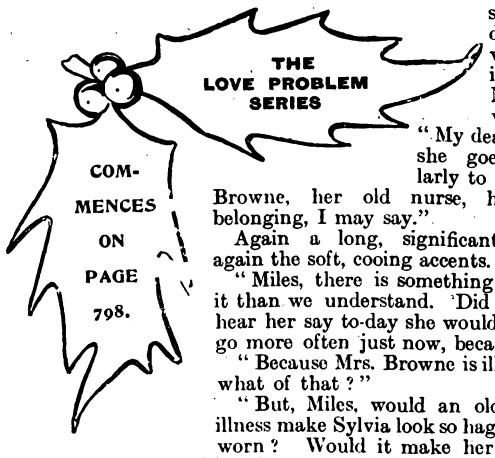
"Miles—dear Miles"—she laid a soft hand on his arm—"do not be angry. It is for Sylvia's own good and yours that I speak otherwise. It is a thankless, distasteful task, but are you sure who Sylvia goes to see on that monthly visit to Surrey?"

"Of course I am sure!" Irritation born of a tiny

THEN TURN TO PAGES 792 and 819.

WOULD YOU LIKE A Christmas Gramophone?

Digitized by Google



speck of doubt was audible in Miles' voice.

"My dear Clara, she goes regularly to see Mrs. Browne, her old nurse, her only belonging, I may say."

Again a long, significant pause, again the soft, cooing accents.

"Miles, there is something more in it than we understand. Did you not hear her say to-day she would have to go more often just now, because——"

"Because Mrs. Browne is ill! Well, what of that?"

"But, Miles, would an old nurse's illness make Sylvia look so haggard—so worn? Would it make her start at every sound? Would it bring that terrible fear and anguish into her eyes? Ah, wait—listen to me a moment! I am a woman of the world—she is not. I can see she is in some difficulty, some—some——"

"Then I will go and ask her about it, and help her!" Miles cried impetuously. "You are imagining absurdities, Clara. What difficulty could my wife ——?"

His voice dropped into silence before the strange glance in Clara's eyes.

"Go and ask her by all means," his cousin said slowly, "and by her manner when she answers you, you will be able to judge whether I am exaggerating or no. For the last week and more she has been restless, worried, anxious. The arrival of the post has excited her almost beyond control, and now she says she must go often—often—to see this Mrs. Browne. Miles, believe your old cousin who has been like your sister—something is wrong!"

Looking into her exquisite face, seeing the witchery of her eyes, hearing the shake in her lovely voice, what wonder that Miles, being a man, fell under the spell? What wonder that he listened more and more attentively to the words his cousin spoke, whilst they paced up and down the rose-garden, watched, unknown to themselves, by a white, anguished face from the window of Sylvia's room; what wonder that at last, when they turned towards the house, he had yielded to Clara's persuasion and agreed to follow a line of conduct which, in his own heart, he knew to be cowardly and mean?

That evening, after dinner, he drew Sylvia into what he called his "den," a cosy room lined with books, in which the husband and wife had spent many a happy hour together.

"Dear," he said, trying, not very successfully, to keep from his voice some of the hardness and irritation welling up in his heart, "you said to-day you must go and see your old nurse, Mrs. Browne, to-morrow, because she is ill. I have never seen her, I should like to go with you and see what can be done to alleviate the old woman's sufferings. I think I will be your escort to-morrow!"

Sylvia's face grew white, she swayed where she stood, an awful fear looked out of her eyes.

"No—no," she gasped, her hand going up to the collar of her dress, as though to loosen it. "I—you—it is impossible," and she breathed heavy, panting breaths, Miles scanning her intently the while.

"Very well," he answered with assumed carelessness, (Clara had taught her lesson well) "I didn't mean to upset you, dear."

"It—it—isn't that," she panted out. "I—I am tired to-night—it is silly," she tried to laugh. "Why should what you said have upset me? That would be absurd. Only—I don't think I could let you come to see poor Nanna—she—she is so ill—it would frighten her!"

Sylvia's eyes, still wide and terrified, searched her husband's face, but could not read the meaning of the expression there He had learnt his lesson very well indeed; Clara Metcalfe was a past mistress in the art of deceiving!

"Very well, dear," he said carelessly again, "I don't really mind. Go alone and stay with the old woman as long as you like."

And in the great relief that surged over Sylvia's soul, she forgot to note the strange look in her husband's face, the suspicion in his eyes. She even failed to observe that he left the room without giving her his customary kiss!

* * * * *

"Hush—wait! I heard her voice then!"

"I don't like this sort of thing, Clara; it is mean—it is hateful! I shall go straight up to the cottage and declare myself—and——"

"And spoil everything?"

The last voice, soft as it was, held also a note of derision.

"These things are mean and horrible, I agree, but deceit must be met by deceit! Do you intend that your wife should go on living a lie? If you wish to discover the truth, remain silent!"

Silence fell indeed over the two figures who crouched behind a high hedge that bounded a cottage garden. Miles' face was drawn and white with emotion, upon Clara's hovered a little smile of triumph that melted into sorrowful distress whenever Miles' head turned towards her.

From the cottage over the hedge came a subdued sound of voices, a man's low and deep, and a girl's, and, in the clear, sweet accents of the latter, Miles recognised his wife's! The words were inaudible at first, but presently there came the sound of an opening door, and the two watchers crouched further down behind the sheltering hedge.

Yes, it was Sylvia who issued from the cottage—the cottage to which Miles and his cousin had been directed by the porter at the station as Mrs. Browne's. Sylvia came out, her face white as death, her eyes streaming with tears, and close on her heels followed a man, tall, fair, handsome, but with disease, nay, death itself, plainly stamped upon his face.

"You will come again?" the man said, and his voice was hoarse and choked with emotion.

"Can you ask me that, Dick?" Sylvia turned and flung out her hands to him wildly. "Would I not be here always, always—if—if——"

"If you could leave your fine husband, and put up with a cottage," the words were half a laugh, half a sneer.

Miles nearly leapt from his hiding-place, but Clara held him back.

"Ah, don't, Dick, don't, don't!" Sylvia cried. "Miles is so good to me—so good! All the comforts you have are owing to him—all——"

"Are they, though?" muttered Miles with a savage oath, and Clara put her hand hastily over his mouth.

"I would come to you every day, if I could, my darling," Sylvia's voice went on. "I cannot bear to be away from you now, not for a day—not for an hour—when——" Her words ended in a storm of bitter weeping.

"My dearie, you must go now, or you'll be late," came an anxious voice from the doorway, as an old woman appeared on the scene.

"Mrs. Browne," Clara whispered.

"I am going, Nanna, I am really going." Sylvia's voice was still broken by sobs. "I wish I could stay—I wish I could stay, but I must go, or Miles——"

She broke off and suddenly flung her arms round the fair man's neck.

"Good-bye, Dick, my darling," she said, "till next week—only till next week, dear, then your own little Sylvia will come back. Take care of yourself—take care of him, Nanna—till then!" And drawing herself out of the tall man's close embrace, Sylvia passed slowly down the path and out of sight, weeping bitterly as she went.

But that evening, when she reached Denver Manor an hour later than Miles and Clara had reached it, she found a note awaiting her from her husband; she found that he and Clara and her child had left the house a quarter of an hour before her arrival.

Miles' note was very short

Digitized by Google

"I have found you out. You wish to stay with your Dick for always; you are free to do so. I never wish to see your face again."

* * * * *

It was Christmas Eve, and Baby Sylvia's third birthday, but as the child stood looking round the library, whither her nurse had brought her, a forlorn feeling stirred within her that something had gone very wrong indeed with her little world. Nothing, indeed, had seemed quite right since mummy went away—even daddy had been quite, quite different, and instead of the glad greeting to which she had always been accustomed, Baby Sylvia found nowadays a silent father, and rooms that, even to her infant soul, conveyed a sense of desolation.

Miles sat by the table now, his head buried in his hands, heedless of the entrance of his little daughter. His form looked bent and aged, there were white threads in his dark hair—marks of the agony he had gone through during the months that had passed since he had, as he expressed it, "found Sylvia out."

In the corner of the room the child could just see a tiny Christmas-tree, waiting to be lighted for her benefit; over the mantelpiece hung a large portrait of her mother—a portrait which Miles refused to have taken down, but at which he looked every day in exceeding bitterness of soul.

The child's step on the floor made him lift his head, his eyes were dim with tears, and the little one crossed quickly to his side and laid her hand on his knee.

"Daddy crying?" she said in her soft little voice. "Whatever's the matter, daddy?"

"It's nothing, darling!" he answered, mastering his emotion. "Daddy was only remembering—other Christmases when—when——" His voice shook, his eyes glanced involuntarily at the lovely pictured face over the mantelpiece.

"When mother was here too?" the child asked wistfully, her glance following his. "Pretty, pretty mummy!" she whispered, kissing her hand to the smiling girl in the portrait. "Where is mother to-night, daddy?"

The earnest words, the pressure of the little hands on his knee, the wistful, upturned face, struck Miles like a blow. He sprang to his feet and began to pace the room restlessly.

"I don't know!" he muttered. "I don't know where she is. If I knew—if I could find her, I would forgive all—all—I——"

He lifted his eyes again to the lovely face on the wall, which seemed to look down at him reproachfully, and again he repeated brokenly:

"I would forgive all, Sylvia! I would forgive all, if——" Then he sank down by the table again, and once more buried his face in his hands.

No word, no sign had come from the wife he had lost since that fatal day when he and Clara had watched her from behind the high hedge.

Urged thereto by his cousin, under whose spell he still lay, he had written that letter to his wife on his hurried return from the Surrey expedition; urged also by her he had left the house before Sylvia's return, going to London to his mother's house with Clara and the child.

And then had come a sick revolt against himself, a sick loathing of his beautiful cousin, and a wild, intolerable longing for his wife—his Sylvia, his darling.

A journey to the Surrey cottage had revealed an empty, deserted house, and all his inquiries in the neighbourhood elicited only the fact that Mrs. Brown, the gentleman who lived with her, and a pretty young lady had all gone away together, whither no one could tell.

Then Miles returned to his desolate home, insisted upon baby Sylvia's return there also, and utterly refused to allow his mother, his sisters, or his cousin, Mrs. Metcalfe, to come near him.

"You all hated her—my darling!" he wrote; "leave me alone in my grief. My child and I will comfort one another."

And so the days had dragged wearily by until Christmas Eve and Baby Sylvia's birthday came together, and Miles strove to arouse himself from the deadly lethargy of sorrow to make his little daughter happy.

But the child's wistful words had unmanned him.

"Where is mother to-night?" she had said in her clear, baby voice; and Miles could only echo the words drearily: "Where, indeed?"

There was a long silence in the library after that outburst of grief from Miles, and baby Sylvia stood beside him watching him with loving, troubled glances.

"Won't mummy come home for Baby Sylvia's birthday?" she whispered suddenly; and Miles lifted his tear-stained face and caught the child to his breast.

"I wish to God she would!" he cried. "I wish to God she would! Ah! Sylvia—Sylvia—Sylvia! come back to me!"

The child, frightened by his vehemence, clung to him closely, and the door opened and shut softly unheard by them both.

"I wish we knew where mummy was," the little girl said. "Baby Sylvia dreadful frightened—wants her mummy!"

There was a little rustle of skirts, a broken sob, a low exclamation, and all in a moment someone was kneeling by Miles' side, gripping at his arm with clinging, feverish touch, and a voice said breathlessly:

"Ah! Miles, Miles, say it again; say 'Sylvia, come back!' See! She has come—I have come back to you, Miles—to ask you——"

Her sentence had no ending. Miles lifted his dazed and miserable face from Baby Sylvia's golden curls, and looked down at the kneeling form at his feet. And when he saw her white, worn face, her dim eyes, the trembling of her sweet mouth, everything was forgotten but his love for her, and he stooped and gathered her into his arms, murmuring:

"Thank God! Oh! thank God—my wife!"

Presently, when they were calmer, she said brokenly:

"Miles, I crept in an hour ago by the back door, and I have been long, so long in the hall listening to your dear voice and my baby's. And I heard you say 'I would forgive all.' Ah! my dear, you have much to forgive; but not what you thought. I have never been untrue to you, my husband, in word or thought." Her voice was very grave, her eyes met her husband's frankly.

They were sitting side by side upon the sofa, baby Sylvia gathered close into her mother's arm, and Miles looked into his wife's face narrowly.

"Then, who," he said—"what—who was Dick? What did it all mean?"

She answered: "Miles, I have deceived you—deceived you always, but not as you feared. Dick was my brother, my only brother. He—he is dead!" She glanced at her black garments. "He had committed a crime for which he should have suffered punishment, but—— Oh! Miles, we hid him—old Nanna and I—and nobody ever knew where he was. I did not dare to tell you that my brother was a forger. I did not dare let you know the truth; it was cowardly, it was wrong of me, but—I was afraid! And then he became ill, desperately ill, ill unto death. It was at that time you found out, Miles! His illness was breaking my heart, but having deceived you so long I was afraid to tell you the truth then. When I found your awful letter—oh! Miles it nearly killed me; but Dick was dying; I was afraid lest you should discover his identity and insist on his punishment. I think I was mad! Nanna and I took him away and nursed him till he died; and pride and terror combined prevented me from exonerating myself in your eyes. I hated to think you had distrusted me; I knew it was Clara's doing, and I was heartbroken! To-night, my baby's birthday, I had to come home—home to you both, and now—and now——"

"And now we will never distrust each other again, sweetheart. We will never let a living soul come between us any more. There is only one woman I love in this whole wide world, and her name is—Sylvia!" L. G. Moberley.

An Extravagant Man.

FATHER: "Yes, I admit your lover has a good income, but he has very expensive tastes, very." Daughter: "You amaze me; what does he ever want that is so expensive?" Father: "Well, you for one thing."

Digitized by Google

A Fairy's Revenge.

A Christmas Pantomime Story.

"Look here, you two girls!" said the stage manager warningly; "if there's any more of this sort of thing at show-time, you'll have to take a week's notice, both of you!"

The "sort of thing" consisted of a noisy passage of tongue—almost of arms—between the two ladies referred to; both of whom were in what is theatrically known as the "front row."

The feud had gone on all through the rehearsals of the pantomime at the "Coliseum," having originated in the determined endeavour of Hannah Dent to lure from his allegiance the affianced lover of Cissy Lane.

The gentleman in question was a prosperous young "coster" on the south side, known to the general public in the neighbourhood of the Old Kent Road as "King Jack" and the "Coster King."

The rivalry between the two coryphees for the valuable affections of his coster majesty, had culminated on Boxing Night, when, owing to the absence of the principal solo dancer, through sudden illness, Cissy Lane was hurriedly requisitioned to fill the gap.

Professional jealousy is not an altogether unknown quantity in theatrical life, but in this particular instance there was only one voice raised in angry disapproval. With the majority of the ballet girls, Cissy Lane, by reason of her happy good-humour, and kindliness of disposition, was a great favourite, and no one, except Hannah Dent, envied her her good fortune.

"I've been longer at it than she has," spitefully whispered the latter to her neighbour, as the Fairies of the Glen stood in a half circle and watched the evolutions of Cissy as Fairy Queen. "There'll be no bearing her now! I can't make out what Marlow" (the stage manager) "sees in her!"

"Oh! Cissy's a daisy!" whispered back the neighbour, glad of an opportunity of setting down the maliciously-minded Hannah. "An' as for her dancin', there ain't no one in this show as is fit to chalk 'er shoes for 'er!"

"Rats!" was Hannah Dent's elegant rejoinder, and at the same moment Cissy finished her pas seul at the O.P. corner with a succession of rapid pirouettes, that elicited a perfect storm of applause from the crowded house.

It was then that, standing in the proscenium opening, close behind Hannah Dent, Cissy—never one to start a quarrel or altercation—was goaded to reply to an aggravating remark made by her rival over her shoulder.

One word led to another, resulting, as has been said, in a warning reprimand from the stage manager.

Still, things might probably have simmered down to at least something in the shape of a truce, but for a definite statement of Hannah's that she had in her pocket a letter from Jack Martindale to herself.

"Jack write to you!" said Cissy hoarsely, her eyes ablaze with angry disbelief. "I don't believe you! You're a wicked woman!"

"Don't spoil your beauty, my dear, by gettin' in a tear! I've got it, an' I'll show it you in a minute, when we're off!"

"You can't! You can't! My Jack wouldn't look at you!"

"Oh, indeed, wouldn't he? Well, p'r'aps you'll alter your tune when I tells you as he's arsked me to drive with him to Greenwich on Sunday! All right, Mr. Marlow" (to the stage manager), "I'll shut up! I've said all as I wants to!"

"That's lucky!" Marlow replied. "It will be as well to mind what I've told you."

"Mind!" Cissy hissed in the other's ear, as the manager passed out of hearing. "You show me that letter—if you can!"

Then everybody was on the move for a concluding wild dance as the scene closed in.

The dressing-room accommodation of the "Coliseum" was not by any means worthy of praise, being alike limited, dirty, and inconvenient.

Cissy Lane, as merely a temporary substitute for the première danseuse, was, of course, still reckoned only as one of the rank-and-file, and so far as dressing arrangements went, was treated accordingly.

As Hannah Dent pressed into the low, narrow room, in the train of the muslin-skirted crowd, she saw Cissy standing by the rickety bench, which did duty for a dressing-table, her face set and white, and in her eyes a look of stony expectation.

By this time all the other girls were full of the matter, sympathy for Cissy being, however, almost the universal feeling amongst them.

"Show me that letter!" said Cissy at length, mechanically.

"What! in front of 'em all?"

"Show me the letter!" the girl repeated, this time in a slightly raised tone.

"Oh, I'm agreeable! if you are, my dear! Only I thought p'r'aps as you wouldn't care to give yourself away-like!"

"The letter!"

"'You needn't think as I'm goin' to let you read it! You know's Jack's writin'. Well, an' how he signs his name. There you are, my dear!" (folding a letter, which she drew from the bosom of her dress, so as to show the signature only, and holding it close to Cissy's face), "is that anythin' like it, eh?"

One glance was enough! She had had only too many of Jack's labouredly-penned notes left for her at the stage-door, not to be able to recognise the writing.

For a moment the assembled girls looked for their badgered, insulted comrade to turn and rend her persecutor. And, to a girl, they would have applauded any such action on Cissy's part, and stood by her. But to their astonishment she said nothing. She just put both her hands up to her face, and seemed to shrink into herself.

Long after Hannah Dent's departure from the theatre, she stood still in her stage finery alone, and unmindful of everything around her. By-and-bye the wardrobe woman, an especially good friend of hers, came into the room.

"Good gracious! My dear, not gone yet? What on earth is the matter with you?"

"Nothing, Mrs. Smith," she replied wearily.

"Nonsense, child, don't tell me! Why you're crying! And if you stands 'ere much longer in them flimsy fal-lals, you'll ketch your death-o' cold."

"Never mind me, Mrs. Smith," she said. "I'm going to dress now."

"I should think so indeed, an' a smart young man a' wearin' 'is boots out, to say nothin' of 'is 'cart, walkin' up an' down outside, like a caged zoological."

"Tell him to go away, Mrs. Smith! Please tell him to go away!"

Digitized by Google

"Now then, Cissy!" said the old woman, suddenly putting out her hands and gripping fast hold of both the poor Fairy Queen's. "You'll have to tell me what's up! What's Jack Martindale bin doin' of as you wants to chivey 'im?"

"It's not him so much," sobbed Cissy, "it's Hannah Dent."

"Well, what's that hussy's game?"

"She's taken Jack from me!" said Cissy, completely breaking down, and laying her head on Mrs. Smith's sympathetic shoulder. "He's written her a letter, asking her to go to Greenwich with him on Sunday, and—and I've seen it!"

"Seen the letter?"

"Well, I saw his name at the bottom of it."

"That's nothin'! It's a trick of that artful piece of goods, Hannah Dent. I knows 'er! Come, dress yourself quick! child, an' go an' arsk Jack straight, if 'e's off with you an' on with Hannah? It's the only way to get at the truth of it. For my part, I don't believe Jack Martindale would do such a dirty trick, while I do believe as Hannah Dent wouldn't stop short o' murder even if she 'ad 'er knife into anybody."

But when, a quarter of an hour later, Cissy, piloted by Mrs. Smith, passed through the stage-door into the street, there was no one there; no signs of Jack.

"Well, my dear, I don't want to hurt your feelin's, but you've only got yourself to blame. But let's arsk Tims! 'e'll know. 'Ere, Tims (to the door-keeper) seen anybody a waitin' outside?"

"Yes. Jack Martindale. He arsked me, 'alf-a-dozen times, when Cissy Lane were comin'. He were tearin' mad-like when I told 'im as I didn't know. Ten minutes ago Hannah Dent come along an' they went away together, Old Kent Road way, though I must say as 'e didn't seem as if 'e wanted to go much. But she whispered 'im, an' laughed a bit, and e' went off with 'er."

"Come along, Cissy!" said Mrs. Smith grimly. "Good night, Tims! Now look a-here," she said, when they were out in the main road. "You leave this to me! Go you home, an' go to bed. If I don't spring Hannah Dent's trap, and catch 'er in it finely, so as she can't easy set it again, my name ain't Martha Smith."

* * * * *

When Mrs. Martha Smith once put her hand to anything, she, as a rule, was successful.

For more than an hour that night, bitterly cold as it was, and inclined to snow, she traversed the length of the Old Kent Road in quest of Coster Jack.

Just as she was about to give up her search, she saw him coming along the almost deserted pavement, his hands in his pockets, his head bent, and about him altogether a curious air of depression. In common with most folks in the district she knew him, and did not hesitate now to accost him.

"Good evenin', Mr. Jack Martindale!" she said, with dangerous pleasantness.

Taking his pipe out of his mouth he returned "Good evenin'," and made to pass on his way.

"Can I have a word with you?" said the old wardrobe woman, barring his passage.

"A word with me? Course you can, if you wants one. Wot is it?"

"Oh, I shan't keep you long! I wants to ask you a matter of two simple questions."

"Arsk away! Don't be long about it, for I wants to get to bed. 'As to be up at four in the mornin', you know."

"All right. Well, did you ever write a letter to Hannah Dent?"

"Well, if you wants to know pertickler, though I can't see as it's any business of yours, Mrs. Smith—I did write Hannah Dent a letter."

"Oh, you did! Well, p'r'aps you'll tell me, as is Cissy Lane's good friend, poor girl, if you've done with her, an' 'a' taken up with that shame-faced hussy, Hannah Dent?"

"Have I done wot?" exclaimed the other. "Why, you're mad, Mother Smith; it's Cissy as 'as chucked me up!"

"Not she! She's too fond of yer! Will you tell me what you said in your letter to Hannah Dent?"

"I don't mind tellin' you. I just said as I'd 'eard from one of the girls at the theatre as she were givin' Cissy too much chin-music, an' I tells 'er as she'll 'ave to stop it. That's all!"

"On yer gospel?"

"Yes."

"Jack Martindale, I believes yer! Shake hands! Now listen to me! I'll see Cissy to-morrer mornin' first thing, an' tell 'er the truth. You come round as usual after the show in the evenin', an' if you don't then, between you, make it up, so as it can't come undone agin', why you're no man, an' Cissy's a little fool!"

The next morning Mrs. Smith carried out faithfully her part of the programme, leaving Cissy in a state of eager longing for the moment of reconciliation.

But, like many another anticipated life-pleasure, that moment was delayed beyond almost the bearing-limit of two really loving hearts.

* * * * *

In the scene of the Fairy Glen, torches were used to give a weird effect in the semi-darkness. At one point in the action each ballet-girl, previously provided with an electric torch, which up to then she had held behind her, suddenly produced it, and held it arm-high, above her head.

By some mischance, on the second night of the pantomime, the wire attached to the portable battery, concealed in the wings on Hannah Dent's shoulders, became fused, and before it was realised what had occurred, the unfortunate girl's costume of light material was in a blaze.

Shriek upon shriek went up, as the victim of the accident ran hither and thither, to her own danger, and the danger of those about her similarly attired.

Before the curtain could be lowered, a scene was witnessed by both audience and stage hands which neither will ever forget.

At the left wing, half way up the stage, stood a throne, with about it voluminous hangings.

Towards this Cissy Lane was seen rushing. Tearing down one of the curtains, she first deftly dodged the now maddened Hannah, and then, throwing the curtain over the other's head, clasped her arms round it and her, and rolled the object of her heroic efforts frantically to-and-fro upon the stage.

When both rescuer and rescued were medically examined at the adjacent hospital, it was found that Cissy Lane's arms and neck were fearfully burnt, while Hannah's state gave very little hope that she would ever recover.

That this latter prediction was falsified was due more to splendid nursing than to anything else, and to the cheering encouragement of her bed-neighbour, Cissy Lane.

Cissy left the hospital first, but she never missed a visiting day, when she would take her quondam enemy such little luxuries as the rules allowed.

But Hannah came to look, not for the fruit or other delicacies, but for Cissy's smile and word of tender sympathy.

She did not as yet say much, but lay apparently quite content to listen and to gaze.

One afternoon Jack Martindale, at Hannah's special request, accompanied Cissy.

Association with Cissy had rubbed down all that was rough and coarse in his nature, and any feeling of dislike and contempt, which he might otherwise have had for the author of the cruel plot to spoil his and Cissy's lives, was lost in her sufferings, and for her prospects of a maimed and useless future.

She did not say much even now.

Taking the hands of Jack Martindale and her sweetheart between her own, she looked up at them, her eyes swimming with tears, and just said, "I do arsk your pardon, both of yer! Jack, you've got as true an angel as ever's up in Heaven!"

"I knows it!" said Jack.

"But angels have wings, Jack," said Cissy, feeling that she must say something.

"Has they?" he answered her. "Well, I'm mortal glad you hasn't, as I'm sure now as you'll never be able to fly away from me."

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google

Mistletoe.

A Christmas Story.

It was the morning of Christmas Eve. The ground rang hard underfoot and the newly risen sun, shining red and wintry through the black, bare trees, made the frost-whitened lawns and hedges sparkle as though they were powdered with jewels.

Striding across the grass went Frank Sinclair, twenty-one, manly and handsome. He walked quickly, for his way led to the orchard where he was to meet his sweetheart; yet his face bore a sad, troubled expression. After to-day he would not see her for a long time, perhaps not for four years. He had to spend Christmas Day in London and then he was off to the east coast of Africa, there to help the construction of some railways. Of the future he had no doubt. He would soon achieve a good position and return to marry Blanche Harrap; but it was hard to leave her, his little Blanche, so soon after they had plighted their troth.

Fast as he walked Blanche had reached the trysting-place before him. As he entered the orchard he saw her standing beneath an old apple tree whose bare branches bore here and there large boughs of dark green mistletoe. His eyes shone with delight as he gazed on the pretty picture she made. Her shapely head was crowned with a large black hat, on the under side of which was a bunch of violets nestled against her beautiful brown hair. A close-fitting jacket of warm brown fur covered her body, and her right hand hid itself deep out of sight in a large muff, of the same rich skin, to which she had pinned another bunch of violets. Her left hand held gracefully from the ground a trailing skirt of dark grey cloth.

"Why, Blanche," he cried, as he kissed her, "how long have you been waiting, lassie?"

"Not many minutes, Frank," she answered, gazing wistfully up at him. "I came in plenty of time, for I could not bear to lose a single minute of our last hour together."

For answer he kissed her again passionately.

"I'll not be away from you long, Blanche," he said. "Very soon I'll come back again. After that we will never part any more."

"You won't forget me? Promise, Frankie," she intreated.

"Forget you! Of course I won't forget you, little Blanche."

"And you'll write to me often—very often?"

"Yes, if you don't get my letters you will know that I have been sent where there is no post, or——" The grey eyes gazing into his were rapidly filling with tears, so, kissing them, Frank, who was himself very near tears, sought to interest her in other subjects.

"Come, lassie," he said, "there are very many places I want you to take me to. I must say 'Good-bye' to all our favourite walks and views; but first of all I am going to climb into this dear old tree and bring you down a great big bunch of mistletoe. Then we will go to Davis, and ask him to save a piece from this very tree for us every year. Until I come back he must send it to you. When you get my Christmas letters will you open them under the mistletoe?"

Frank quickly and lightly swung himself up amongst the branches, and was soon down beside Blanche again, bearing in his hands the largest bough that had grown on the tree. He held it over her head. His other arm incircled her waist and drew her to him. Their lips met.

"Blanche, little Blanche," he cried, "never mistrust me. I will always, always love you."

* * * * *

Mamie Russell dashed into her aunt's boudoir.

"Auntie Blanche, Auntie Blanche," she cried excitedly. "Harry has come home. He will be here to-day. See, here is a letter from Southampton and a telegram from London. He has discovered a gold mine—he and three others, and he has come home to me again. Just fancy, he will be here for to-morrow—Christmas Day, and I did not expect to see him again for another two Christmasses. Oh, Auntie, dear, isn't it just splendid?"

Putting her arm round her aunt's neck she gave her a great kiss and then ran to the door.

"I must tell them to get his room ready, and then I will take the trap and drive down to the station to meet him. The train will be here in half an hour." She opened the door, and then turned back, holding a letter in her hand. "Oh, Auntie, I am sorry," she said, "here is a letter for you. I should have given it to you at first."

For a long time after her niece had left, Blanche Harrap sat gazing out of the windows over the frost-covered hedgerows and meadows. There was a great longing in her beautiful grey eyes. Fifteen years ago that day she had said "Good-bye" to her sweetheart, and she still waited his return. For the first two years he had written to her regularly. Then came a letter which said he expected to be home in a few months for the work was almost done. After that there came no more. She wrote three letters to his last address; but they were returned marked "gone away." A letter to the man he had worked under elicited the information that young Sinclair had set out on a hunting expedition into the interior and had not been seen since. After that she sent no more; but waited for him to come, remembering the words he had said when he kissed her beneath the mistletoe on that last day so long ago.

There still came to her every Christmas a bunch of mistletoe from that same apple tree. She would have stopped its annual appearance, but that, deep in her heart, there was a feeling that as long as the token hung overhead at Christmas time there was still a chance that a letter from Frank, or perhaps Frank himself, might come to greet her with wishes for a happy and joyous year.

With a sigh she opened the letter in her hand. As she read she gave a little cry of distress and tears came into her eyes.

"Dear Miss," it ran, in the trembling writing of old Davis, "I am sorry that this year we cannot carry out Mr. Frank's wishes. There was only one branch of mistletoe on the old tree, and I regret to say that some stranger came into the orchard last night and took it."

"Oh, they might have left me that," cried poor Blanche, "it was all I had left. I wanted it so! I wanted it so!"

Just then she heard the wheels of the dogcart on the gravel below, and dried her eyes hastily. In a few minutes her niece came in, her eyes aglow with pleasure, followed by Harry, bronzed and well and evidently also very happy.

Digitized by Google

"Welcome home, Harry," she said, rising to meet him. "I hear that you have good news. I am very glad, both for your own sake and for Mamie's. I hope you are going to stay in England for a long time. Mamie has been very lonely without you."

Harry gently gripped the hand extended to him, and said never a word. He knew nothing of Miss Harrap's story; but to his mind she was a woman who deserved far greater happiness than had fallen to her share. There was a touch of sadness in her welcome that set him thinking that perhaps she understood more of Mamie's loneliness than she had ever told.

"Oh, Auntie, it's such a wonderful story," broke in Mamie. "Harry rescued a man from a tribe of savages and through that found the gold. You tell, Harry."

"There is nothing much to tell," said Harry. He disliked talking—talking to one's sweetheart is a different matter of course. "You see, Miss Harrap, after I had finished with those steamers on Lake Nyassa—Mamie probably told you about them—I took a little holiday. I and two other men struck west into British Central Africa. We had not been on the march for more than a fortnight before we came across a man—an Englishman—who had been carried off by one of the native tribes and held captive for twelve or thirteen years. We rescued him, of course, and he showed us one of the richest gold mines I have ever heard of or seen. It was worked some hundreds of years ago I should think, but has long been in disuse. The rescued man and I have come to England together to manage the business side of the operations."

Blanche Harrap's breath came fast as she listened to the tale.

"What is this man's name? You have not told us," she said in a low tone.

"Oh, have I not," answered Harry. "It is——"

"Mr. Frank Sinclair!" announced a servant, flinging wide the door.

"Frank, Frank!" cried Blanche, with a little laughing sob, as she gazed at the tall man who entered, his arms filled by a big bunch of mistletoe.

Before she could realise her happiness the mistletoe was over her head, a strong arm was round her waist, and his lips were pressed to hers.

"Blanche, my little Blanche, I have never loved any one save you," was all his greeting.

Harry looked on in amazement.

"Sinclair," he said at last. "How did you come here? Why did you not tell me that you knew Miss Harrap?"

Frank answered him; but his eyes were turned towards Blanche.

"I thought it must be my Miss Harrap," he said slowly, "but I dared not ask until I reached England. Then I went straight to old Davis; but reached there too late last night to see him. I went into the orchard and saw this, which I took to bring to you. It is from the old tree. In the morning I found Davis and learnt that he had that moment sent off a letter telling you that the mistletoe had been stolen. I asked your address, and—Blanche, Blanche, you are more beautiful than ever you were!"

"I think there will be two weddings instead of one," said Mamie, smiling up into Harry's eyes.

Ernest Herbert.

Cora: "You have a fine sense of the ridiculous." Dick (rather flattered): "Why do you think so?" Cora: "I noticed you smiling at yourself in the mirror."

Little Tommy (son of host): "Oh, Mr. Newrich, I do so wish I was you." Mr. Newrich: "Do you, my little man? And why do you wish you were me?" Little Tommy: "'Cos you don't get your fingers rapped when you put your knife in your mouth."

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

December 16.—If the birthday falls here, then care will be needed over writing, news and friends during the next twelve months.

Girls will have attentions, but should see that these are not from married men.

The day is not good; many promising speculations may be met with, but these should be passed by.

A child born here will be fond of change, and if born near 1 p.m. will travel much and go abroad.

December 17.— Attend to business and domestic matters. The health will need some extra care. Bad for farmers and builders.

Young girls should be cautious in their love affairs; some friction; letters cause anxiety.

The day is good for dealing with doctors, dentists, and military men; evil for doing business with aged people, or for marriage.

A child born here will be active, but too fond of pleasure. The mind will be quick, though there will be too much caution at times.

December 18.— An unfavourable birthday; avoid law, speculation, and attend to business. Those in employ are in danger of losing it.

Girls will meet with disappointments in love matters.

The day is evil for most matters; go quietly and let others make the first move.

A child born here will be quick of wit, but cunning, and will meet with but little success in life.

December 19.— A fortunate day, and the events through the year will go well. Promotion is shown for those in employ.

If engaged, girls will marry, and love matters are very interesting.

The day is good for buying or selling: for engaging servants, marriage, visiting, letter writing, asking favours or changing residence.

A child born here will be quick, ingenious, and cheerful. Will be fortunate and do well in business for itself.

December 20.— The year will require some care; danger of sickness in domestic circle.

Girls born near 9 p.m. should be cautious and prudent with opposite sex.

The day is not promising for letter writing, love affairs, dealing with landlords, builders, farmers, and literary men.

A child born here will be moody, and difficult to understand.

December 21.— A mixed year; much change and travel. Insure against fire and accident. Better for elderly people.

Girls born near noon, or between 4 and 5 p.m. will quarrel with lovers and need care against deceit.

A child born this day will be rash and headstrong; travel much and often be in danger of mishap.

December 22.— Much perplexity and worry for the year; sickness in the household; avoid speculation and law

Young girls meet with many crosses in their love affairs, and will have cause for grief.

The day is evil for speculation, marriage, letter writing, or doing business with young people.

A child born to-day will be idle, fond of company, and very crafty. It will not be fortunate; unhappy in marriage if a girl.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

HE, SHE AND ANOTHER.

A Tale of Christmas Theatricals.

"If there is one thing I despise more than another," says Kitty, with an air of lofty indignation, "it is a man who doesn't know his own mind for half an hour together."

"Meaning ——?"

"Meaning no one. I simply stated a fact."

"Now, that's unkind. I can stand a good deal, but to be called 'a fact' is too much, Kitty. You told me the other day that you hated 'facts and figures,' and such rubbish; and you don't hate me, do you, dear?"

"There's no dealing with you, Gilbert, when you go on like this. I can't argue. I don't profess to be smart with my tongue. I leave that to clever people like you—and Paula Chester. But"—and Kitty rises to give emphasis to the remark—"I don't say one thing at breakfast, and another at lunch, and a third at dinner."

"Good gracious, Kitty, do you give vent to the same remark all the time? I confess I'd not observed it."

"As I have already said"—Kitty advances gracefully towards the door—"I can't argue, so I'll leave you in possession of the field. I hope"—a little viciously—"you'll enjoy your walk with Paula, but I'm afraid it's going to rain. May I trouble you to move from the door? I wish to go out."

"Not while you are cross, Kitty. I sha'n't allow you to pass till——"

He stoops, turning the winsome face up to his own.

"Give me a kiss, little woman, and be friends."

Kitty draws back, her face aflame with indignation.

"No, that I will not put up with. You think that you can treat me like a child. You flirt with another woman, slighting me the while, and then when the mood takes you, imagine you can come back again to me."

Gilbert Danvers looks grave. "Hush," he says, coldly, "I cannot let you say such things to me, Kitty."

"And I," she retorts, "will not allow you to stop me telling you what everyone is saying, what everyone declares to be the truth, that you seize every opportunity to be with Paula Chester—watch her, and wait for her every minute in the day."

"You believe this, Kitty?"

"How can I help believing it? I have shut my ears to the gossip in the house about you, I have taken myself to task for noticing how many times your eyes stray from my face to hers. I have combated every accusation brought against you. But I can bear no more. This afternoon"—she catches her breath in an effort to speak calmly—"this afternoon you told me that you had important letters to write, and so could not go with me, as you promised, for a drive. And then, when I come down, I hear that you have changed your mind, and are going out with Paula Chester."

"Who told you so?"

"She," flashes Kitty, "she told me, with an air of incomparable insolence, as though to say, 'You see he only talks to you from duty; his desire is to be with me.'

"But, perhaps"—Kitty's voice sounds softer, and her eyes have lost something of their scorn—"perhaps she was mistaken?"

Gilbert Danvers glances at the dainty figure, and a hot flush dyes his face.

"Did you ask her to go for a walk, Gilbert?" She has come a little closer, her silken skirts brush against him, and he breathes the subtle perfume which clings round her—a step nearer and he could have clasped her in his arms. The thought of her warm, red lips, that a few minutes ago had clung to his—her round, white arms, that she had clasped about his neck, soften him. He cannot let her go in anger.

"Kitty, my darling, won't you trust me?"

He thinks she will not demand an explanation about Paula after all, that she will let the matter drop. But Kitty is not so easily dissuaded.

"Did you arrange to go out with her, Gilbert? Tell me," she adds beseechingly. "I won't mind very much, only tell me."

He squares his shoulders and looks over her head.

"I did."

"You forgot what you had said to me, perhaps?"

"No."

"You preferred to go out with Paula Chester?"

He shifts his position uneasily. Kitty is his darling, and his sweetheart, as good, as beautiful as man could desire, but he could find it in his heart to wish that a little mercy should temper her judgment.

"I don't think, dear," he says at last, "that I need answer that question. I did arrange to go out with Miss Chester, but beyond that I can tell you nothing. I have no explanation to offer."

He knows it is not fair to her, he knows that to hesitate is only putting off the day of reckoning, but he knows also that Kitty loves him with all the strength of her tender heart.

"Gilbert!" she cries pitifully, and puts out her little hands.

But knowing the battle is won, he disregards the invitation.

"Do you trust me, Kitty?"

The answer is inaudible, and he judges it best to put it in a different form.

"You know I love you, dear?"

"Yes," with a little gulp, which causes Gilbert to call himself bad names, "she thought so."

"Then, dearest, how could I wish to slight or hurt you? Only trust me, darling, and all will be well."

She sighs and gropes feebly for the handle of the door.

"Don't you think you owe me reparation, Kitty?"

He is amazingly audacious, and she knows it; but he is very much to her, this tall, good-looking lover, with the grave, dark eyes, and so she turns her face towards him, thankful that the twilight hides her blushes.

But he is merciless. "No," he says; "to take is not to give. You must kiss me of your own free will."

She hesitates, and then standing on tiptoe—for Gilbert is a giant among men, and Kitty herself of the adorable order of women, neither short nor tall—draws his head level to her own.

Something of passion stirs within her, her love seems altered, grown, intensified. She lays her lips on his, and with her whole soul in her eyes kisses him, not once but twenty times.

"My love, my darling." He strains her closer in the darkness; but, shamefaced, she breaks from him, and hurries with beating heart and burning cheeks up to her room.

Gilbert breathes a little quickly at the thought of her last kiss, then lighting a cigarette, strolls to the window.

Digitized by Google

"It's an awful nuisance," he thinks, staring moodily at the grey autumnal afternoon.

"Ten to one Kitty will see me, and then——" with an expressive shrug, he turns away and makes for the fir plantation, where he knows Paula Chester has been waiting this last half hour.

"I thought you were never coming, Gilbert."

It is a low, rich voice that greets him, but at the sound the young man stiffens, and his face wears a strangely hard, almost forbidding look as he greets her.

Tall, dark, and passionate, Paula Chester has been likened to a pomegranate blossom, with her scarlet mouth and glowing cheeks. But Gilbert, beauty lover as he is, seems curiously unmoved by the lovely face upturned to his.

The interview is short and apparently unsatisfactory to both parties, for Gilbert returns to the house with bent brows and tight set lips, and Paula, gazing after the tall, straight figure, clenches her little hands and breaks into a sob.

"My darling, my darling," she cries, "you were mine once, and you shall be mine again. In spite of yourself I'll make you love me!"

The Time is Christmas.

There is an air of subdued excitement about the house. Mysterious confabs are held in remote corners, everybody bears a more or less distracted or abstracted look, and refers perpetually, to a small paper-covered book.

"One would think we were conspirators," laughs Kitty, as she runs up against Freddy Hunter. "Who could imagine that all this preparation and mystery was in connection with private theatricals?"

"That's where the fun comes, Miss Trent. We are all about to spring surprises on each other. For instance, you would not think that I should make a realistic bandit?" with an air of pride.

Freddy is a fair and somewhat meek-and-mild young man, with about as unbrigand-like a countenance as can be imagined.

"No," falters Kitty.

"So I expected," chirps Freddy; "wait till you see me in a black wig and corked eyebrows and you won't know me."

"But," she protests, the spirit of mirth lurking in each dimpled cheek, "surely there's no brigand in 'The Magistrate'?"

"Oh, I wasn't speaking of the play!" somewhat contemptuously, "I meant the tableaux. You know, Miss Trent, tableaux are always such a success. I thought a few serious scenes would come in well after Pinero's farce."

The idea of Freddy as a bandit is anything but serious, but Kitty chokes back her laughter, and agrees to urge the point with Gilbert, who, as stage manager, is, as his sweetheart somewhat pertly puts it, "bossing the show."

Paula hears the atrocious piece of slang and gazes with unspeakable contempt in her direction.

"It's such a mistake," she murmurs to the curate, her abject slave, "for women to be slangy. Mr. Danvers has such an objection to it."

Kitty moves away, a little hurt that Gilbert has not championed her cause, instead of leaving it to Freddy Hunter, who, with a devotion worthy of a better wit, flings himself into the breach, and makes matters worse by stating that, "Danvers is not everybody, is he, Miss Trent?"

She wishes the theatricals were at the bottom of the sea, wishes she'd never accepted Lady Rawton's invitation, wishes still more ardently that Paula Chester were anywhere but here.

"Paula's an old school-fellow of mine, dear," little Lady Rawton had explained; "she used to know Gilbert years ago, I fancy—when he was poor, you know, and studying in Rome. I hardly know how I came to invite her; but anyway here she is, and I must confess a tremendous acquisition to a house party. All the men are mad about her."

Lady Rawton's tender blue eyes and engaging baby face had not been altogether innocent of mischief as she spoke. Kitty Trent was too near her own age not to be regarded as something of a rival—although she, Fanny Rawton, had been married these five years—and the demure little matron was not at all averse to give her "dearest friend" a little suffering.

She it was who seconded Paula's suggestion that she and Gilbert in "The Huguenot" would make a splendid "living picture," and laughed at Kitty's feeble reminder that the woman should be fair.

"Surely, my dear, you're not jealous, are you? Paula and Gilbert will make a lovely pair. I think Freddy's idea of tableaux is splendid."

For the next fortnight Rawton Hall resembles nothing, Kitty declares, so nearly as a private lunatic asylum. Connected conversation is impossible; Gilbert is hardly ever to be met with, save in the agonies of a rehearsal, and habitually wears a worried look. Truth to tell, it is no light matter to drill the members of the caste into their respective parts, for save Paula—a born actress—and Kitty, whose sweet face and naivette of manner would make her fortune on the stage, the histrionic ability of the company generally is conspicuous by its absence.

At last, on the day before the eventful evening, there comes a lull. Human nature can bear no more rehearsing, hysterics and bickerings are in the air, Freddy stalks about like the ghost of an injured bandit, and the curate is reduced almost to tears by the snubbing his goddess has administered.

"I can't stand it any longer," says Gilbert. "I've had too much already. For goodness sake, Kitty, let's go out for a stroll."

He is his old self again that afternoon, and Kitty, radiant in sealskin and sables, thinks she has never seen anyone to compare with her lover as he waits at the bottom of the stairs.

He glances round hastily, then lifts her veil and kisses the tempting lips again and yet again, regardless of the fact that the violets nestling at her throat are not improved by the process.

It is a bright, pleasant afternoon, and Kitty's cheeks glow with the frosty air, and her heart keeps time to her happy dancing feet. Is she not with her lover? Has he not told her for the hundredth time how infinitely dear she is to him?

Gilbert falls to planning the future—not so very far away, he hopes—when he and Kitty shall have set up housekeeping together. And Kitty is in heaven, and forgets all the vague unhappiness and dull misgivings she has had of late.

She returns radiant from her walk. Paula stops her in the corridor leading to her room.

"Have you had a fortune left you, Kitty?" she says with a sneering laugh. "One would think you had heard some wonderful news."

Kitty smiles brightly; and even feels kindly towards this woman who has caused her such pain and suffering.

"I am happy," she says softly. "Gilbert and I have been planning what we shall do when we are married."

She passes on, still with the smile upon her lips, but Paula leans against the wall, and her face seems suddenly grown old and grey.

"He shall never marry her," she mutters; "never, never marry her."

But at dinner that evening she is the gayest of the gay, queening it in white satin, with quaintly carved ornaments of gold and a necklace of sapphires. Kitty, girlishly lovely in a creation of white chiffon, pearls round her neck and in her golden hair, feels a little envious of that glowing face, until she catches the smile which Gilbert flashes across the table, a smile which says as well as words, "There's no one can compare with Kitty."

Digitized by Google

The memory of that smile remains with her through the next day, a talisman against which the whispers and asides that reach her about Paula and Gilbert fall powerless.

"The Magistrate" goes off without a hitch, Kitty creating a furore as the little music-mistress. It is, in fact, a frantic success, and the audience wait impatiently for the promised tableaux.

Kitty as "The Fair One with the Golden Locks" is charming; Freddy, to his intense joy, scores a success in his impersonation of "The Bandit at Bay;" other members of the company acquit themselves creditably, and then the curtain rises on "the" picture of the evening.

Never has Gilbert looked so handsome, nor Paula so beautiful. The dark, stern face of the man, the pleading loveliness of the woman hold the onlookers in a spell. Gradually the woman's expression seems to change, her eyes grow agonised, passionate, and over the countenance of the "Huguenot" there steals something of pity, his arms tighten round her, his lips curve into a smile.

Kitty grips her fan tightly, and her heart feels like lead.

"Perfect." "How exquisite." "What a charming picture." Admiration is expressed on every side. Kitty is seized with a wild desire to rush away and hide herself. She cannot sit and listen quietly much longer.

She hurries past the library, turned for that evening into a "green room." She gazes a little wistfully through the open door at the mirror facing her; it reflects a sad, wistful Kitty.

Someone inside the room is speaking. She cannot distinguish the words, but the voice—a woman's voice, thrilling with passion, pain, and the ineffable longing of love, she recognises as Paula Chester's. Kitty has no thought of playing the eavesdropper, another moment and she would have passed by, when a man's voice answers—

"Remember, think what would happen if——"

The woman interposes with a cry.

"Think of me, this once. Put the thought of that other woman from you. Think of the years of my sorrow in the past, the years of regret to come. Hold me in your arms, Gilbert, to your heart. Forget all that has come between us, remember only that once I was all the world to you."

She clings to him in an agony. A man were more than mortal to resist her.

He stoops and gathers the clinging figure close.

"Hush," he says gently, "hush," and kisses her softly on the lips.

What Paula says is true. Gilbert Ramsey had loved her once with the unreasoning passion and devotion of a boy. But in those day she was ambitious, she put aside her artist lover, with nothing but his talent, youth, and the dark beauty of his face, in favour of an old and wealthy nobleman. The latter had died during the period of their engagement, leaving her the bulk of his fortune. Then Paula learnt just how much she'd lost in casting Gilbert's love away. For years she had sought to meet him, she was ready to throw her money at his feet, so he would take her in his arms.

And now, now she has found him, and his love is no longer hers!

And yet the memory of those far-off days in Rome comes to Gilbert with a rush of pain. Again he waits for Paula in the scented darkness of a grove of orange trees, again he feels the ecstasy of her first kiss. Her face upturned in the moonlight glows with a strange, unearthly beauty, her arms enfold him in a fond embrace.

His breath comes quickly, he stoops and kisses her again—the woman he loved once. Then lifting his head, he sees facing them both, Kitty—the woman he loves now!

It is an awful moment. Gilbert falls back, the situation is beyond him, he cannot cope with it. Kitty's eyes, full of a dumb reproach, are worse to bear than invective, tears, or lamentations. If she would speak, if she would upbraid him, anything rather than stand silent before him, her girlish face white and drawn.

"Why," she says at last, "have you deceived me? I asked you not a week ago if it was not I you really loved. It was cowardly to answer as you did, cruel to me, unfair to her."

She motions towards Paula, but does not look at her. Kitty does not feel anger against her, pity rather, in that Gilbert has deceived them both.

"Why did you say you cared for me?" she goes on relentlessly. "Why did you tell so base a lie?"

He makes no answer. Of what use to protest, to attempt to explain that it was not love that moved him towards Paula. Kitty would not believe him. Women, he reflected bitterly, attach such terrible importance to a kiss. To a man it means so many and such different things.

He looks from her to the other, rage in his heart. For the moment he hates Paula. Why did she tempt him, why did she soften him by talk of days long since forgotten, buried, dead?

"I told you the truth, Kitty," he answers doggedly. "I care the world for you."

Paula flushes and then turns white.

"Why did you——" Kitty pauses. "Oh, answer me," she cried, "have pity on me. Let there be no more evasions. If you and Paula Chester don't love each other, why did I find you a moment since now, your arms about her? Why did you kiss?"

For the life of him Gilbert cannot answer. He is not hard enough to tell the truth, to confess that it was not for love's sake, but for pity that he'd acted as he did.

Paula reads the decision on his face. Even for Kitty's sake he will not lower her self-esteem. But even as she realises this, she realises also that she can never win back his love. His heart has gone for ever from her, to a slip of a girl with golden hair and pansy-coloured eyes. It lies with her, Paula, to say whether or no that girl shall pass out of his life. If she keeps silence they will part, they must part for ever. If she speaks—a low cry breaks from her lips. Passionate, undisciplined, generous of impulse, quick to love and quick to hate, Paula can rise to heights of sacrifice undreamt of by older, better regulated dispositions.

"It was for pity's sake," she cries, "he kissed me. Yes, for pity. He loved me once, when we were little more than boy and girl, and we were to have been married. But we were poor, and I was sick of poverty, and I had others to consider. My father was old and broken, and my brothers were but children. I listened to my people and to ambition. I flung over Gilbert for the sake of riches, and became engaged to another man. But"—she pauses—"he died—and left me all his money. But ever since I've hungered for Gilbert, night and day I've thought of him. To-night I offered him my love, but he could only give me pity. You, and you only, are the woman he desires."

Kitty listens, her eyes filling with tears. Then as the last words fall from Paula's lips, she turns—not to her lover, but to the woman whom she thought her rival.

"You poor thing," she says softly, exquisite tenderness in her voice. "How you must have suffered. Come with me, dear, I want to tell you just what I think of you—just how much I admire you."

She slips her arm round Paula's waist, and ignoring Gilbert, draws her gently from the room.

* * * * * * *

It is a sad-eyed Kitty that greets her lover on the morrow.

"Paula has gone away," she explains. "Oh, Gilbert, I am sorry for her."

"What about me, Kitty, don't I deserve commiseration? Consider what a terrible ten minutes you gave me last night."

"You deserved it," she answered. "I'm angry with you, sir. You should have told me about Paula sooner. Then I should not have minded, even——" she stops and blushes.

Gilbert smiles.

"I rather question that," he says. "But am I forgiven, Kitty?"

For answer she lifts her face, her eyes are wet. Kitty is very tender-hearted.

He draws her to him, and—they kiss again with tears.

John K. Prothero.

Digitized by Google

A Christmas Eve . . . . . in Shadow.

THE TALE OF AN ABDUCTION.

In the first place the ice was in splendid condition and well brushed from end to end, secondly the Squire was the heartiest and most jovial old host it was possible to imagine, and, finally, it was Christmas Eve. Small wonder, then, that the little band of skaters were thoroughly enjoying themselves.

For several days past the belt of trees that bordered the frozen lake had been almost hidden beneath a thick coating of snow. The Grange on the right side, and the little cottages on the left, just visible in the vague December light, were also shrouded in whiteness, and even now, the tiny flakes were again beginning to fall slowly, flung lightly to and fro by the wind.

Recruits were constantly arriving to join the enthusiastic party on the ice. The jingling of their skates sounded like music on the frosty air. It was the work of a moment to seat themselves, to fasten their skates, and then away they glided into the merry crowd.

As for the stout old Squire, he swung himself along at a prodigious rate, to the terror of all who crossed his path. The cry of "'Ware Squire" had become a classic phrase in the district. He was a very good skater "on the straight," but had no idea of stopping or turning. If nobody tripped him up on the way, he generally crashed headlong into the mound of half-frozen snow that surrounded the lake. He was up again in a moment, though, and off in a fresh direction.

It was just as he was picking himself up after one of these little mishaps, that he made a surprising discovery.

The short wintry afternoon was drawing to a close, and the light was fading rapidly. It was difficult for the skaters to recognise each other as they glided swiftly past. When the Squire had stumbled ruefully to his feet again, he found himself in an almost deserted corner, close to where a hole had been broken in for the ducks. There were two people, however, who stood a little distance away, with their backs towards him, who did not appear to object to the solitude.

There is something in the appearance of a pair of lovers that betrays them in a moment. The Squire stood in the gathering twilight and saw two shadowy forms, a man and a woman whispering together. That was all, and yet he knew at once they were lovers, and his kindly old heart was delighted.

But, however pleased he might be at this unexpected love affair amongst his guests, he had no right to listen to their conversation, and so he started away. The impetus of his own weight swung him forward at a great rate, over which as usual he had no control. Unfortunately for his peace of mind, just as he started, he heard the girl say something in a louder tone than previously, and recognised her as his wife's companion. And the voice that answered her, in words that were unmistakably affectionate, was that of his only son!

The old Squire, though the kindliest of men, had a very choleric temper. His beaming smiles disappeared, and his face became almost purple with indignation. The change was made in an instant, like the change of slides in a magic lantern.

The effort to maintain his indignation and his balance at the same time was too much for him, and after floundering wildly for a moment, he collapsed in a heap and slid ignominiously along the ice in a sitting position. His son hurried to the rescue without knowing to whom he was coming. Dora Chassens skated away towards the crowd after a brief farewell to her lover.

"You went with rather a smash that time, father!"

"Yes," answered the Squire grimly, "I did go with a smash. Thank you, I'm all right now."

His son's hurried glance to the rear increased the old man's indignation.

"If you'd like to join her, Tom, don't consider me."

"I didn't know you'd seen us together. It was Miss Chassens."

"Yes, I saw you. And look here, my lad, you must stop that game at once. In the first place, I won't have the girl trifled with."

"I've no intention of trifling with her. She has promised to marry me."

"And as a marriage between you is, of course, quite impossible," growled the Squire, unheeding his son's last remark, "the sooner you begin to leave her alone, the better. You'd better go away for a month or two."

"I may go away or not," said the young fellow hotly, "but I'm going to marry her."

"You shall not marry her."

"With or without your consent, sir. I'm old enough to choose for myself."

"But not clever enough, apparently. However, we'll speak of this later. I see the others are all going back to the Grange."

"I'll come home presently," said Tom moodily, "I want to have a quiet smoke here."

"All right, my lad. I'm sorry if I've hurt your feelings, but——"

"Is it any use discussing the question, sir?"

"Perhaps not, at present," said the old man, more gently than he had hitherto spoken. "Then, I'll leave you, Tom. Will you—do you mind giving me a push off?" he added.

Tom laughed in a mirthless kind of way, and gave him the required assistance. The Squire loomed swiftly for a moment through the darkness. When he had disappeared Tom skated slowly to the bank and sat down to take off his skates. At the same moment several men crept from behind some bushes near the lake, and closed stealthily in upon him.

* * * * *

About half an hour later, the Squire and his wife were having a quiet talk in the library at the Grange.

"The girl's all right, personally," said the old man, "I haven't a word to say against her, but Tom must look somewhere else for a wife. Indeed, I have set my heart on his marrying our neighbour's daughter."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, my dear," agreed his wife placidly.

"The two properties join so well," continued the Squire, tapping his foot irritably against the fender, "acre by acre together right down to the meadows. And now this bit of a boy and girl affair is to thwart the whole business. There's only one thing to be done, Mary. The lad must travel for six months, and you'd better dismiss the girl."

"She has her living to make," said the old lady.

"Pay her a month's salary—six months' if you like."

"Tom won't give her up easily."

"He must be made to do so."

"He has more than a bit of your spirit, my dear, and I don't think you would have given me up for forty fathers."

"Not I," said the Squire affectionately. "Do you remember how the old boy threatened to turn me out—disown me—disinherit me——!" he stopped rather confusedly.

"The cases are very similar."

"Tut, tut, nonsense. You're not in favour of the match?" severely.

"I rather think I am," said the old lady seriously. "Tom is only doing what his father did before him. A girl may be a lady and be fitted for any position in England, and yet according to your words—although I know you don't mean them——"

"Not mean them!" roared the Squire, who, in fact, was beginning to feel rather ashamed of his mercenary ideas.

"No, you don't mean them," said the old lady proudly. "I should be thoroughly ashamed of you if you did. According to that theory a lady is one who has sufficient money to keep her in idleness. Dora Chassens is a very good girl indeed, and a clever one as well."

"But she hasn't a penny to bless herself with," said the Squire feebly.

"Tom has, or will have, enough for both."

"H'm—well—love and kisses—we'll talk about it later—there's the dinner bell," said the Squire.

"All right!" said his wife, who knew by this shelving of the subject, that her cause was won. "I wonder whether Tom has come home yet?"

The old fellow's face was already beaming with smiles again. It was a great relief for him to return to his real self. But as he opened the library door for his wife, a sound of hysterical weeping in the hall broke upon his ears. Guests and servants were crowded indiscriminately together.

"What's the matter here?" he cried testily. "Wilson, has Mr. Tom come in yet?"

"No, sir," said the butler.

"What's the matter? Who's this?"

"It's the new kitchenmaid, sir, Jane Durridge. I was bringing her to see you. She's been to her mother's in the village, and come back all of a fluster."

"Well, what's the matter, Jane?" said the Squire more gently.

"It's—it's your son, sir."

The old man sprang forward in an instant.

"What about him?" he cried. "Speak up—quick."

"I asked if he was home, soon as I come, and they told me 'No,' and I was sure then I'd seen him as I passed the lake," panted the girl breathlessly. "He was quarrelling with some one, and they were standing near the hole in the ice, and I knew his voice, although I couldn't see him. I don't know the other man."

"Bosh!" roared the Squire. "How dare you come frightening us this way? I was the other man. We did have a few hot words about—never mind what—get to your work, all of you."

"But this warn't you, sir," said the maid timidly.

"Not me! It was me!" he shouted angrily, "Must I take my oath upon it?"

"Then two men quarrelled with your son, sir."

"What do you mean?"

The girl's eyes distended fearfully as she replied—"He struck at Master Tom with a great heavy stick, and the ice broke with his fall, and they both went in—and I screamed and ran away," she cried, breaking down again.

"Take that girl away," said the Squire, "and tell the housekeeper to put her to bed. Wilson, my overcoat and stick, and a lantern, and send a couple of them on to follow me to the lake."

Then he led his wife into the dining-room.

"We must hope for the best," he whispered huskily, "and if it's a false alarm—if we get him back, Mary—he can marry whoever he likes."

The old lady shook her head mournfully as her husband hurried from the room. Dora Chassens advanced from the hall to meet him. Her face was white and drawn, but her mouth was set firm.

"I've sent a man for Dr. Thompson," she said, "and the housekeeper has been told to have a bed ready, with hot water and warm blankets."

The Squire was touched to the heart. "You're a good girl," he said, and stooped and kissed her before them all. "Will you go into the dining-room now? Keep her spirits up whilst there's any hope left."

He made his excuses to the visitors, and then hurried out through the open doorway and down the great stone steps. Along by the side of the house, all carpeted with moving shadows, where the trees rustled their naked branches to and fro, past the plantation, where the path was shrouded in a heavy gloom, at the end of which the frozen lake showed dimly, like a great mantle spread amid the darkness. And there the Squire stopped suddenly, while fear gripped his heart, and turned his strength to deadly faintness.

Something lay silent and motionless at his feet, covered with a long overcoat. The men had broken the ice in several places, and were feeling carefully along the shallow bed of the lake with boat hooks and oars. So far, only one body had been found.

The Squire knelt down and plucked the covering from the face of the drowned man. Next instant he sprang to his feet. "Oh, thank God! Thank God!" he cried, "it isn't Tom!"

Across the darkness, from the other end of the lake, a sudden shout was heard. The old man ran across the ice, over the surface of which the water was rising from beneath.

"What is it?" he shouted hoarsely. "Have you found anything?"

"It's Master Tom's hat, sir," said the voice, and next moment a man loomed suddenly through the darkness.

"His hat?"

"Ay, his hat, sir," said the man. "but Master Tom ain't in the lake. I'll swear to that. It's scarce three foot deep, and we've felt all over."

"Where are the nearest grappling irons?"

"Lower Branniston, sir, ten miles away."

"Perhaps we can do without them. Have the ice broken up and removed, and let a couple of the men put oilskins on, and wade through to make certain."

"Yes, sir."

As they turned towards the side, there was a sudden crack, and the ice, already weakened, gave way in all directions. There was no time to get to the bank. Without a word the two men gripped hands and waited. The instinct that led them to do this, perhaps saved their lives for, as the ice sank, their united weight forced it down, until presently they stood in three feet of water, with the broken places rising slowly around them in the darkness.

It was a strange position to be in, but the Squire and his men soon cleared themselves. With hands still gripped together, they forced their way through the water, pushing the ice to either side, until presently they reached the bank and clambered with some difficulty on to dry land.

Not a word had been spoken since they first clasped hands, but now the Squire turned towards his companion with white, quivering face, and pointed to the water that rippled to and fro at their feet.

"If he is in there," muttered the old man hoarsely.

Digitized by Google

"He's beyond our help," said the other. "But you must hope, Squire; I'm 'most certain he bain't in the lake, for we've dragged every foot of it."

* * * * *

Dinner at the Grange that evening was a very mournful affair. The old lady had retired to her own room, where she sat with her companion. If she had felt any objections to her son's choice, that night would in any case have silenced them for ever. The two women sat in darkness, for the flaming gaslight has no sympathy with grief.

There were long periods of silence, broken only by the heart-broken cries of the elder woman. The younger one suffered perhaps more, for young grief is always more poignant, but her stronger nature impelled her to silence. They mingled their tears together, and talked of their lost one as only women can.

Downstairs, the Squire sat at the head of the dinner-table, attending with exquisite care to every detail of his duties as host. His face was white, and the corners of his mouth trembled convulsively when he glanced at the empty chair half way along the table, but he sat bravely to his work without flinching.

It was a mournful Christmas Eve though. Several of the visitors came to him after dinner, and made their excuses for leaving in the morning, which he accepted with a silent grip of the hand that showed his appreciation. Some were for leaving forthwith, but these he asked to postpone their departure over night.

"Before very long I shall have some certain news," he said gravely. "If by some strange mercy of Providence it is good, and there is still hope, the house shall ring with joy as it has never done before. And if we get bad news—God help us, we must bear it as we can," he muttered to himself.

She stopped and pointed forward with a gesture of contempt.

A few minutes later the butler tapped at the door. Before he could open it the Squire was running across the room to meet him, to hear the news from the lake. But the man held out a dirty, crumpled note, without envelope, addressed to Miss Chassens.

"A boy left it, and wouldn't wait for an answer, sir."

"Miss Chassens is with my wife," said the Squire, almost piteously. "What about the lake?"

"I was just going to tell you, sir. They've taken all the ice out and walked right through the water in every direction."

"Well?"

"There's nothing there, sir. They're absolutely certain."

The Squire gazed around him in utter amazement. The suspense of the last two hours was beginning to tell on him.

"What shall we do?" he said feebly, "I can't understand it."

"Send round to the village and ask if they know anything," suggested one of the guests. "Let us all go and search through the plantation and along the side of the lake. He may have climbed out and fainted, or hurt himself in some way."

It was a good suggestion, and everybody in their eagerness to help the poor father adopted it at once. The guests crowded into the hall, hats and overcoats were donned in an instant, the lanterns were lighted, and then the whole party streamed out through the open doorway.

* * * * *

Five minutes later a woman, cloaked and hooded, passed quietly from a side door of the Grange, and running lightly over the snow-covered path, presently reached a wicket-gate that opened on to the Brannston Road. A man who was sheltering beneath the trees stepped forward to meet her.

"Miss Chassens?" he said, and touched his hat obsequiously.

"Yes," was the curt reply. "Which way do we go?"

"This way, miss. I have a carriage round the corner."

He turned and led the way along the deserted road, the girl following. Once he fell back as though to walk beside her, but she stopped and pointed forward with such a gesture of contempt, and such scorn flashing from her eyes, that he hurried to his former place like a beaten cur. And presently they came to a quiet lane into which he led the way.

The girl hesitated for a moment. Was this a plan to decoy her into an unfrequented path, and there rob or murder her as they had perhaps murdered her lover already? A moment's reflection, however, set her fears at rest. Whatever there was about the Squire's son, she was certainly not worth so terrible a risk. If robbery had been the man's object, he might almost as easily have waylaid any of the visitors at the Grange with ten times as much money and jewels as she possessed.

"Are you coming, Miss?" said the man, who by this time had reached the carriage—a ramshackle vehicle hired from a neighbouring hostelry—and now stood with his hand upon the open door.

She hesitated no longer, but ran towards him and got into the carriage. As soon as she had done so he closed the door, kicked the clinging snow from his boots, and clambered into the box seat.

They drove down the lane, and jolting into the Brannston Road held steadily on at a good pace. The snow that carpeted the ground deadened the rattling of the wheels.

Inside the carriage the blinds were all drawn, and what was worse were screwed firmly to the woodwork to prevent the passenger from recognising the roads by which she travelled.

"But I have the revolver, fully loaded," she thought, "and in any case I am going to help him—perhaps to save him."

Digitized by Google

After driving for over an hour, the carriage slowed down and finally came to a standstill. The driver jumped clumsily from his seat and opened the door for her to alight.

The girl looked round her in astonishment. She stood in a narrow path before a little cottage that was built on the wooded slope of a hill, now entirely shrouded in whiteness. All around her the great trees reared their gaunt heads towards the sullen sky. Their branches, thickly powdered with snow, added to the weird appearance of the scene. Some distance below, in the valley, a few lights twinkled from the narrow cottage windows, but most of the villagers had retired to rest some time ago. She could not recognise the scenery in any way.

"Will you come inside?"

The man who spoke stood at the cottage door. The girl looked at him thoughtfully for a moment, wondering whether she should produce the revolver and let him see she could protect herself. Fortunately for herself and for Tom, she decided to keep her advantage to herself and await developments.

She entered the cottage, closely followed by the man who had last spoken to her. A backward glance showed her that the other man was removing the screws that held the blinds down in the carriage, probably before he returned it to the landlord of the village inn. She felt pleased now that she had scribbled a hasty note during her long ride through the darkness. Probably the driver would not trouble to look inside the carriage before returning it, but she had a shrewd idea that an ostler generally did so before cleaning the outside.

The man led her up the narrow staircase and stopped at the first door. "He's in here, miss," he said, inserting his key in the lock and pushing back a newly fixed bolt. "He's been very obstinate, and won't come to terms nohow."

"What do you mean?"

"We want £1,000, bank notes, before we release him, and he's awkward about it. We wanted to settle with him before risking ourselves at the Grange. And so we've taken the liberty, miss," he threw open the door so that the occupant of the room should hear, "of securing another visitor to persuade him to give in."

"I called you a scoundrel before," said the young Squire cheerfully, "but now I think you're an idiot as well."

One man rushed forward only to drop with a bullet in his shoulder.

"Ay, of course," answered the other man shrewdly. "We're going to keep you in separate rooms."

The sudden change in his prisoner's face was almost ridiculous.

"You shall have an hour together," he added gruffly, "so you can make up your minds what you're going to do."

He walked out of the room and locked the door from the outside. In an instant Dora had passed the revolver to her lover, whose eyes brightened at the welcome sight. He placed it carefully in a side pocket.

"I couldn't tell your father where I was going," she whispered, "but I left the man's note on the dining-room table. They're all out looking for you in the grounds, but I daren't stop to say you were safe, because they might have prevented me from coming to you."

"But you have come," he said tenderly.

"I should have been jealous if anybody else had saved you."

"We shall both be out of here before very long. Don't be alarmed if there is a bit of a struggle. It's only make-believe on my part."

Her woman's courage failed her now her share of the work was done.

"You won't hurt any of them with that thing," she said.

"It's very possible," he answered grimly, "but not too seriously. Don't worry yourself, dear. Keep up your courage."

They spoke together for some time, their voices unconsciously falling to a whisper, and then the key turned slowly and noisily in the lock, and the gaoler entered the room. Two other men, the driver and another, could be seen loitering in the passage, ready in case of emergency.

The prisoners stood apart in sudden dismay, scarcely believing that their hour had gone.

"Now then, sir, will you promise to pay up?"

"I don't see why I should," said Tom with exasperating calmness. "You've got us both certainly, but you daren't harm us." He walked carelessly towards the principal villain. "I'll tell you what will happen," he cried with pretended passion, "my father will search the whole countryside until he finds us." He was standing close to his man by this time. The girl, with some idea of his plan, stood apart, resting her elbows on the mantelpiece. The young Squire shook his fist threateningly. "You infernal scoundrel," he shouted, "I've a great mind to break every bone in your body."

"Fair words," said the other sullenly, "or else we'll have to gag you, captain. We can't run any risk of outsiders hearing you."

"Fair words!" scornfully. "Bah! pearls before swine!" he shouted with increasing vehemence.

The two men by the doorway shuffled uneasily into the room.

"We'd better put summat in his mouth," said one of them. "There's an old fellow coming along the path. He'll hear the row certain."

The leader took an improvised gag from his pocket. "I've had it ready all along," he said grimly, "and now it's time to use it. Not as anyone's likely to notice what you say, for I've led 'em to believe you're troubled with D.T. But we've had enough of your high faluting. Lock the door, Bill. Put the key in your pocket—quick, or he'll get it!"

The young Squire's opportunity had come at last. He sprang forward and delivered a terrific blow right in the face of the man who was fumbling to withdraw the key from the lock. The force of the blow flung him violently against the wall, after which he staggered round to the other side of the room and joined his accomplices. In a moment the Squire had whipped out his revolver and faced the three men, with his back against the door, which was exactly what he had intended to do.

Digitized by Google

"Hands up!" he roared, "quick—or I'll fire!" Two of the men obeyed, but the man who had already been struck ran forward with horrible imprecations, only to drop helplessly with a bullet in his shoulder. The room was filled with smoke in an instant. Before the two men had time to make any further move, the Squire's son had the door unlocked, and he and Dora were standing in the corridor, breathless but triumphant. Then he locked the door from the outside, and the next thing they did, with a fine disregard for the proximity of danger, was to kiss each other, not once, but many times!

Afterwards she ran down the snow-covered path to the village, while he remained on guard at the door. She was back again in about twenty minutes, but still by herself. One of the policemen could not be found, and the other had taken a considerable amount of awakening.

He promised to follow as soon as he had dressed himself and discovered his companion.

In the meantime Tom told her how the three men and also the one who had been drowned, were Londoners. Burglars by profession, they had decided to embark in a new line, and a chance newspaper reference had decided their steps to Davyhulme. They skulked about the wicket-gate in the Brannston Road for a couple of days until a chance arrived, which proved both disastrous and lucky. Their accomplice, who tackled Tom and called upon him to let himself be taken quietly, grew desperate at the openly expressed scorn of the latter, and struck at him with his heavy stick. The blow partly stunned the young Squire, who fell headlong upon the ice, which cracked ominously. The other man fled from the danger, and, in the darkness, blundered straight into the hole which had been broken for the ducks.

"He must have been carried somehow beneath the ice," concluded Tom gravely. "As for myself, I was insensible, and they carried me into the road, where they had a carriage waiting."

It was nearly an hour before the policemen arrived from the village, and then they went back at once on the plea that they required a stretcher for the wounded man. The young Squire and Dora were naturally anxious to get home, but the law, or its bucolic representatives, could not be hurried unduly. It was after five o'clock in the morning before the prisoners were safely lodged in the village lock-up, the injured one being carried upon a cottage door, which was hurriedly taken from its hinges for the purpose.

Eventually, Tom and Dora set out upon their homeward journey. The sleepy landlord of the "Britannia Arms," aroused at last by the unusual bustle in the village street, opened his bedroom window.

"Be you a-going to Davyhulme?" he queried.

"Yes."

"Ay?"—a pause of several minutes. "'Cause I might get the carriage ready."

"You might, in about a week," said Tom sharply. "I think we'd better walk. You can direct us there if you will."

"Ay?"—another long pause. "Follow the path till you reach the high road, and then ax agen," and he closed his window and returned to his warm bed, yawning heavily.

It was a lonely walk, and yet a happy one. They dawdled abominably on the way, although the air was bitterly cold, and the road in absolute darkness. You see, they had such a lot to say to each other. It was not that they actually said so much, but lovers can put a great deal of conversation into a mere squeeze of the elbow. However, when at last the snow-covered roof of the Grange came into view, their hearts beat faster, and for the first time during the journey they hurried forward. By tacit consent they made their way towards the lake, thinking to cross the ice, and so save about a hundred yards or more.

* * * * *

It was nearly eight o'clock in the morning. The poor old Squire, who had not been to bed all night, was sitting in his place at the breakfast-table. The note left by Dora had comforted him considerably, while creating a fresh anxiety in his mind. A dozen times during the meal he jumped from his chair at the sound of footsteps passing beneath the window, but each time the footsteps died away in the distance, and he sank into his place again with a groan.

The fact that it was Christmas morning caused him an additional sorrow. To be gloomy on this day of all days, was against all the traditions of his family. He played nervously with his ring, hoping no one saw how his hand trembled.

Suddenly a loud scream resounded through the house. Everybody sprang to their feet and rushed pell-mell towards the door, that is, everybody but the Squire, whose grey head sank helplessly upon his breast, as he waited for the last crushing blow.

Then the door was opened quietly, and two people entered, the others remaining in the hall.

"Father!"

And when the guests presently trooped back they brought such a roaring and cheering as made the old rafters ring again. The blinds were rattled out of sight in an instant, the fresh light of the morning poured radiantly across the merriest party that even the Squire—whose eyes were dim—had ever presided over, and it was Christmas Day at last.

Wal Frank.

Digitized by Google

ASTOUNDING SOCIETY REVELATIONS. BEGIN TO-DAY.

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter o Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penni less suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

LORD REGINALD DAVENANT. Another of Belinda's suitors.

LADY HONORIA. The Duke's sister.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister, who visits Cairo.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

HOW LADY PEGGY FINDS BELINDA.

WHILE staying at the Continental Hotel at Cairo, I lose my fortune by the failure of Hammond's Bank. I undertake, therefore, for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, to chaperon Belinda, the daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire, and to bring about her marriage with the son of some old and titled family. Staying at the same hotel in Cairo are the Duke of Eastacres, and his mother, the Duchess.

The Duchess and I agree that nothing could be better than a union of the Duke's title and Belinda's millions ; we do everything, therefore, to bring this about.

One evening, under the guidance of a fine-looking Bedouin, we all go to witness a religious festival. Some dervishes are dancing, when suddenly Belinda, excited beyond all self-restraint, throws herself into the midst of the fanatics and tries to imitate their weird dance. Instantly all is confusion. The guide snatches Belinda and hurries us away. Belinda is profuse in her thanks, and suddenly, with a cry of "Lady Peggy, he's not a dragoman at all, he's David Carr !" throws herself into his arms.

The dragoman is dismissed and on our return to the Hotel the Duchess of Eastacres takes me to task for the occurrence. I retort that not long ago I saw the Duchess' own daughter, Honoria, in the arms of a real Egpytian !

The Duchess is furious, calls Honoria, and, after storming at her, slaps her face. Belinda rushes in, rescues Honoria and takes her to her room.

Shortly afterwards a fearful shriek is heard, followed by an impassioned appeal for "Help !" The voice is Belinda's !

Rushing upstairs, I discover that Belinda has only just prevented Honoria poisoning herself to escape marriage with her cousin, Mark Striven. Later in the day we go to the Pyramids.

Lord Reginald Davenant, a new arrival at Cairo, accompanying the party, at one time in love with Mrs. Murchison-Lee, now transfers his affections to Belinda. The slighted Mrs. Lee, or "Midge," as she is called, is furious, and threatens violence to Belinda.

I checkmate Midge, however, by abstracting the morphia to which she is a slave), with the hypodermic syringe, from her dressing-case.

That same evening I suddenly discover the Duke of Eastacres and a new-comer, Stanley Forbes, in the midst of a violent altercation. Fearing that a duel may ensue, I rush between the two men.

Sending Eastacres off on some errand, I tax Stanley Forbes with quarrelling with the Duke in regard to a girl named Sheila Kenwyn. She had disappeared some time back ; it is thought the Duke is responsible for her disappearance. An open scandal about Eastacres would interfere with my matrimonial projects.

"Forego a quarrel with the Duke," I implore Stanley, "and I will extract Sheila's address from him."

Stanley consents. With some diplomacy I entrap the Duke into telling me where the girl is.

Next morning I start Belinda and the Duke off to Cairo, and tackle Stanley Forbes successfully in their absence. Later, I return to the Continental and find my labours rewarded. I behold Belinda clasped in the Duke's arms !

On offering my congratulations, however, Belinda repudiates all notion of an engagement with the Duke. She explains that her attitude is one merely of liking for him, and that when in token of friendship she gave her hand to her lover, she found herself embraced.

"I made Miss North a proposal of marriage," says the Duke. "She did not answer me in words, but put her hand in mine. Am I to be blamed if I misread her meaning ?"

I assure the Duke that his conduct has been quite natural, entirely blameless, and represent to Belinda that, after her behaviour, marriage with the Duke is inevitable, as I was not the only one who saw the Duke's embrace, and that unless her engagement to Eastacres is announced she will be looked upon as an immodest girl.

Belinda still refuses to regard herself as engaged, however, and as a last resource I threaten to send her back to her father. She consents under great pressure to an engagement in name only for a month. At the end of that time, when we shall be leaving Cairo, I promise to announce that the engagement has been broken off.

Close on her consent the door opens, David Carr enters, just sixty seconds late.

My influence had obtained an appointment for him at St. Petersburg, and he had come to say good-bye. The Duke lays his hand upon Belinda's arm, and remarks calmly, "We are just engaged."

"It is a lie !" cries David, and appeals to Belinda.

Digitized by Google

Then, for the first and only time while she is with me, Belinda faints. I turn the two men out of the room and get Belinda to bed. She asks for Honoria. That ungrateful girl brings a base advantage of my kindness and brings David Carr a message from my protegée.

"Belinda says she won't be married for a year, at least," announces Honoria. "Will you please come to her wedding?"

David, greatly comforted at the words, departs.

Our stay in Cairo now draws to a close, the Khedive's ball ending the season. I determine on that occasion to make a public announcement of Belinda's engagement to the Duke.

One night I discover that Belinda's pearls are missing. I go to the Duchess to consult her as to the best means of recovering them. Looking through the door of her room, I discover her Grace in the middle of the room, one hand raised in a threatening attitude towards her daughter, in the other lay Belinda's pearls! The Duchess explains to Honoria that Belinda gave her the pearls to take care of. Honoria retires to her own room and the Duchess proceeds to empty the contents of a trunk upon the floor. It contains all sorts of knick-knacks; amongst them I recognise a valuable fan of mine. The truth suddenly dawns on me. The Duchess is a kleptomaniac! I obtain the pearls from her Grace, on the plea that Belinda told me she was keeping them for her, but she will not give up my fan.

On the night of the Khedive's ball, Belinda publicly declares she is not engaged to Eastacres. The latter follows her to a side room to remonstrate. I am about to join them, when the Khedive enters into conversation with me.

From where I stand I see that Eastacres and Belinda are quarrelling. Suddenly through a door on the Duke's right a veiled woman appears. At sight of Eastacres she screams.

It is Honoria, who is about to elope with El Hamed, her Egyptian lover. She rushes towards the long French windows opening on the grounds. Eastacres darts forward to stop her. Belinda flies between them: Snatching up a lighted lamp from the corner of the room, she exclaims to the Duke:

"Go one step after Honoria and I dash this lamp at your feet!"

This Week's Instalment.
We Arrive in Paris.

To what tragic end Belinda's impetuosity might have led her, there is no saying. It is quite possible that she meant to endanger, indeed, would have endangered, the Duke's life, by upsetting the lamp, had not an unlooked-for turn come into the affair.

The sound of loud and angry voices, men's voices, from the palace grounds, distracted her attention. High above the masculine tumult sounded the thin, feminine tones of Honoria.

"Belinda!" she cried, "Belinda, come!"

At the cry Belinda wavered—so did the lamp. After a moment's hesitation she put down that formidable weapon, and gathering up her skirts, fled through the window in the direction of the tumult.

By this time, escaping from etiquette and the Khedive, I had made my way into the room. I arrived in time to view the end of Belinda's skirt vanishing in the distance.

"Duke," I cried, laying a restraining hand upon his arm, "don't go. Indeed, there's no necessity; Mark Striven is there, he'll look after Honoria. You will only come into collision with Belinda if you put in an appearance. It is much better for you to leave the affair to your cousin."

He hardly had the patience to hear me through.

"I must go," he said brusquely, and with that he went into the garden, whither I followed.

The scene was a strange and a romantic one. The first flush of the dawn was in the sky, the lights of the lanterns growing dim and sickly, paling before the god of the morning. And in that curious half light, under the shadow of a group of cypress trees, Mark Striven, the Englishman, faced Honoria's lover, El Hamed.

Grouped round them, at a short distance, were their followers. Tall, swarthy Bedouins formed El Hamed's body-guard, splendid-looking men, who gazed in cool contempt at the fellahs whom Mark Striven had enlisted in his cause.

"Mark!" The Duke's voice cut through his cousin's flood of wrath. "What is this?" He stepped between the two men as he spoke.

Instinctively they both fell back.

"This fellow—this ruffian," raved Mark, "has the impudence to say he came to meet Honoria. He——"

With a gesture the Duke stopped him.

"You fool," he whispered, "do you want to make the scandal worse? The whole Palace will hear what you are saying. Go quickly and watch the gates, and see Honoria does not pass through. While you were wasting time in abuse, she and Belinda will most likely have got clear of the place. Go!"

And Mark Striven went, the fellahs accompanying him.

"Now," the Duke turned to the Egyptian, "you have apparently some matter of dispute with that gentleman, my cousin. Can I be of any use in the matter?"

At this the Egyptian stepped forward, and, in a passion of Oriental eloquence, poured out his love and adoration for Honoria.

"He was of good blood, the son of an Egyptian lady and an Arab chief. He had command of a tribe, men such as these," and he pointed to the Bedouins at his back. "He had a palace, he possessed the confidence of his Lord the Khedive. He desired the Frankish maiden. He would pay her brother gold and precious stones for her. He——"

Eastacres interrupted his protestations.

"If he would call at the Continental and explain his intentions to the Duchess of Eastacres she would, perhaps, entertain his proposal for her daughter. In the meantime, the present situation, time, and place, were hardly suitable for the discussion." This with a ceremonious bow, that should have impressed El Hamed, but which appeared to have a contrary effect.

"I love her!" the young man cried, proudly defiant (imagine anyone loving poor Honoria!). "She has come to me of her own will, and I will keep her!" He drew a weapon from his tunic as he spoke, and waved it greatly excited. His followers drew nearer, their faces suddenly grown fierce.

I felt a sudden sickening fear of these wild, strange-looking men. It was like a glimpse into those far-off days when Mehemet Ali ruled Cairo by the sword—Franks and natives alike. Civilisation had cast but a thin veneer on Egypt after all. Under the surface polish there lay the cruel, ruthless nature of the primitive people. Cairo—save the Continental—seemed suddenly grown savage.

The Duke, as I have said, was by no means a coward, but he turned rather pale at El Hamed's menacing attitude, and would, I think, have called out for assistance—it being even more important to insure his safety than to avert scandal—had not Crawley Drummond and a few others of our set made their appearance.

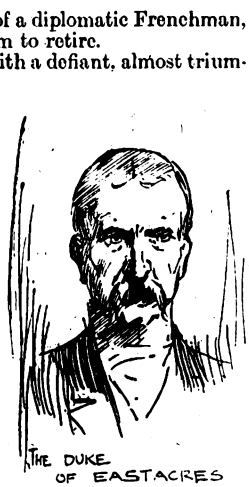
Drummond, with the assistance of a diplomatic Frenchman, quieted El Hamed, and induced him to retire.

He did so with a bad grace, and with a defiant, almost triumphant laugh.

"And now," I cried, "will someone please to find Belinda!"

"My dear Peggy," said Crawley, "you don't mean to say that Belinda's been eloping. I thought it was Honoria?"

"Crawley," I cried, "unless you desire to deprive me of my few remaining wits, you will, for once, be sensible. That awful, ungrateful and unmanageable girl, not content with making me the laughing-stock of Cairo, and insulting Eastacres in the presence of the Khedive, that awful girl, I say, has connived at Honoria's misconduct, and has gone off with her—where, I do not know."



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

Digitized by Google

Crawley gave a low whistle; the Duke had already gone towards the gates where Mark kept watch; with feelings of foreboding I clutched Crawley's arm, and went there too.

Mark Striven, the picture of rage and annoyance, was explaining volubly that he had not seen sign or token of either of the girls.

"They must have got out some other way," he said. "There are all sorts of dodges for escaping from this place."

His words struck consternation to my heart. If what he said were true, and Honoria and my charge had eluded him and found another means of egress from the grounds, it was evident they were at that moment wandering about the streets of Cairo—in evening dress and unattended.

If not, and the possibility was almost as terrible, they were hiding somewhere in the Palace or gardens. If this were so, the only means of finding them would be to institute a search—and let everybody know what we were searching for!

Crawley and his diplomatic friend suggested appealing to an official of the household, and in my disturbed mental condition I think I should have agreed, when the problem received an unexpected answer.

Lord Davenant, rather breathless, but very smiling, appeared at my elbow.

"I've had an awful chase to find you, Lady Peggy—couldn't think where you'd gone. I've come from Miss North, she's very tired, poor girl, quite fagged out, and wants to know if you're never going home. She's waiting for you in the dressing-room at the Palace."

Belinda at the Palace! All thought or care of Honoria's elopement left me at the news. In the excess of my relief I almost ran the distance from the gardens to where Belinda waited. For the moment my anger at her conduct in repudiating her engagement with the Duke was overshadowed by my thankfulness at finding her.

"Where have you been?" I said. "And where's Honoria?"

"Why do you ask me, Lady Peggy?" she said innocently. "I am so tired. Shall we go home?"

I looked at her suspiciously. I felt convinced that she knew more about Honoria's whereabouts than that weak-minded girl herself.

I was beginning to realise, however, that my fair-headed protegée was nearly as determined as myself—that if she did not want to do, or say, or like a thing, nothing would make her.

I silently adjusted my cloak, therefore, and accompanied by Belinda, swept through the already thinning ball room.

"What, going? So early? How disappointing!" Men and women alike gathered round us, prompted by curiosity—the desire to know the true inwardness of Belinda's treatment of the Duke. I frustrated their desires, however, and reached the entrance-hall without delay. There we were stopped by the Duke and Duchess of Eastacres.

"Lady Carstairs," his Grace said earnestly, "may I ask you a favour? My cousin has discovered that Honoria has gone to Boulag with the intention of embarking on a dahabieh there in port. My mother," he glanced at the Duchess, "is not equal to the strain of accompanying me. As her friend and mine, I implore you to take her place. Your presence will shield my unhappy sister from unfavourable comments. Will you come?"

I could not immediately give a reply. The selfishness and want of consideration of the request struck me as monstrous! Why on earth should Eastacres expect me to chase after his sister at three in the morning? Honoria was nothing to me, except an acquaintance—it was unreasonable to a degree to ask me to inconvenience myself on her account.

Belinda seemed to take a similar view.

"Poor Lady Peggy," she said softly, "she is so tired. Can't she go to the hotel and change her frock first? I'm afraid she'll take cold in this thin affair. Besides," she smiled sweetly, "it's quite possible Honoria may be there herself."

The Duke pounced on the words.

"Is she there, Miss North?" he said. "Answer me, please. Do you know that Honoria is at the Hotel?"

The Duke, like most people who came in contact with Belinda, was well aware of her extraordinary love of truth. He knew that nothing would make her say the thing that was not. Had she for once lapsed from her high ideal, framed what realists call "a lie," and boldly stated that to her own knowledge Honoria waited for us at the Continental, that young woman's future might have been different. As it was, habit was too strong for the girl. She hesitated, stammered, and at last, with evident embarrassment, suggested that the sooner we reached the Continental the quicker we should discover if Honoria were there.

This transparent diplomacy, needless to say, deceived no one. The Duke bowed and coldly thanked Miss North for her suggestion, remarking that if she and the Duchess would act on it and start forthwith they would be of great assistance.

Without further discussion he conducted his mother and Belinda down the steps and placed them safely in the carriage. Returning to me, he said, with much abruptness, "I don't ask you to excuse me, Lady Peggy; it is imperative that you accompany me."

The next minute I found myself beside the Duke, driving at a rapid rate through old Cairo in the direction of Boulag—a suburb of the city, with a port, and large, well-constructed docks.

For a while the Duke kept silence; then yielding, it would seem, to uncontrollable emotion, he leant forward, his face working with passion.

"You think I am beaten?" he said. "You are sorry for me and yet a little contemptuous? Was it possible to think a girl could find courage to act as Belinda did? But in the long run even her courage will not save her. I will break down her will. I will tame—subdue her! If it costs me my last penny I will cow her, I will risk all and everything to have and hold her for my own. No one has ever yet insulted and defied me with impunity and no one ever shall. I will break her spirit, I will lower her pride—you will not know her for the insolent girl who put such indignity upon me when she is my wife. For she shall be my wife—she shall find herself trapped, with her life and her beauty at my mercy. Then——" he laughed bitterly, "then it shall be for her to plead with me." He paused, exhausted by the outbreak, and throwing himself back upon the cushioned seat relapsed into silence.

His violence of speech did not altogether surprise me. I had long known that his impassive manner was but the cloak assumed to hide strong passions, fierce desires. That he would keep his word in regard to Belinda I felt sure. He would be determined and unscrupulous in his attempts to force her into marriage. The question for me to consider was how far I should assist him?

I decided to remain neutral for the present. I would not press his claims upon Belinda, neither would I ignore them. Failing other plans, it might be necessary to take extreme measures to coerce Belinda into matrimony. For the time being, however, that course did not commend itself. My old friend, the Marquise D'Arteuil, had asked me to spend the month of May at her hotel in Paris. She would, I knew, be quite pleased to see Belinda also. She had a nephew, the Comte de Sonnaz, a charming scapegrace, with an infinite capacity for wasting time and spending money. Belinda might be amenable to the charm of the Comte—his title was old and his family distinguished. I decided he should come next on the list of Belinda's suitors.

By this time we had reached our destination. The carriage stopped, we both alighted and walked towards the quay.

Digitized by Google

The sun was up, the glory of the day fell on as curious a scene as I have ever witnessed.

The docks at Boulag are crowded with crafts from every port.

There you may see rafts composed of jars lashed together. Vessels loaded with senna leaves, gathered in the far-off deserts by war-like Abadiehs, with elephants' tusks, rhinoceros horns, skins of jaguars and giraffes from Khartoum. Dahabieh craft, with elevated poops hailing from Osneh, with ivory, ostrich feathers, gum, and nitre transported from distant Abyssinia. Merchants from East and West, from every climate and every nation.

"Honoria was brought here in a litter," explained the Duke. "Belinda had evidently arranged with El Hamed to have a party of Arabs in waiting the other side of the Palace. They slipped out of sight while that fool Mark was arguing. It appears that the Egyptian has a dahabieh of his own, a gorgeous affair, Mark says, all gold and purple. There," the Duke pointed to a cumbersome sort of craft, "that must be the one. We'll go and inspect her."

The vessel appeared to be empty save for a negro and his small black boy. They grinned profusely, but were unable to give us much information, beyond the fact that this was El Hamed's boat and that he was expected that same morning. The Duke seemed at a loss how to act; I gazed round in despair—I was very tired and terribly hungry.

"It's impossible to search all these," I pointed to the innumerable craft crowding the docks, "and unless we search them everyone there's no chance of finding Honoria. After all, Duke, El Hamed may not be such an impossible match."

The Duke interrupted me with a sneering laugh.

"Pray spare me any more philosophy, Lady Peggy. You seem to forget that Honoria is engaged to Mark Striven."

I bit my lip and accepted the snub. At the same time, had I at that moment seen Honoria I should have turned my head the other way. I was angry with the Duke—I was excessively hungry!

As we were standing at the vessel's poop, undecided how to act, a little launch close at hand began to let steam off, shrieking, snorting, and whistling in deafening fashion. With my hands to my ears, I glanced towards the launch. As I did so, I caught a glimpse of a pink dress, a mass of dull brown hair, and the flutter of a soft, white shawl.

"Honoria!" I shrieked, and clasped Eastacres tightly by the arm.

The girl had heard her name, had seen her brother and myself, and, as might have been expected, immediately lost her head. If afterwards transpired that El Hamed had arranged for Honoria to meet him some miles down the river—she was to proceed on board the steam-launch, he following in the dahabieh. The scheme had been carefully thought out, and with any other girl would have succeeded. No one but Honoria, or an idiot, would have shown herself on deck until they were safely out of port. As it was, her liberty paid for the girl's foolishness.

The sight of Eastacres appeared to deprive Honoria of her last remnant of sense. She rushed wildly down the deck, and, seizing the captain with one hand, waved the other towards us. Her gestures told us she was urging him to start at once.

Eastacres acted promptly; springing over the side of the dahabyeh he jumped into the boat waiting to take us back to shore. Then, hauling me after him, he bade the man row for his life to the steam-launch, already, in response to Honoria's appeals, under weigh.

Eastacres excitedly shook his fist. "Stop," he shouted. "stop!"

The captain seemed to hesitate.

He had been paid for Honoria's passage. On the other hand, the girl's excitement, her hysterical outcries and undignified attitude, unfavourably impressed him. The Duke spoke with an air of authority—an air to which the sailor finally succumbed. The vessel slowed, the engines were reversed; we reached the ship, and scrambled up on deck in triumph!

Eastacres placed the facts of the case in a striking light before the captain. The lady, his sister, was unfortunately not strong—not entirely responsible for her actions at times. This explanation, accompanied by significant gestures, entirely satisfied the worthy sailor, who was ready to hand over the poor lady to her brother's care as soon as possible.

THE LADY HONORIA

The girl herself was more difficult to manage; she appealed to the seamen, rushed to the ship's side as if to throw herself into the sea, screamed for help, and generally misbehaved herself. After a while she grew quieter. Her show of spirit over, she was utterly crushed and dazed.

In silence we returned to the Continental. My presence, as Eastacres had foreseen, prevented scandal. Nobody ever knew the true history of Honoria's revolt.

Two days later she was married to Mark Striven at the British Consulate.

The Continental gave an "At Home" in her honour, at which the Duke made quite an affecting speech.

Everyone was charmed both with the speech and the wedding. Everyone except Belinda and the bride.

Of El Hamed, nothing more was heard.

Mark Striven, the Duke's cheque in his pocket, seemed in the best of spirits.

Honoria, silent and cheerless as a statue, stood beside him, until, just at the last, Belinda came towards her.

Then, with a low cry, she flung herself into the girl's arms.

"Promise me," she said wildly, "promise me, you won't be forced into a marriage like mine. You're strong and brave, not like me—they can't frighten you. They——" She broke off and began to sob in a fashion distressing to witness.

"I promise, dear," Belinda answered gently. "I will not marry any man except the one I love."

"Eastacres," said I later, as we watched the wedding carriage out of sight, "there'll be trouble yet with Honoria. You'd have done better to keep her single."

"I think not," he replied. "Honoria's likely to prove useful to me in the future; so is Mark."

He glanced towards Belinda as he spoke, and something of the nature of his meaning darted through my mind. I caught my breath, he frightened me.

If only Belinda would prove reasonable and listen to the Comte's proposals, I decided to gradually drop the Duke.

If not, if she still persisted in her obstinate attachment to young Carr—well, I did not care to dwell upon that possibility! At present there was no need. Belinda and I were going to Paris to meet the Comte. Eastacres was returning to England with the Duchess. The rest of our friends at the Continental, Midge, Lady Saxby, and Lord Davenant, were joining us in Paris a few weeks later on.

We left Cairo on an exquisite May morning. I was glad to go; much that was unpleasant had happened since I came there. I was once again on the fashionable treadmill, compelled to chaperon a wilful girl—to find a husband for Belinda!

Arrived in Paris, at the Hotel d'Arteine, we passed up the steps, through the vestibule, and into the marble hall. The Comte de Sonnaz came forward eagerly to receive us. He was a charming person, and Belinda seemed quite willing to be charmed.

They stood talking for a while. Of a sudden the girl's face clouded. She flushed and bit her lip.

The cause of her disturbance was not far to seek. Down the wide staircase came a slight, fair man—a smile upon his lips.

It was—the Duke!

(An intensely exciting instalment appears next Tuesday.)

Digitized by Google

Christine's Christmas Carol.

Which Brought Happiness to Two Homes.

SQUIRE ENDERBY sat meditating in his comfortable study. Outside the world was covered with a beautiful white mantle; the first snow had fallen, and though it was only the beginning of December, winter seemed to have fully asserted her sway.

And the Squire felt as though the cold of the outside world had gripped him, and was endeavouring to conquer him, and he shivered.

The memory of other Christmas-tides came before him; one by one the scenes of his life passed in silent pictures. The first showed himself and his young bride, and recalled their home-coming. That had been a white night, and the bells from the village church had first pealed forth a hearty welcome to the young Squire and his bride, and then changed their key to usher in the birthday of the Prince of Peace.

The next picture which flitted before him was a very different one. A dim room with a faint sweet scent, that suggested illness; doctors and nurses with anxious, pitying looks, and lying on the bed, as white as the world outside, his young wife. His for only two years, and then claimed by death.

Many other scenes passed in silent review. His little daughter, Frances, with her happy childhood, her affection and love doing much to heal the open wound her mother's absence had caused. Then another, and alas, the saddest picture of all.

Ambition had ever been his besetting sin, and it was due to it, that Colonel Mahon (his chosen crony, and a widower like himself), and he had decided to join their children's hands as well as their many acres. They agreed that Frances should wed the Colonel's Victor.

On the day, however, that the Squire informed his daughter of his plans for her future; to his great anger she refused to give her consent, and quietly told him she would marry none other than Lionel Chesleigh, a poor artist, known to her through being the brother of her greatest school friend.

Half-beside himself with fury at seeing his cherished castles thus fall, the Squire drove his daughter out of his home, for his violent threats of locking her up until she agreed to marry as he wished, so frightened the girl, that in desperation she ran off to her lover, and as soon as possible they were made man and wife.

That last picture was seven years old, and Squire Enderby's life since then had been bitter and cold; no wonder he shivered for the coming of the merry Christmas-tide meant nothing to him.

If only the old hall could have resounded to the patter of childish feet, the ringing, merry sound of childish voices; if his chosen son-in-law could be sitting with him, talking as man to man, taking the place of the son he had never known, and if his daughter could only have continued to be the Lady Bountiful of the little village, but, instead of that, he was all alone in a dreary and desolate home. And he would never forgive her.

His old friend the Colonel was dead and his son Victor had married a rich American. No one dared speak to him of his daughter except the vicar, the Rev. Wilson, but even his gentle pleading had not availed to touch the Squire's hard heart.

Frances Enderby, now Frances Chesleigh, was dead to her father, and always would be so.

Suddenly he heard a familiar voice, and, shaking off the memory of the past, he greeted his visitor.

"A cold night, vicar, why you look chilled to the bone; have some whisky, man, it'll put new life into you."

"Yes, Squire, I will, we are not growing younger, you and I, and the first breath of winter shows it. But I have come on important business. You know you have ever refused to allow me to tell you anything about Frances, or to read any of her letters, but certain events have happened, which make it imperative for you to know the true facts of the case. Hush! I am determined to speak, after that you can show me the door if you will, but we are old friends, Squire, and somehow I don't think you will."

"Speak, then, but be brief, as the subject does not interest me in the slightest," said the Squire in a bitter tone.

"Your daughter's husband has been very ill, is only now recovering from a bad attack of typhoid fever, and he will be unable to work for some time. As you are aware, he is an artist, and has no private means. His long illness has swallowed up all his hoard of savings. He must have good, strengthening food, if ever he is to become a strong man again, and there is no one but you to help. Frances has been a brick, and has kept the wolf from the door by teaching and doing needlework, but she cannot, much as she tries, do everything. Under the heavy strain, her health too is giving way, and unless you come to the rescue, her little child Christine will suffer cruelly and in all probability she will lose her husband.

"Now, Squire, I want you to do this. Have them here for Christmas, and get to know your son-in-law. You will never regret it, for a braver, more manly, young fellow does not exist; yes, I know, you say he tempted Frances to disobedience, but you must not forget, they were both very young and impetuous, and you frightened them. Let me go home and take them the glad news of your forgiveness, will you Squire? Life cannot be over bright for you now, but with their love, with the affection of their little one, who is the dearest little child you can imagine, with a look of your wife about her, with all this, you would soon become a happy man again."

Then the vicar stopped. He could say nothing further—his heart failed him now, yet he tried to hope for the best for the sake of that trio, whom he had safe for a few days, but unless some one more able than he came to the rescue, they must surely sink. Would the Squire forgive?

"You say, 'let me go home,' Vicar, so I gather you have the brood staying with you; well, keep them there, cherish them, only at your expense, not mine; not a penny shall go to help them. Take my daughter, Frances, this message from her father—my CURSE; tell her I pray she may never be happy, may never know real happiness again, that is my final answer. I was her father, had been mother and father both, yet at the first whisper from that poor will-of-the-wisp, she left me, and set my cherished wishes at naught, and gave me up to a lonely old age. I will never forgive her, and never willingly set eyes on her again. Take this as my last words—Squire Enderby has no Daughter."

Digitized by Google

* * * * * *

The vicarage was poorly furnished but it was comfortable and cosy, and everything that it was possible to do for their guests had been done by the kind vicar and his wife.

Lionel Chesleigh lay on a couch, anxiously watching the clock, awaiting the Rev. Wilson's return. Very much did he blame himself for persuading his wife to set her father's wishes at defiance, for to see her enduring such sordid poverty, and to be quite unable to help her, was a bitter pill. And unlike his wife, he had no hope that her father would relent, and then what would become of them all, particularly the little one, now sitting on Mrs. Wilson's knee, chatting about her mumsey's father, whom she wanted to see.

Poor Frances Chesleigh, she could not believe that the father who had adored her would remain obdurate for ever; surely he would relent, and once he made Lionel and Christine's acquaintance, he must love them.

The vicar entered, bringing flakes of snow with him, and one glance at his worn face told the answer he brought back.

No one spoke, till little Christine, seeing his eyes fixed on her, ran to him and said:

"Won't mumsey's dada let Christine sing him her carol?"

"What is Christine's carol, darling?"

"'Christ that once amongst us.' Mumsey taught it to me because when she was a little girl like me, she always used to sing it, and when I see her dada, I am to sing it to him."

"Perhaps you will some day, my child, but not just now," said the good man gently. Surely his friend could not continue adamant, if he held this sweet little one in his arms, but how and what could be done?

That night there was a great discussion between the Wilsons and their guests as to ways and means. It was finally settled that Frances must return to London and continue her work, and thus keep together the little home, and while she did that, they would remain in safety at the vicarage with their kind friends.

"And I'll soon get strong, Frances darling, and then I can paint again, and we'll forget all these hard times," said Lionel, bravely striving to hide how physically ill he felt; but she understood and knew also, that however kind the Wilsons were, their scanty means would be quite unable to provide him with the strengthening food he needed.

And when they returned for the night, the Vicar thought and thought, till presently a smile shone on his worn face, and he uttered a glad "Hurrah." He had settled on a plan to win the Squire's forgiveness.

* * * * *

It was Christmas Eve, and in the school-room of Enderby parish the choir boys had collected, ready to start on their annual round to sing their carols and to receive a very hearty and substantial welcome for the messages of love and peace that they brought.

Amongst them was Christine; her little form dancing with excitement, the golden curls roaming over the dainty little face, which seemed brimful of happiness, for she was going to do something to help dada and mumsey.

"Do you quite understand, boys," said the Vicar, rather anxiously, "Lisle, I depend on you, take every care of the child and leave her at the vicarage after you have been to the Hall."

"Trust us, sir, she shan't come to any harm," the boys answered, and with happy hearts they started.

The Hall was their first destination; though most people said the Squire was hard and cold, the youthful population of Enderby knew differently. He was always kind to them, and after their carols had been sung, they were sure of receiving a bountiful supply of cakes, ginger ale, and fruit, while, as they took their leave, each one would be presented with a new shilling.

They all understood who the little girl was, and many of them could remember the Squire's daughter. Their instructions had been, not to tell the Squire who she was, but, if possible, to let her sing her little carol by herself, and thus gain the Squire's attention. And they were all proud of having her with them, and loved to hear her little voice joining in with theirs, and she herself was very happy.

The Squire was expecting his young visitors, and had left his study windows unshuttered, so that he might see them as they stood and sang.

He knew all of their faces, but the presence of a little girl surprised him. She was a stranger, probably a cousin of one of them, he thought, and he laughed as he watched her eager little face and noticed how heartily she seemed to be singing, and all the boys appeared to be regarding her as a little queen. She was a very pretty child, too, he wondered whose child she was, and what brought her there.

But it was very cold for her, standing out there in the snow, what could her mother be thinking about to let a little mite like that go about singing?

Opening his window, he called:

"Come in, all of you, and finish your singing inside. What was her mother doing, Lisle, to send that child out with you?" And before Lisle could answer he had taken Christine and lifted her on his knee.

But the child struggled to get down.

"Please, please let me sing with the boys! Dada said I must or I would not help mumsey," and, seeing her distress, he put her down, and she went back to Lisle, and stood by his side.

It was a pretty picture; the big room with its beautiful black oak furniture, the pictures all wreathed with ivy and holly, and the fine figure of the Squire seated by a fire of enormous proportions, composed chiefly of logs; the boys standing in the centre of the room, sturdy bright specimens of English youth, and the little girl in their midst, endeavouring to sing as loudly as her companions. In the background the servants had formed a group; they all knew who Christine was, and they all fervently hoped that the Squire would forgive Miss Frances and let her come back to them, for she had been a great favourite.

When the carols were exhausted, with the same zeal as they had sung, the boys tucked in at the good cheer provided, and then Christine suffered herself to be taken to the Squire's side and shyly made friends with him, and graciously accepted the biscuits he offered.

But she was troubled. Something was wrong; they had told her she might sing her carol, and she had not done so.

"Please can I sing you my carol?" she asked the Squire anxiously.

"Yes, dear, if you will sit on my knee," which she consented to do; and then there was silence as she commenced to warble in her sweet childish voice, the hymn her mother had taught her. As he heard it the Squire trembled, for it was the very hymn Frances had sang, when she, too, was a tiny child. Every Sunday she would come and sit on his knee and sing to him and recite her simple hymns. He began to wonder where she was, and if things were really as bad as Wilson had said, and he suddenly resolved to walk down to the vicarage, and perhaps, well, he hardly knew what he would say or do, and then the little voice rang through the room.

"Where none thirst or hunger," and a remorseful feeling seized him. Frances and her child might be suffering and in want! He would go at once, and he put the child down gently and kissed her, saying:

"Thank you, my dear, for your carol. Boys, I have to go somewhere; eat as much as you like"; but as he got to the door, he remembered their shillings, and called to the butler to distribute them.

And when he was gone, the old servants took the little girl and made a great fuss of her. They had all been surprised at the Squire's abrupt departure, and all hoped that his heart had been touched by the childish voice.

Down through the snow Squire Enderby went, straight to his old friend. What if he were too late, and Frances' husband had died! But, no, he would not think of that! His forgiveness should be complete; they should all come

(Concluded at foot of next page.)

Digitized by Google

TEN MORE GRAMOPHONES.

Here is an Excellent Chance for You.

After reading our opening instalments of "The Albert Gate Mystery," you ought to be imbued with the detective spirit.

Here is an Opportunity for You to Test Yourself.

Below you will find a picture of a room which has been entered by burglars, who have not gone away empty-handed. Carefully study the picture, and find out what has been stolen.

For instance, the disarranged glass shade on the mantelpiece points obviously to the fact that something has been taken from under it. Other evidences of theft will help you in detecting what is missing. Write on the back of a postcard a list of the stolen articles, and send it to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, W.C., marking your postcard, in the top left-hand corner, "Burglar."

A handsome Gramophone will be presented to each of the ten competitors who send in the most complete list.

All attempts must reach us not later than first post on Tuesday morning, December 23rd.

back with him to the Hall, and in their happiness he would be young again.

The touch of Christine's baby fingers had loosened the hard crust that had settled on his heart, and he thought with tears in his eyes of the days long ago, when Frances had nestled against him in the same way.

The vicar and his wife were out, but he was shown into the drawing-room to wait and there on the couch he saw someone lying; someone, who surprised at seeing him, started up and said:

"Where is Christine? What have you done with my child?"

And then the Squire understood it all.

The little girl who sang her carol and sat on his knee must be his own grandchild, and this gaunt-looking man must be his son-in-law. In a few minutes everything was explained, and the proud old Squire was doing his utmost to cheer the invalid.

And the family party was soon complete, for the Vicar brought in Christine, who was delighted to find that her big friend was really mumsey's dada, and was quite content to be made love to by him; and Frances, who arrived shortly after, expecting only to be able to stay just for Christmas and then to return to work, was overcome with thankfulness.

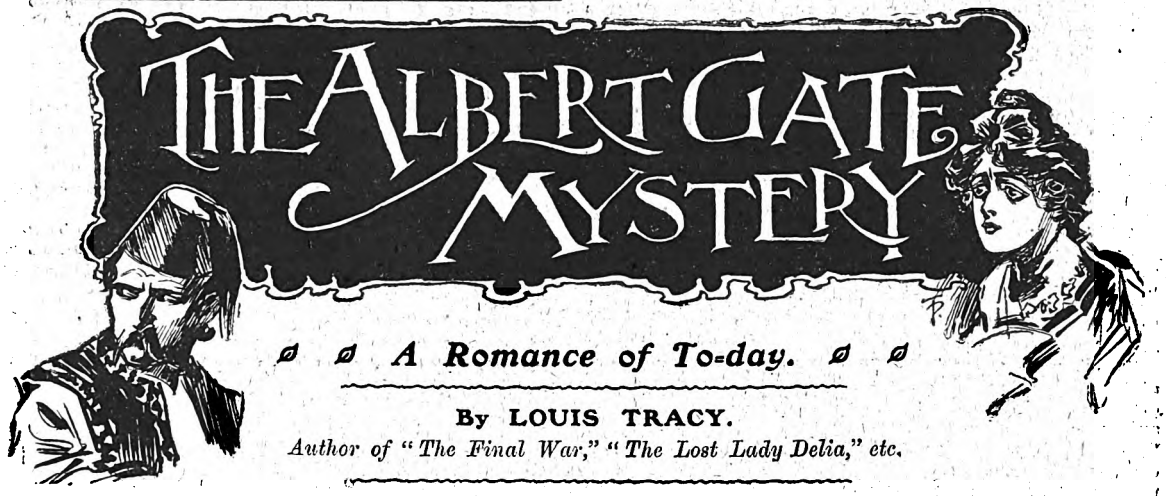
And very soon the Hall resounded with cheerful voices and the patter of childish feet was heard, and there was always the heartiest welcome for the village choir boys, for through hearing Christine's carol, happiness had been won.

And the good Vicar was not the least content at having conceived the little plot.

Robert Murray.

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.



A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

MYSTERIOUS OCCURRENCE IN THE WEST END.

An affair of some magnitude—perhaps a remarkable crime—has taken place in an Albert Gate Mansion.

Owing to the reticence of the authorities, it is at present impossible to arrive at a definite conclusion as to the nature or extent of the incident, but it is quite certain that public interest will be much excited when details are forthcoming. All sorts of rumours attain credence in the locality, the murder of several prominent persons being not the least persistent of these. Without, however, giving currency to idle speculation, several authentic statements may be grouped into a connected form.

Four weeks ago a party of Turkish gentlemen of high rank in Constantinople, arrived in London and took up their abode in the house in question, after some structural alterations pointing at great security within and without, had been planned and executed.

Attending these Turkish gentlemen, or officials, was a numerous suite of Moslem guards and servants, whilst, immediately following their arrival, came from Amsterdam, some dozen noted experts in the diamond-cutting industry. These were lodged in a neighbouring private hotel, where they were extremely uncommunicative as to their business in London. They were employed during the day at the Albert Gate house. The presence in the mansion, both day and night, of a strong force of Metropolitan police, tended to excite local curiosity to an intense degree, but no clear conception of the business of the occupants was allowed to reach the public.

Whatever it was that took place, the full particulars were not only well-known to the authorities—the presence of the police hints even at Governmental sanction—but matters proceeded on normal lines until yesterday morning.

Then it became clear that a remarkable development must have occurred during the preceding night, as the whole of the Dutch workmen and the Turkish attendants were taken off in cabs by the police, not to Morton Street Police Station, but to Scotland Yard, this in itself being a most unusual course to adopt. They are unquestionably detained in custody, but they have not yet been charged before a magistrate.

The police, later in the day, carried off some of these men's personal belongings, from both hotel and mansion.

A sinister aspect was given to the foregoing mysterious proceedings by the presence at Albert Gate, early in the day, of two police surgeons, who were followed, about twelve o'clock, by Dr. Tennyson Coke, the greatest living authority on toxicology.

Dr. Coke and the other medical gentlemen subsequently refused to impart the slightest information as to the reasons that led the police to seek their services, and the Scotland Yard authorities are adamant in the matter.

The representative of a news agency was threatened with arrest for trespass when he endeavoured to gain admission to the Albert Gate house, and it is quite evident that the police are determined to prevent the facts from leaking out at present—if they can by any means accomplish their wishes.

Such is the statement which Mr. Brett, barrister and detective, reads in the morning paper.

He has hardly finished its perusal when the Earl of Fairholme is announced.

He states that he has called regarding the Albert Gate crime. He is engaged, as he explains, to Miss Talbot, the niece of the late Admiral Talbot, at present living with her uncle, General Sir Hubert Fitz-James.

The Sultan, he continues, recently sent over to England some priceless diamonds in the charge of a special envoy. The diamonds being of political importance, the British Foreign Office places the envoy under the care of Mr. Jack Talbot, Miss Talbot's brother. The envoy is lodged in the Albert Gate Mansion, under police surveillance.

One morning the chief of the Turkish mission, his two secretaries, and a confidential servant are found murdered, the diamonds stolen and Mr. Jack Talbot vanished, though the police are on the premises at the time.

The Earl wants Brett to find Jack Talbot.

In conjunction with the Scotland Yard officials Brett commences operations. A search is first made of the Albert Gate Mansion, Mr. Winter the detective, and two inspectors assisting.

The Piece in the Screen.

During the inspector's running comments Brett had carefully scrutinised each of the windows. He at once came to the conclusion, by a simple analysis of the possibilities, that by no other means than through the barrier of iron wire had the diamonds passed out of the house; but the most thorough examination failed to reveal any loophole by which this achievement had been accomplished. He opened each of the windows, tested every iron bar, and saw that the fastenings of the external blind were undisturbed, whilst the fine wire mesh showed no irregularities in its hexagonal pattern, wherein any defect would at once be visible.

Digitized by Google

"We have done all that long since, sir," said the second police-officer, smiling at the obviousness of an amateur's method of inspection, for it happened that he had never met the barrister before, though he had often heard of him.

"You have?" said Brett, with the slightest tinge of sarcasm in his voice. "Did you do this?" and he commenced to thump with a clenched fist upon every portion of the external screen that he could reach.

"No, we did not," said the policeman, "and I don't see that it is going to accomplish anything except hurt your hand."

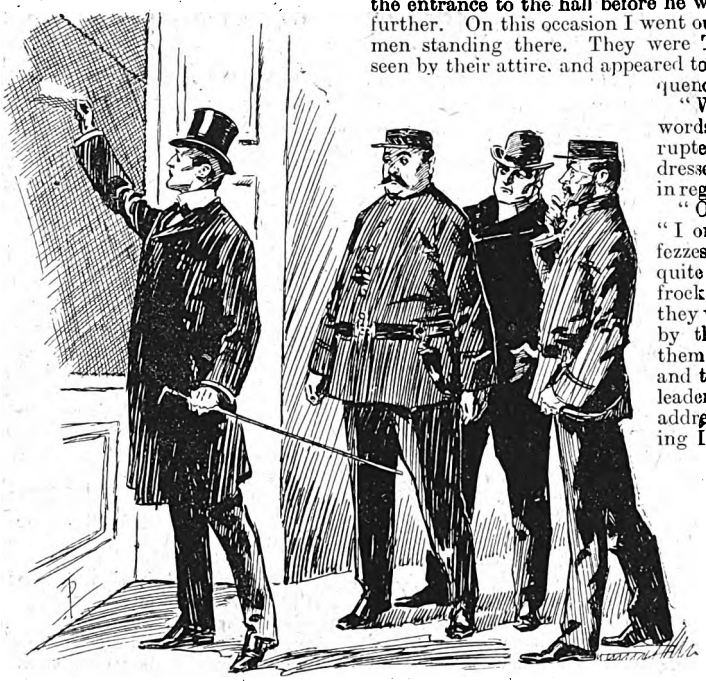
"That may be so," said Brett, "but the diamonds went this way and none other." He tested every portion of one window screen in this manner without effect. Then he approached the second window, and, beginning at the left-hand top corner, did the same thing. Suddenly an exclamation came from the three interested watchers. In the centre of the lower part of the screen Brett's hand made a visible impression upon the iron wire. Using no more force than had been applied to other portions, the blow served to tear a section of the blind about eight inches across. Instantly the barrister ceased operations and, producing a pocket-microscope, minutely examined the rent.

"I expected as much," he said, taking hold of the torn part of the screen and giving it a vigorous pull, with the result that a small piece, measuring about eight inches by six, came bodily out. "This has been cut away, as you will see, by some instrument which did not even bend the wire. It was subsequently replaced, whilst the fractured parts were sufficiently cemented by some composition to retain this section in its place, and practically defy observation. There was nothing for it but force to reveal it thus early. No doubt in time the composition would have dried, or been washed away, and then this bit of the screen would have fallen out by the action of wind and weather. Here, at any rate, is a hole in your defensive armour."

He held out the convicting piece to the discomfited Sharpe, who surveyed it in silence.

It was no part of Brett's business in life, however, to snatch plaudits from astounded policemen.

"This is a mere nothing," he continued. "Of course there must have been some such means of getting the diamonds off the premises. Let us return to the ante-room, and there you can tell me the exact history of events on Monday evening."



Suddenly an exclamation broke from the watchers. The wire screen had been opened.

The Murders.

In less confident tones Inspector Walters resumed his narrative—

"On Monday evening, sir," he said, "about eight o'clock, his Excellency and the two secretaries were dining downstairs, and matters had, thus far, gone on with the same routine as was observed every preceding day. The workmen quitted work at six o'clock. The three gentlemen went out for a drive as soon as everything was locked up, and came in again at a quarter to eight. They did not change their clothes for dinner, so there was no occasion to search them, as no one had gone upstairs since they had descended soon after six. They had barely started dinner when someone called at the front door, and I was sent for. The door bell, I may explain, was always answered by one of the house servants, and he, if necessary, admitted any person who came, closing the door, but the visitor had to be examined by the policeman stationed at the entrance to the hall before he was permitted to come any further. On this occasion I went out and found three gentlemen standing there. They were Turks, as could be easily seen by their attire, and appeared to be persons of some consequence."

"What do you mean by the words 'their attire'?" interrupted Brett. "Were they dressed in European clothes or in regular Turkish Garments?"

"Oh," said the inspector, "I only meant that they wore fezzes; otherwise they were quite accurately dressed in frock coats and the rest, but they were unmistakably Turks by their appearance. Two of them could speak no English, and the third, who acted as the leader of the party, first of all addressed me in French. Finding I did not understand him, he used very broken, but fairly intelligible English. What he wanted was to be taken at once to his Excellency, Mehemet Ali Pasha.

"I said that his Excellency was dining, and that perhaps he had better call in the morning, but he replied that his business was very urgent, and he could not wait. He made me understand that if I sent in the cards of himself and his companions they would certainly be admitted at once. I did not see any harm in this, so I took the three cards and gave them to Hussein, who was crossing the hall at the moment."

"As the cards were printed in Turkish characters, you could not, of course, tell what the names were," said Brett.

A look of blank astonishment crossed the inspector's face as he replied: "That is a very clever guess, but it is so. The hieroglyphics on the piece of pasteboard were worse than Greek. However, Hussein glanced at them. He appeared to be surprised; then at once went into the dining-room, returning with the message that the gentlemen were to be admitted. Of course I had nothing else to do but to let them in, which I did, accompanying them myself to the door of the dining-room, and making sure, before the door was closed, that their presence was expected."

"How did you do that?" said Brett.

"Well, although they spoke in what I suppose was Turkish, it is not very difficult to distinguish by a man's tones whether his reception of unexpected visitors is cordial or not, and there could be no doubt that the visiting cards had conveyed such names to His Excellency as warranted the introduction of the party into the house. The six gentlemen remained in the dining-room until 9.17 (I have the time noted here in my pocket-book). They then came out and went upstairs in a body to the ante-room, where they all sat down, as I could tell by the movement of chairs overhead, and in a few minutes Hussein was rung for to bring cigarettes and coffee. This was at 9.21. Hussein was searched as he came downstairs after receiving the order, and again at 9.30 when he returned after executing it. I was relieved at ten o'clock, and beyond describing the three gentlemen, I know nothing more about the business."

Digitized by Google

"They were well dressed?" said Brett; "they impressed you as Turkish gentlemen by their features, and they wore fezzes?"

"Yes," said the policeman, with a smile; "but there was a little more than that."

"It is of no importance," said Brett.

"But really it must be," urged the inspector. "One of them, the man who spoke to me, had had a bad sword cut across his right cheek, whilst another squinted horribly; besides, they were all elderly men."

"Pardon me, inspector," said Brett, "but you admit, no doubt, that this is a very remarkable crime I am investigating."

"I should just think it is, sir," was the answer.

"Well, now, does it not strike you that the perpetrators thereof, who were not afraid to be scrutinised by yourself and by several other policemen, and to be searched and further scrutinised by a different set of officers when they came out again, would be very unlikely persons to bear about them such distinguishing characteristics as would lead to their arrest by the first youthful police-constable who encountered them. I do not want to be rude, or to indicate any lack of discretion on your part, but, from my point of view, I would vastly prefer not to be furnished with any description of these three persons, nor would I care to have seen them as they entered or left the house."

"Well, that is very curious," said Inspector Walters, dropping his hands on his knees in sheer amazement at such an extraordinary statement from a man whose clearness and accuracy of perception had been so fully justified by the incident of the window-blind.

"And now, Mr. Sharpe," said Brett, turning to the other officer, "what did you observe?"

"I came on duty at ten o'clock, sir; posted my guards, and received from Inspector Walters an exact account of what had taken place before my arrival. Inspector Walters had hardly quitted the house, when one of the junior members of the mission came downstairs with a note which he asked me to send by a constable at once to Mr. Talbot."

"You are quite sure he was one of the members of the mission?" said Brett.

"Perfectly certain. I have seen him every previous night for nearly a month, as the gentleman often went out late to the Turkish Embassy, and elsewhere. I sent the note, as requested, and Mr. Talbot came back with the constable in about twenty minutes. Mr. Talbot went upstairs accompanied by Hussein; Hussein came down, was searched, went down to the kitchen, brought up more coffee, and never appeared again. The next time I saw him was about noon yesterday, when we broke open the door, and found his dead body. At 11.25, Mr. Talbot, accompanied by the one whom my friend has described as the spokesman of the strangers, came down the stairs. Mr. Talbot looked somewhat puzzled, but not specially worried, and submitted himself to the searching operation as usual. The other man seemed to be surprised at this proceeding, but offered no objection when his turn came, and said something laughingly in French to Mr. Talbot, when he had to take his boots off. The two gentlemen went outside and called a cab. Mr. Talbot got in, and the constable at the door heard the foreigner say, 'Tell the driver to go to the Carlton Hotel.' He repeated it twice, so as to make sure the man would make no mistake.

"Then they drove off, and there was no further incident to report until five minutes past twelve, when the other two foreigners came downstairs. Then we had a bit of a job as they knew no English, and one of our men, who could speak French, found that they did not understand that language. However, at last in dumb show, we got them to perceive that everybody who came downstairs had to be searched. They submitted at once, and I took special care that the investigation was complete. There was nothing upon them to arouse the slightest suspicion, no weapons of any sort beyond a small pocket-knife carried by one man, and not much in the way of either papers or money. Before going out one of them produced a small card on which was written 'Carlton Hotel.'

"I took it that this was their residence, so I instructed a constable to see them into a cab and tell the driver where to take them. I also showed them how much money to give the cabman. None of the gentlemen upstairs put in an appearance, nor did I hear them retire to rest. To make quite sure that all was right, I and a sergeant, who looked in a little later, went upstairs and tried the door of the ante-room. This was locked, and everything was quiet within, so we returned to the hall, and the night was passed in the usual manner. Hussein always made his appearance about eight o'clock in the morning, when he came down to procure coffee for his Excellency and the others. As he did not show up I wondered what had become of him. When nine o'clock came, I determined to investigate matters. By that time the diamond-cutters had put in an appearance, and were gathered in the hall, undergoing a slight search preparatory to their day's work."

"How many of these men were there?" said Brett.

"Fourteen exactly. They were mostly Dutchmen, with, I think, three Belgians. Taking a constable with me I went upstairs and ascended to the second storey, where I knew his Excellency's suite was situated, and where I expected to find Hussein asleep on a mat in front of the bedroom door. The mat was there, but no Hussein.

"Then I went higher up to the rooms occupied by the two assistants. Here I knocked, but received no answer. One door was locked, the other was open, so I went in, but the room was empty and the bed had not been slept upon. This seemed to me so strange that I knocked loudly at the other door, with no result. I then returned to his Excellency's floor and hammered at the door, which was locked, sufficiently to wake the soundest sleeper that ever lived. This again was useless, so I returned downstairs and sent off two messengers post haste—one to Mr. Talbot, and the other to the Commissioner of Police at Scotland Yard.

"The man who went to Mr. Talbot's house returned first, bringing the startling information that Mr. Talbot had not been home all night, and that his uncle and sister were anxious to know where he was, as they had received no message from him since he quitted the house the previous night at 10.15.

"The Commissioner of Police came himself a little later. By that time Inspector Walters had reached here for his turn of day duty, and after a hasty consultation we decided to break in all the doors that were locked, commencing with that of the second assistant. His room was empty, and so was his Excellency's, neither apartment having been occupied during the night.

"We then returned to the first-floor and forced the door of the ante-room which, we discovered, was only secured by a spring latch, the lower lock not having been used. As soon as we entered the room, we found the four dead men. Hussein, the servant, was nearest the door and was lying in a crumpled-up position. He had been stabbed twice through the back and once through the spinal column at the base of the neck. His Excellency and the two assistants were seated in chairs, but had been stabbed through the heart. The instrument used must have been a long, thin dagger or stiletto. There was no sign of it anywhere in the room, and most certainly none of the men who came out the previous night had such a weapon concealed upon him.

Digitized by Google

"Doctors were at once sent for and the first medical gentlemen to arrive said that each of the four had been dead for many hours, but they also imagined that the coffee, the remains of which we found in some cups on the table, had been drugged. So, before disturbing the room and its contents in any way, the Commissioner sent for Dr. Tennyson Coke.

"After careful investigation Dr. Coke came to the same conclusion as the other gentlemen. He believes that his Excellency and the two assistants were first stupefied by the drug and then murdered as they sat in their chairs, whilst the appearance of Hussein and the nature of his wounds seemed to indicate that he had been unexpectedly attacked and killed before he could struggle effectually or even call for assistance.

"Of course the diamonds had vanished, whilst in the safes or on the table we found the keys which had evidently been taken from his Excellency's pockets. We were all puzzled to account for the disappearance of the diamonds and the dagger, but you have effectually shown the means whereby they were conveyed off the premises. Dr. Coke took away the coffee for the purpose of analysis. The four bodies were carried to the mortuary in Chapel Place, and the fourteen workmen were conveyed to Scotland Yard, not because we have any charge against them, but the Commissioner thought it best to keep them under surveillance until the Turkish Embassy had settled what was to be done with them, in the matter of paying such wages as were due and sending them back to Amsterdam. The men themselves, I may add, were quite satisfied with our action in the matter. That is really all I have to tell you."

"It is quite clear, then," said Brett, "that two men succeeded in murdering four and in getting away with their plunder and arms without creating the slightest noise or exciting any suspicion in your mind."

"That is so," said Inspector Sharpe ruefully.

"Then," said Brett, "there is nothing else to be done here. Will you come with me, Mr. Winter?"

"Where to, sir?" said the detective.

"To find Mr. Talbot, of course."

"Easier said than done," remarked Inspector Walters, as the door closed behind them.

Inspector Sharpe was less sceptical.

"He's a very smart chap is Brett," he said. "Neither you nor I thought about punching that wire-screen, did we?"

A Startling Clue.

Once clear of the Albert Gate mansion, the barrister was bound to confess to a sense of indefiniteness, a feeling of uncertainty, which seldom characterised either his thoughts or his actions. He admitted as much to his companion, for Brett was a man who would not consent to pose under any circumstances.

"It is quite true," he explained, "that our first duty must be to find Mr. Talbot, and it is still more certain that we will be able to accomplish this part of our task, but there are elements in this inquiry which baffle me at present."

"And what are they, sir?" said the detective.

"I fail to see," replied Brett thoughtfully, "why Mr. Talbot was dragged into the matter at all. On the straightforward assumption that Turks were engaged in the pleasant occupation of taking other Turks' lives—an assumption to which, by the way, I attach no great amount of credence—why did they not allow Mr. Talbot to go quietly to his own home? It was not that they feared more speedy discovery of their crime. The hour was then late; it was tolerably certain that he would make no move which might prove injurious to them until next morning, and then the whole affair was bound to be discovered by the police in the ordinary course of events."

"I don't quite follow you, sir," said Winter, with a puzzled tone in his voice. They had, for the sake of quietude, turned into the Park, and were now walking towards Hyde Park Corner. "What do you mean by saying that Mr. Talbot would make no move in the matter until next morning?"

"Oh, I forgot," said Brett. "Of course you don't know why the diamonds were stolen?"

"For the same reason that all other diamonds are stolen, I suppose."

"Oh, dear no," laughed the barrister. "This is a political crime."

"Political!" said the amazed policeman.

"Well, we won't quarrel about words, and as there are perhaps no politics in Turkey, we will call it dynastic or any other loud-voiced adjective which serves to take it out of the realm of simple felony. Why? I cannot at this moment tell you, but you may be perfectly certain that the disappearance of those diamonds from the custody of Mehemet Ali Pasha will not cause the Sultan to sleep any more sound of nights."

"What beats me, Mr. Brett," said the detective, viciously prodding the gravel path with his stick, "is how you ferret out these queer facts—fancies some people would call them, and that is what I myself used to do until I knew you better."

"When we burst open the door we found four dead men."

"In this case it is simple enough. By mere chance I happened to read this morning that there had been some little domestic squabble in Royal circles at Constantinople. I don't know whether you are acquainted with Turkish history, Mr. Winter, but it is a well-recognised principle that any Sultan is liable to die of diseases which are weird and painfully sudden; for instance, the last one is popularly supposed to have plunged a long pair of scissors into his jugular vein; others have drunk coffee that has disagreed with them, or smoked cigarettes that were too highly perfumed. In any case, the invariable result of these eccentricities has been that a fresh Sultan occupied the throne. Now, don't forget that I am simply theorising, for I know no more of this business than you do at this moment, but I still think that you will find some connection between my theory and that which has actually occurred. At any rate, I have said sufficient to prove to you the importance of not being too ready to make arrests."

Digitized by Google

"I quite see that," was the thoughtful rejoinder. "But you must not forget, sir, that we in Scotland Yard are bound by rules of procedure. Perhaps you will not mind my suggesting that a word from you to the Foreign Office might induce the authorities to communciate officially with the Home Department, and then instructions could be issued to the police, which would leave the matter a little more open than we are able to regard it under the existing conditions."

"I will see to that," said the barrister. "When does the inquest take place?"

"This evening at six."

"It will be adjourned, of course?"

"Oh, yes; no evidence will be given beyond what is necessary for purposes of identification, and this can be supplied by the police themselves and an official from the Turkish Embassy."

"Very well. You will mention to no one the theory I have just explained to you?"

"Not if you wish it, sir."

"I do wish it at present. Which way are you going?"

"Straight to the Yard."

"In that case I will accompany you a portion of the distance."

They had now reached Hyde Park Corner, and, hailing a hansom, Brett told the driver to stop outside the Carlton Hotel. The man whipped up his horse and drove in the direction of Constitution Hill, evidently intending to avoid the congested traffic of Piccadilly and take the longer, but more pleasant, route through the Green Park and the Mall.

"By the way," said Brett, "did the driver of the hansom which conveyed Mr. Talbot and his companion from Albert Gate on Monday night tell you which road he followed?"

"Yes," said the detective, "he followed the same road that this chap is taking."

Brett rubbed his hands, with a queer expression of thoughtful pleasure on his keen face.

"Ah," he said, "I like that. It is well to be on the scent."

"You mean," laughed the other, "that we are acting as sleuth hounds, because that is what the American novel-writer generally calls detectives."

"The simile will suffice," said Brett. He did not explain to his professional confrère that it was a positive stimulant to his abounding energy and highly-strung nerves to find that he was actually following the path taken by the criminal whom he was pursuing. The mere fact lent reality to the chase. For a mile, at any rate, there could be no mistake, though he might expect a check at the Carlton. Arrived there, Brett alighted.

"Are you going to make any inquiries in the hotel, sir?" said Mr. Winter.

"Why should I?" said Brett. "You have already ascertained from the management that no person, even remotely resembling any of the parties concerned, is staying at the hotel."

"Yes, confound it, I know I did," cried the other, "but I never told you so."

"That is all right," laughed Brett. "Come and see me at my chambers this evening when the inquest is finished. Perhaps by that time we may be able to determine our plan of action."

(A further long instalment of this splendid tale will be published next Tuesday.)

Why they Were Glad.

Tommy: "So glad you've come, Mr. Bowlegs!" Mr. Bowlegs (fishing for compliments): "And why are you so glad I've come, my little man?" Tommy: "Ethel and I are playing at trains, and you'll make such a lovely bridge."

YOUR EDITOR CHATS.

I must first of all say that I sincerely hope that you feel you have got full value for the twopence which you have laid out on this number of Short Stories. I may say that many busy brains have been at work on it for months past. Your favourite authors have been thinking out their best ideas and putting them to paper; the Sub-Editors have been busily reading the thousands of stories that have come into this office and selecting the best; while your Editor has been busy choosing the cream of the cream of these stories and in planning the number itself. If you are pleased with the result, then we, on our side, shall feel that the enormous amount of work, time and money expended in producing the copy you hold in your hands have not been wasted.

One special feature which I have made in this number is the offer of a greatly increased number of prizes. The Gramophones, which have been going out for several weeks past at the rate of ten a week, have been so much appreciated that I feel constrained to increase the number in order that those who have not already secured the instruments may have a greater opportunity of doing so.

I have received a remarkable letter from an anonymous reader of Short Stories. It is one of the most curious letters that I have ever had. It will be found on page 815. The writer, as you will see, received a prize of £10 from Short Stories about eight years ago, and this £10 proved the foundation of a big fortune. He now writes over from America inclosing dollar bills to the value of £50, and asks that this money may be distributed amongst readers in sums of £10 under conditions which he leaves to me. The letter has only just come to hand, and I therefore hasten to publish it at once. By next week I shall have thought out some satisfactory manner in which to distribute the money.

You will doubtless notice that on page 798 I have started the promised "Love Problem Series." I should be glad to know what you think of the first one, and if you have any problem of this kind you would like solved, let me know, and if I think the subject suitable, a story with its solution will be given you.

Before finishing up this week I would like to say that one of the stories in this number was written under very pathetic circumstances. There is no space to give you particulars of the case here, but I have had the permission of the author to tell you the whole story next week. It is one in which payment for the tale was the means of keeping a home together this Christmas.

TO NEW READERS, GREETING!

There are doubtless several thousands of people who have been attracted to buy this number of Short Stories for the first time in their lives. It is to such new readers that I would like to say something about the paper.

This is, as you are already aware, a double number of the ordinary issue, which usually consists of half a dozen or more complete tales and an instalment of a powerful serial story. Every issue bears a coloured illustrated cover, and is just as daintily and as choicely got up as the copy you hold in your hands. All the fiction is carefully selected, and is written by authors who have made names for themselves in the world of popular literature.

It is not for me to try and influence you in any way in your opinion of the stories which appear in this number, but I would ask you very specially to read the article entitled "How I Chaperoned Belinda." It is one of a series of articles revealing the secrets of life in High Society at home and abroad—the most remarkable series ever published.

I sincerely hope that the little paper will commend itself sufficiently to you to induce you to continue taking it in every week in future.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Love Problem No. 1.

BEHIND THE SCREEN.

Ought a Man to Give Up All His Bachelor Pursuits Upon Marriage?

"What is it, Mary?"

"Mr. Hunt and another gentleman to see master, please."

"Didn't you tell them Mr. Mowbray hasn't come home yet?"

"Yes'm, and they said they'd wait. I've shown them into the drawing-room."

"Very well; I shall be down in a moment."

"The gentlemen told me not to disturb you, but I thought you would like to know they were here."

"Thank you, Mary."

"Will the gentlemen stay to dinner?"

"No, I hope—I mean, I think not. You may sound the gong at the usual time. Don't forget, please."

"No'm, I won't forgot." And Mary smiled significantly to herself as she retired to the kitchen. This would not be the first time she had been called upon to sound the dinner gong at Holly Lodge as a gentle hint to visitors that it was time for them to go.

Mary had discovered long ago that hospitality to "master's friends" was not one of her young mistress' virtues.

"And I don't blame her, neither," said Mary to herself; "it's only natural she shouldn't want them always hanging around and taking master's attention off of herself, and she only married six months."

Mrs. Mowbray gave a little petulant sigh.

"I suppose I must," she murmured, addressing her looking glass with a frown. And then she began to smile, half reluctantly, at the face she saw reflected there.

It was a pretty face. The frown clouded the prettiness, but the smile made it bewitching. Yet Mrs. Mowbray frowned almost as often as she smiled. But then so many things happened to annoy her.

Harry was a dear boy, of course, but—well, he certainly had his faults. What made him so late to-night, for instance? Surely he hadn't gone off again to play chess with that horrid Bob Jollibois, as he did only the other week.

But, no, he wouldn't be so selfish and horrid when he knew perfectly well how unhappy it would make her. She had told him so when he came home at half-past eight that other night, and he had vowed never to do it again.

Harry was a man of his word; she would say that for him. He had promised before they were married, to give up that hateful volunteering and football that always took up so much of his time, and he had kept his promise so far, though she was quite sure Bob Jollibois and the others were doing their best to tempt him to break it.

What was keeping him this evening? She had never felt quite easy in her mind since she found out that Harry was still a member of the Jackdaw's Club. He had quite agreed with her when she declared that a married man with a comfortable home of his own, had no business to go to a club, but, all the same, he had not resigned his membership. He had explained to her that it would be shabby to do so and that paying a subscription to a club was a mere matter of form. He had never been near the place since, it is true. Still, she would have been happier had he severed his connection with the Jackdaws altogether.

The club was a link with his bachelor days, in which she had had no part, and she resented it as such.

The two men waiting downstairs were links of the same sort. They had known Harry when he was still a stranger to her, and they could talk to him of things that had happened before he had ever met her. It made her feel vaguely aggrieved. She would not have admitted it in so many words, but it always pained her a little to think that Harry could ever have had any absorbing interests and thoughts outside herself.

Though she laughed to herself she liked to cherish a delusion which Harry's friends always seemed to destroy—to wit, that Harry's life had been a dead and dreary blank before she came into it.

Mrs. Mowbray seized her silver-backed hair-brush—Harry's latest present—and administered half a dozen impatient and quite unnecessary dabs to her pretty, fluffy hair.

"I suppose I must," she sighed again, and tripped lightly downstairs prepared to be civil to her husband's visitors.

"Poor old Mowbray! Take warning by him, Bundy, and don't get married."

"I don't mean to. But how about yourself, eh?"

"Oh Nell's one in a thousand she's not like Mrs. Mow—but, I say, I suppose one mustn't abuse a man's wife in his own house. And I daresay she's a charming little woman, really—but a bit jealous. Anyway, he adores her."

"Evidently. A man must be pretty far gone to give up everything, as Mowbray has done. You don't think he'll come to the smoker?"

"No—I'm afraid he won't. Since he's been married he can't be induced to spend an evening away from her."

"Poor old Mowbray. He's bound to get tired of it."

"Yes, a man wants a little change, even if he's married an angel. Human nature can't stand monotony."

"Adam's relying on Mowbray to sing. The fellows will be horribly disappointed if he doesn't."

"So will Mowbray himself. He used to be uncommonly keen on it. Of course, he'll refuse, simply because he's afraid of hurting his wife's feelings."

"It strikes me he's carrying devotion a bit too far. Why, he seems to have thrown over every blessed thing he ever cared for. The Growlers are furious at his desertion. They've lost their best half-back. And old Harding was grumbling to me, only last night, because Mowbray hasn't put his nose inside the School of Arms for months."

"That must have been a blow to Mowbray, to give up those bayonet competitions. He was a dead certainty for at least one prize."

"It's the same with everything. He's losing his form all round. It's a sin that such a good sportsman should be allowed to run to seed; and a woman who makes her husband sacrifice all his pet hobbies must be——"

The speaker paused expressively.

"Well, of course, we don't know that it's her fault. He never so much as hinted at it. Pretends he's dropping out of things to please himself."

"But who believes that?"

"Nobody! Oh, you're quite right. It is my fault!"

It was not Jack Hunt's voice that answered his friend, Bundy's question.

The two men turned to the speaker with startled faces.

It was Mrs. Mowbray, who detached herself from the shadow of the screen at the door, and came towards them with outstretched hands.

"It was mean to listen," she said, flushing all over her pretty face, "but I couldn't help it. You didn't hear me come in, and—something you said—made me wait, and so I—I overheard. Oh, please don't think me a—a cat," she added hurriedly, "but when you said that about taking warning by Harry, and not getting married, it—it wasn't in human nature not to listen. I've been thoughtless and selfish. It's done me good to hear the truth. Won't you shake hands?"

Ten minutes later, when Harry Mowbray came home, he was amazed to find that his wife had set her heart on his singing at the Jackdaws' Smoker, and when she insisted on his spending the entire following evening at the club, it dawned upon him that something extraordinary had happened.

Grete Hahn.

Digitized by Google

MY CLIENT.

The Tale of a Will.

"COME in," I mumbled.

Another knock.

"Come in," I shouted with irritation at the repeated summons, oblivious of the fact that a heavy dray passing drowned all except top note utterances.

But the vision which did enter was a most unexpected one. Young, beautiful, carrying in one little gloved hand a great bundle of frills and lace which could not be allowed to do the charwoman's work over my office floor. She was streaming with chains and charms, and nodding with plumes, like a lawyer's visitor on the stage, perhaps, but not such as usually climbs the narrow, bare staircase to a genuine solicitor's office in a city bye-way.

Of course I bounded to my feet like an indiarubber ball, feeling a worm in my working coat, and, as I politely placed the one spare chair in a new, but no more convenient position, I had a terrible fear that good Mrs. Smith might have overlooked its dusting on that particular morning.

"You are surprised to see me?" my visitor said with a little smile, which had a good deal of amusement in it as well as graciousness, no doubt from perceiving the embarrassment with which I had received her.

"Well, madam," I said gallantly, "these dingy chambers are not often honoured by visits from the fair sex, but things which are rare are always most highly prized."

She looked at me calmly through her big grey eyes, and I felt I must stand or fall in her estimation by the scrutiny.

"I have come to consult you," she said, removing her eyes from me to the circle she was describing on the table with her finger, "about—about my husband."

How had I been fool enough to imagine she had not been snared before she was out of the nursery?

"Yes?" I murmured dubiously.

"I haven't got one," she said, looking up quickly.

"Oh!" I replied. "The two statements require reconciliation."

"No," she replied, "that is just it—I don't want to marry. All boys are savages, and all men are brutes."

It was an insult, of course, but there was nothing one would not have borne from those smiling lips, revealing a shimmering row of pearls. I bowed.

"You agree," she laughed. "I am glad. Well, the next thing to tell you is that I am very poor."

I knew that costly jewels, priceless lace, Worth's gowns, and Paris millinery often did represent extreme poverty, so I again inclined my head.

"It is very hard to talk while you are so silent," she said pettishly. "I suppose I had better begin at the beginning and tell you the whole long story, and then I won't notice your silence."

"Yes," I assented. "That would be the best way."

"Well," she resumed, knitting her brows together with a delightful piquancy, "my name is Mildred Leslie, and my father and mother dying when I was quite a child, I was adopted and brought up by a brother of my mother's. He was immensely wealthy, and I always had everything I wished for. Upon one point only we differed, or rather agreed, and that was marriage. I shared his horror of it, but he had a theory that all women should marry, and all men should not, though how he suggested this plan should be carried out he never explained. Well, a few months ago, he died, leaving me all he possessed as I was his only near relation, but—ah, this is the dreadful part," she interjected quizzically, "only on condition that I was married within a year after his death. I was to be given a thousand pounds as an income for the year, and if I was not married by the end of it, the whole of his property was to be sold and go to pay off the National Debt!"

"I think the conditions are such as few young ladies would grumble at," I said guardedly.

"Well, I am one of the few, then," she answered snappishly, "and that is not the kind of opinion I have come to ask you for."

I bowed and waited.

It was evident that my fair client had to be treated with caution.

"The case is this—I am the only near relative he had, so if we can only break the will by proving he was not right in his mind, I will come in as heir-at-law, and no one will be a bit the worse."

"You cannot abide by the conditions? Breaking a will is not an easy matter!"

"No, I should not have consulted you if I had meant to do so. He was very eccentric, and there will be no one to oppose us. I went to his solicitors, but they were shocked at the suggestion, and refused to act for me, so then I asked the Clares, whom you know, and Mrs. Clare gave me your address."

"It was very kind of her to mention me," I said, with a glow of professional gratitude to my friend's wife.

Miss Leslie looked at me steadily for a moment, as if gauging my vanity, and then, with amusement creeping again into her grey eyes she added—

"She said you were so good-looking. If you had been a woman I should not have told you, but a man it could only aggravate."

She looked at me with a most whimsical expression, and, though I longed to avenge the wound to my professional vanity, I could not find it in my heart to be annoyed with my tormentor.

I did the best thing that remained for me to do under the circumstances, I laughed, and she joined me.

"That is right," she said. "I think you will do. Get me through this, and I shall be everlastingly grateful."

With a few more necessary details she gathered her purse and frills again into her tiny hand and swept away, taking my sunshine with her.

I worked hard to earn that gratitude, poor reward though it was in compensation for the heart that she so quickly took into her possession. No one brought into daily contact with Miss Leslie could help loving her. She had the winsome waywardness of a spoilt child, with the imperiousness of an empress, but now and again traits of what is best and noblest in woman would suddenly appear at unexpected moments, and be as quickly hidden out of sight again, as if the owner was ashamed of possessing any of the softer feminine qualities.

It was a tedious and endlessly technical case, but it was pulled through at last, adding not a little to my own reputation.

Mr. Biddulph having certainly been a man of eccentric habits it was not hard to bring in a verdict of an unsound mind, no one being particularly interested in proving he was sane.

But my success was as nothing to the greyness of the future when my heart's darling should have passed out of my life, and at most I should be privileged with an occasional call as her legal adviser. It was the morning after we had won that I sat in my dreary office awaiting the woman who had so frequently brightened it of late.

Digitized by Google

The case had made a tremendous sensation. Columns of the morning papers were devoted to the beautiful heiress and her mad uncle, while the evening placards had contained nothing else, and one enterprising journal advertised an interview with Miss Leslie herself.

I knew so well how she was revelling in her notoriety, and I—well, I was just the solicitor of the case!

A knock came to disturb my somewhat morose meditations, but it was far too loud to be mistaken for the gentle tap which always preceded my fair client's entry.

In answer to my summons an elderly man came in, leaning heavily upon a gold nobbed stick. He was unmistakably a retired military man, so that I was not surprised when he announced himself as Colonel Wyatt.

"Mr. Mervyn Ray, I believe?" he queried.

"That is my name, sir," I said, "will you take a chair?"

Having seated himself with some apparent difficulty upon the one to which I waved him, he fixed on me a somewhat eagle eye, and began.

"Sir, I have come to perform a duty."

This, of course, could herald nothing but an unpleasant communication, so I merely bowed and waited.

"You are, I believe, the solicitor who acted for Miss Leslie in yesterday's will case?"

My heart beat faster, in spite of my professional calm as I assented.

"The will having been broken, the young lady inherits as heir-at-law?"

"That is so," I said, shuffling some papers on the table to cover the growing uneasiness I felt at these preliminary remarks.

"I have come to you first, Mr. Ray, as a matter of form, but, of course, the interests of your client will very properly be your first consideration. I see, however, by reading the account of the proceedings yesterday, it was stated that Mr. Biddulph was a bachelor. That, however, is not correct. He was a widower, and, at one time of his life, there was a son of his marriage living. Now, if that boy is alive, or has left heirs, for he would be thirty-five or six if alive, they would be the inheritors of Mr. Biddulph's estate!"

He said it all so quietly, and seemed so sure of his facts, that I felt the blood leaving my face. I had more than a legal interest in the case. It was a terrifying thought to me that I should have helped this girl to compass her own ruin, while some nameless outcast was to inherit the fortune which became her so well. I rose from my chair and walked over to the window. The action cleared my brain. I turned again to Colonel Wyatt.

"I cannot, of course, combat the truth of what you have stated, for I am entirely ignorant of the whole matter as you know, but if you will be good enough to furnish me with the details of the case, I shall then be in a better position to judge the best course to pursue."

"In the interests of Miss Leslie?"

"I have the honour to represent her!"

"Quite so," he said. "Well, I am afraid I do not remember all the names as I ought to. I had a touch of the sun in India, and my memory is not as good as it might be, but no doubt others will be able to fill up the blanks. What I am going to tell you happened about thirty-four years ago, when I was stationed at Halifax with my regiment. It was here I first met Mr. Biddulph and his lovely young wife. But that was not his name then, for he took that some years later, from the great property he inherited from a distant relation, and at this time he was miserably poor. She was a most beautiful creature, and he treated her like the bear he was. Used actually to beat her, I believe, and was madly, insanely jealous. They had one little son about a year old, and, when the regiment moved to Bermuda, she and the kid came too, under the protection of Captain Goldie, one of our fellows, who was desperately in love with her. We naturally concluded her husband would get a separation, but this he refused to do, merely washing his hands finally of both wife and child. A few months later, Goldie and the woman he adored took fever, and were both dead within a week, leaving the child in a perfectly destitute condition. The father was written to, but never replied, and, in the meantime, a missionary and his wife took the boy in. Goldie had been exceedingly popular, and there was a general reluctance to cast the child off for his sake, so it ended by our subscribing about a hundred pounds to maintain him until the clergyman could get him into some home. Shortly after that I came back to England, and I heard no more of the matter until seeing the account of yesterday's trial, in this morning's paper, brought the matter to my mind."

I had leant my head on my hand while he was speaking, and I now looked up.

"This happened a long time ago. Colonel Wyatt. This boy has, no doubt, been well provided for and started in life, does it not seem a pity to rake up old scandals to provide an able-bodied man with wealth he does not expect, and to turn out a beautiful girl into the world totally unfitted for battle, and with absolutely no means of earning a livelihood?"

"Oh, of course, I expected you would plead for your client," he said, with a short laugh, "but she has only herself to blame, why did she not accept her uncle's conditions? You refuse, then, to help in the search for Mr. Biddulph's son? It is what I anticipated!"

"On the contrary," I said quietly, "he shall be made aware of his position."

He looked at me with grave doubt, trying to fathom the legal depth of my assertion. He passed his hand over his forehead.

"I wish I could remember that missionary's name," he said, "but it has gone. I think it began with B."

"Bradley," I suggested.

"Bradley—Bradley, by Jove it was! Rev. something Bradley."

"Samuel," again I put in.

"Rev. Samuel Bradley—the very name! I see, sir, I have brought you no news," he said sternly.

"On the contrary," I replied, "you have supplied me with the most astonishing piece of intelligence that I have ever heard in my life."

"Perhaps," he asked, with a sneer, "since you know so much, you may be able to inform me of the name of Mr. Biddulph's son, since I suppose he went by his father's first name?"

"He did," I said, looking straight into my visitor's face, "His name is Mervyn Ray!"

The old man drew himself up as if the information were too great to grasp except at its full height. Profound silence reigned for a minute.

"Then I shall wish you good-morning, Mr. Ray," he said with military dignity, and, according me a stately bow, he left the room.

I buried my face in both my hands in a whirl of conflicting thoughts. I may have sat so for five minutes or an hour without my impressions crystallising themselves into actual thought, when I was interrupted by the light tap on my door which I had been so eagerly awaiting before the arrival of my military visitor.

She did not wait for me to reply, but burst into the room radiant, triumphant, regal.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, it's splendid!" she cried, running forward impulsively to take my hand, "everyone says you have handled it in masterly fashion, and you can't think what a sensation it has made. Why, I have had three proposals this morning already," she laughed, shaking the envelopes at me, "and I think my solicitor had better reply to them.

"You are dreadfully official this morning," she said, retaining her hold of the letters she was handing me, and looking up at me with a bewitching appeal, "and I thought I should never get here, I wanted someone to share my joy with so badly."

I took papers, little hand and all, into my clasp, and with ever such a slight pressure I said gently—

"Miss Leslie could not come to anyone who would sympathise more in all her joys and sorrows."

She laughed, blushed a little, and busied herself with the pile of newspapers she had brought with her.

"Miss Leslie," I began, assuming again my most legal air, "we have, it is true, won our case, but in law it is necessary to be prepared for every sort of contingency arising, so that we may be ahead of our adversaries should such appear."

"Yes," she said, with mock severity, "now you look as you did yesterday in court. One paper said you were so handsome, and I am inclined to agree with Mrs. Clare, that you have some good looks," she laughed. "I am really very pleased. It adds so to the picturesqueness of our case."

I laughed too. How could one be serious with such a child?

"Miss Leslie, will you try to give me your attention for a few minutes?"

"Certainly, when you cease to be legal in your aspect. It is aggravatingly becoming."

I went over to the window. It was impossible to say what I had to with those dancing eyes upon my face. Fixing my gaze on an unresponsive lamp post outside, I pointed out that she, having inherited as heir-at-law, must inform me how she wished to act in case another claimant on the same grounds should come forward.

She was grave enough now.

"Oh, it is impossible," she cried. "My uncle never married, and I am the only child of his only sister, and he had no brothers!"

"Shall we say 'improbable?' In law we find so many things possible that certainly ought not to be so. I only asked in case of such a contingency arising, how would you wish me to act? We will suppose, for the sake of argument, that your uncle had married and left an heir, but, for some reason of his own, had kept the matter secret. If this child should now come forward to claim the inheritance, our wisest course would be to deny the legality of the marriage, which is often hard to prove when witnesses have died. If such an offspring existed, he would, no doubt, be poor, and so would be willing to resign his claim to the estate for a consideration rather than enter upon a lengthy and costly law suit."

She sat with her eyes bent upon the ground, while I spoke, but she now got up and faced me across my office desk.

"Do you think," she asked, her eyes big with a sad wonderment, "that I would keep for one moment what was not mine by right, if once convinced that such was not the case?"

It was well for us both, perhaps, that my desk was between us. She sat down again, her child's face getting old with the possibility of want, and her blue eyes filling with tears.

"Oh, what should I do?" she cried, "I am no use for anything, I would starve."

My face must have betrayed my feelings, for she added, with an attempt at her former gaiety—

"I should ask you to take me on as a typist."

"Would you not let me provide for you as my wife?" I said, leaning tenderly over her.

"How could I give you such a promise if I were penniless, when I don't want to marry at all while I am rich?"

"I will be content with the conditional consent, and, at the same time do all in my power to try to prevent the contingency arising."

"It would be nice to be loved just for one's own self," she said, looking up at me. "I will promise just—just to please you," and I bent over her and sealed the contract by a kiss on her sweet lips.

Then she left me with a nod and a smile, but there was a soft expression in her beautiful eyes that gave me a dream of happiness.

I had no time to enjoy my meditation, however, and I sent my office-boy flying for a cab before Miss Leslie's carriage had well left the street. I must bind Colonel Wyatt to silence regarding the revelations of the morning.

I drove to his club, but he had not yet returned. I left a note for him asking him to telephone to my office as soon as he did, and that I should come round, as I wished to see him most urgently. I then returned and sent for lunch.

The telephone bell rang in the outer office.

"Miss Leslie would be glad if you could call to see her as soon as possible," my clerk announced when the message at last came through.

I stood for a moment with a sudden doubt rising in my mind, and as quickly dispelled. She could not have heard. My toilet required a few minutes extra now, and then I was off, without a second thought of the Colonel, or the message I had been waiting for.

Miss Leslie had taken a dainty flat in London, where she had resided during the pending of the proceedings, with an old governess as companion.

As I entered the drawing-room she was standing at the window, looking out into the garden.

Her figure looked exquisitely girlish in a long, clinging black robe, but there was something pathetic in the attitude that did not suggest the elation of the morning.

"Mr. Ray," she said, coming towards me with a grave little smile, "I asked you to come round because I want you to do something for me."

"You know I could not have a greater pleasure in life," I said gently.

She did not reply for a minute, while she nervously twisted her gold chain into a knot and undid it again.

"This morning I made you a promise under very foolish circumstances. Terrified by the mere thought of possible want I consented to marry you if I lost my wealth. It was a very mean proceeding, and I want you to release me."

"Don't you think it will be time enough to think about it when the contingency arises?" I asked.

"No, please," she intreated, "I want to be free now."

"Would it add yet another terror to poverty to think you would have to share it with me?" I asked.

"Oh, no," she cried, "it is not that——"

"Then, my darling," I said, gathering her into my arms, "I am very sorry, but I cannot release you!"

She burst into tears and hid her face on my shoulder.

"Oh, Mervyn, you must!" she sobbed. "You knew this morning that you were the heir, and not I, and—and oh, you had no right to make me promise!"

"So Colonel Wyatt has been to see you, has he? Interfering old fool! Why can't he mind his own business, I'd like to know?" I cried angrily.

"He is not, he's a dear old man!" she said hotly. "He suspected you of treachery, and so he came to me, as was proper," and she smiled through her tears with just a touch of her old imperiousness.

It was very late in the afternoon when I called on Colonel Wyatt, and was not surprised to find he was somewhat testy at having been kept waiting for me all the afternoon. But he was really a kind old chap, and when he heard that Mildred and I had agreed to settle the heirship by becoming one, he forgot his own annoyance and consented to come to our wedding.

I am still looked upon as the lucky fellow who married Mr. Biddulph's beautiful heiress, as I insisted upon our cousinship remaining a secret. I considered that the rôle of the great lady suited her too well for me to pass it to her second hand, and as she queens it with consummate grace in all the small things of life, so she submits to my will in the larger issues, as she did by becoming my wife.

Peers Hervey.

Digitized by Google

As Fate Would Have It.

The Romance of an Autumn Day.

PART THE FIRST: Morning.

FATE IS APPEALED TO.

"FLO, Flo! Now, you'll just have to let me tell her, dear, she will be so interested—Flo, such fun! Are you asleep; can we come in? It's only Hilda and I.!"

The eager questioner put a pink ear, almost covered by her loose and rippling chestnut tresses, to a panel of the closed entrance by which she stood, and listened impatiently, holding meanwhile aloft out of her companion's reach some sheets of note-paper, written upon and creased. The ruffled silken sleeve of her dainty dressing-jacket had slipped to the rounded shoulder of a white arm, at which a pair of girlish hands were catching desperately in the hope of drawing down the inaccessible documents.

From an open door across the passage a flood of electric light fell upon the two women—one a ruddy blonde, one that brown-haired, grey-eyed type which is between the blonde and the brunette. The latter was still fully dressed, her dinner-gown simple, almost severe, her only ornament the string of pearls about her slender neck.

"Please—please, Miss Beresford!" begged the younger, in a whisper. "I didn't want anybody but you to know, and—and Lady Florence is—is so——"

Hilda Vane's protest was left uncompleted—the entrance near which it had been uttered had yawned suddenly, and on the threshold there appeared a supple, golden-locked figure, a queenly vision in lace and cambric. Lady Florence Coppinger—as many a masculine compliment had reminded her—was a true "daughter of the gods," being, indeed, "divinely tall and most divinely fair." But the violet pupils under her finely-pencilled brows had in them habitually more than a trifle of haughty discontent, and her scarlet lips were superciliously thin and scornful. Something in her expression seemed to supply a key to the missing portion of Hilda Vane's interrupted sentence.

"My dear Pattie," she said, regarding the elder of her visitors with a cynical tolerance, "what is your latest freak? They usually afflict you in the small hours, I believe, and this is no exception to the rule. Are you aware that it is nearly three o'clock in the morning? If I had not had to write some letters for the morning collection I should have been in the arms of Morpheus long ago!"

Pattie Beresford slipped past the speaker into a handsome boudoir, gained the neighbourhood of a glowing fire, sank into a cushioned lounge beside it, and flourished the sheets of note-paper that she carried.

"Say, Flo!" she exclaimed, and both the phrase and her accent betrayed her to be an American, "talking about letters, what do you think?—Our little Hilda has actually received two offers of marriage, both in writing, and both by post! Here are the letters, they turned up this evening, Hilda says. After worrying over them for hours the poor child consulted me, and I really had to share the joke with you. Fancy, two formal offers, and some poor creatures can't even get one!"

Florence Coppinger re-closed the door of the room—the action served to disguise a sneer—before glancing at the person referred to by the voluble Pattie. Hilda, abashed by Miss Pattie's headlong frankness, and, on the whole, inclined to be indignant, was fingering the pearls at her throat, and gazing listlessly from a window of the boudoir. Without was the clear, cold, October dark, silvered by a waning moon.

"My congratulations, dear!" remarked Lady Florence, patronisingly, "And may—may I ask by whom these flattering propositions have been made?"

"That's just the amazing part of it," put in Miss Beresford, with a ripple of shrill, yet genuine laughter, "what do you say, for a beginning, to the Honourable Augustine Chesney, and ten thousand a year? Augustine, the precise and bilious, who, with half the matrimonial prizes of the county dancing after him, plumps for a pretty face and a sweet temper instead of a dowry!"

A sigh escaped from Florence Coppinger—a sigh that might have been one of relief. Then she knitted her brows.

"Not bad," she replied, absently, "not at all bad, Hilda. You would be Lady Chesney some day, if he were to outlive his uncle, the Viscount. But the other—what about the other?"

Pattie Beresford stole a glimpse at the querist's countenance.

"Mr. Quaritch," she answered briefly.

Lady Florence started.

"Ah!" was the cold retort. "I almost fancied he had been taking a sentimental interest in Hilda, but then it might only have been a paternal one. However, he can't be more than forty, I suppose, and though his practice at the Bar is a mere fiction, he has quite eight hundred a year after his mother's settlement."

"And is no end of a good fellow," added Pattie. "While Chesney is a confirmed invalid and as irritable as a caged bear. Still, he has ten thousand per annum, and Hilda says she isn't certain she cares for either of them. In that case, how is she to decide? I should get chance—that is, Fate—to decide it, and so I have told her!"

Hilda stole to the back of the lounge where her vivacious adviser was sitting.

"And I said, dear Miss Beresford," she observed gently, "that I believed I ought to refuse them both!"

Pattie Beresford stared at her aghast.

"My dear soul!" cried the young American, "and what would your blessed auntie say when she learnt that you had rejected not one, but two offers of marriage from men who are neither of them penniless. Doesn't she go about as it is telling every matron of her acquaintance how badly your dad's estate panned out, and how much your education and maintenance have left her out of pocket? No, you must take either Chesney or Quaritch, that's flat. You wouldn't have the life of a dog with her after refusing them both."

"How absurd you are, Pattie," said Florence Coppinger sharply, "Hilda mustn't dream of rejecting Chesney, any other girl would think it a marvellous piece of luck that he had happened to take a fancy to her. Ten thousand a year and the possibility of a coronet! Heavens, what more can she want!"

"H'm!" rejoined Miss Beresford. "Well, I'm not as positive as you are about it. Remember, she'd have to live with Chesney and the income and the coronet might be dear at the price. Still, though Quaritch is nice, eight hundred, especially in this set, is genteel poverty for a married couple. If only Quaritch would wake up and do something! He's clever enough. Oh, the problem's too much for me—we'll have to get Fate to decide."

Hilda Vane had been oblivious to the last few phrases of the discussion, she had wandered into a profound reverie. The words of her downright American acquaintance were but too correct. Her life would not, in very truth, be worth living if the mean and not over-wealthy relative by whom, after her parents' death, she had been reluctantly reared, were to discover that a couple of eligible suitors had been dismissed by her charge.

At present the existence of Hilda Vane was that of an unwelcome hanger-on upon a penurious household. Clothes, boots, millinery, gloves, pocket-money, railway fares, all were grudged her. In the great country house where she was now staying with her aunt, she had but a single real friend, the rich little American, Pattie Beresford, whose pronounced fancy for her, everybody, and especially Lady Florence Coppinger—herself a privileged and exclusive member of the house-party—regarded with a kind of bored amusement. But Pattie was to marry Lady Florence's eldest brother, and re-establish the fortunes of a famous English title, and so her protegée was favoured by a sort of chilly intimacy with the blue-blooded, golden-locked beauty.

A medley of troubled thoughts were chasing one another through Hilda's aching head as she leant on the high back of the settee near the shrewd yet flighty Pattie. Reviewing swiftly her bitter girlhood, she realised that any opportunity of escape from a no less bitter future was a thing to be coveted. Yet, involuntarily, she found herself contrasting Robert Quaritch, the reserved, chivalrous barrister, whose passion for rare folios had kept him poor, as his grave kindliness and quiet sagacity had made him popular, with Augustine Chesney, the wealthy, ailing, irritable aristocrat, who had been struck by her gentle ways and unfailing tact. She had seen both men but seldom—occasionally in town, more frequently out of it. They had written to her now from neighbouring country-houses, where she had re-encountered them a day or two earlier.

Yet, though Robert Quaritch had always seemed to seek, and to enjoy her society, it was his offer that had surprised her most. There had, indeed, been moments when she had heard coupled, in the idle gossip of Society, the names of Lady Florence Coppinger and Robert Quaritch.

Pattie Beresford's voice aroused her from her reflections.

"I must read you their letters, Flo," the young American was saying, "and then I will tell you my scheme for consulting Fate. The letters are short, and the scheme is simple. So here goes."

Hilda put out a protesting hand, but Pattie evaded her merrily.

"First, the Honourable Augustine," she pursued, opening out one of the letters she held.

"'Dear Miss Vane,'" she read, "'I think you will appreciate the feeling of embarrassment which compels me to make a somewhat momentous communication to you in this, instead of the more usual form. Knowing the delicacy of my constitution as you do, you will, I am sure, see that it is best for me to avoid the excitement of a verbal discussion. My object in writing is to confess that the feelings of regard and admiration which I have long entertained for you, have become too warm for me to mistake their nature. Before consulting your esteemed aunt on the subject, I should be grateful for some hint of your own attitude towards me. With my sensitive disposition I should suffer too shockingly under anything like a formal rebuff. I must, however, assure you that my heart and my fortune are unreservedly at the disposal of the most charming of her sex. Devotedly yours,

"'Augustine Chesney.'"

"Isn't he prim?" exclaimed Pattie, delightedly. "And now for Mr. Quaritch!"

"Please, Miss Beresford!" pleaded Hilda, more pathetically than ever. But Pattie shook her chestnut tresses and laughed.

"Nonsense, poppet!" she said. "It isn't as if you loved either of them." And she began forthwith upon the second letter.

"'My Dear Little Hilda,—(For so I always think of you, and so I must call you at least once in my life), I am afraid you will be very much surprised when you get this letter, and realise that its object is to ask you to be the writer's wife. What excuse has Robert Quaritch for his presumption—what has he to offer a young and lovely woman in exchange for herself? Nothing that he dare speak of to her face, and so he needs must write. A heartache that your eyes have given me, that is my excuse, a trifle more of friendship and tenderness, even of comfort, than you are permitted to enjoy at present, these exhaust my humble offerings.

"'Consider me carefully, dear child, and ask yourself if I could not make you just a little trifle happier. I am grey, thirty-seven, and I can only promise my wife a moderate competence. But I should be so grateful always for the priceless boon of a little love from your loyal, innocent heart, that I think I should make you a good husband. I fear you are very lonely always, and you have given me a selfish heartache, so I write this, yet almost against my better judgment. But you will decide wisely, remembering that even if you cannot let me be your lover, I shall always be your affectionate friend,

'Robert Quaritch.'"

"Say, Flo, little Hilda has received two offers of marriage this evening. Here are the letters!

Digitized by Google

Florence Coppinger's lips set and her nostrils contracted as she listened, and a red spot glowed hotly on either of her pale cheeks.

"I guess that's real sweet," ejaculated Pattie warmly; "but, of course, he's nearly forty, and a bookworm at that, and they do say his income dies with him, too, while Chesney's widow would be a wealthy woman and perhaps a peeress dowager. If only the Honourable Augustine wasn't such an owl!"

She allowed Hilda to repossess herself of the letters and clasped her own jewelled hands about her knees.

"We must leave it to Fate," she observed, "the poor old nice one or the rich young niminy-piminy one. Hilda must write to both of them accepting, and then we will burn one letter and post the other, without looking at the envelopes and wait to see whom Fate has chosen. Won't it be exciting! Give us pen and ink, Flo."

Florence Coppinger hesitated, then smiled strangely, and brought from an escritoire the writing materials she had herself been using. The youthful American set them before her protégée.

"The same wording will do for both," she intimated, "and I understand just the sort of shy, girly thing that you ought to put, Hilda—it would take you a day to hammer out a reply.

"Begin 'Dear Mr. Quaritch or Chesney'—you can make a copy for the other fellow. Now, 'I wish I knew what to say in answer to your very, very kind letter. Perhaps I must confess that it made me feel very happy—happy enough to sit down and cry.'

"That's more or less true, Hilda," she interpolated, "you had been shedding tears over them when you came to me, you tender-hearted creature. Go on! 'Of course I don't deserve the great honour you have done me, but I can't be selfish enough to think about that, though I am sure I oughtn't for your sake to say: Yes.'

"Always flatter the brutes!" commented Pattie shrewdly.

"And now sign it just 'Hilda,' and add: 'P.S.—I shall be in the conservatory here—near the side entrance—about four o'clock to-day. As you see, I am writing this in the small hours.'

"That will do very nicely," she concluded, "now make a copy for the other one, and put them in envelopes and address, and stamp them. Then we will let Fate choose, and at tea-time to-morrow you—and we—will know whom she has chosen. Afterwards you can write a nice refusal to the unlucky one."

Hilda looked from the little American to Lady Florence; her expression had become thoughtful, even amused.

"I don't see that you can do better," said the latter, with a shrug of her shoulders, "if you choose for yourself you are sure to regret it, one way or another. It will be a comfort to be able to blame somebody, if it is only Fate."

Pattie was setting a chair to an escritoire near the fire. A grave young figure in her dark dinner-gown, Hilda sat down and took up a pen. The others threw themselves into the adjacent lounge and chatted while she worked.

Twenty minutes later a sealed, stamped, and addressed envelope was dropped by Miss Pattie Beresford into the post-box in the dusky hall below. Another envelope at the moment was just flickering into ashes among the embers of Lady Florence's boudoir fire. The appeal to Fate had been made.

Part the Second: Afternoon.

Fate is Challenged.

"Don't lean so far out, Pattie, you—you will be seen."

"Rubbish, Flo," was the retort; "do you suppose the lucky one will have eyes for anything but his lady-love? Great Scott!"

Pattie Beresford's ejaculation was more suggestive of excitement than alarm. Yet she drew herself quickly into the curtained alcove from whose shelter she had been peering. In its deeper recesses Florence Coppinger was standing, statuesque and cynical in a classical tea-gown.

"Flo," whispered her companion, "I believe I'm glad—it's—it's Quaritch."

Florence Coppinger paled, but her expression became a strange mingling of amazement and incredulity.

"'Quaritch!" she repeated; "impossible."

Pattie stared. "Not at all," she responded; "it was an even chance. I don't expect, in her heart, that Hilda will be sorry."

She peered round the curtain again, and Florence Coppinger imitated her. From the recess they could see down the staircase and across the wide hall to the glass doors of a species of conservatory. A vigorous, square-shouldered, masculine form in riding-costume was just entering them. Florence started and drew back with a suppressed cry. Pattie glanced at her keenly, and noticed that on her regular white teeth was a tiny smear of crimson. She had bitten her lip till the blood came.

Ignorant alike of his feminine spies and their singular scrap of conversation, the subject of their scrutiny had stridden into the softly-lighted interior of the huge temperate palm-house which was one of the glories of the great country place.

"Hilda!" was all he said, and he held out his hand to a girlish figure that had risen from an antique marble seat. Hilda Vane looked at him doubtfully, but her fingers stole towards his, and were folded in a strong grasp.

Robert Quaritch was dark-haired and blue-eyed, with a firm, well-moulded chin, and fine, sensitive nostrils. The grey of which he had written was but a sprinkling on his temples, and his face was lined only by a grave good-humour. As Hilda gazed at him, she felt herself thrilled with a novel emotion. He had stooped and kissed her hand.

"My darling," he said and his voice was husky and broken. "I—I scarcely dared to hope that you could even give me a chance to teach you to care for me and yet, all the time, you loved me."

He drew her into his arms and Hilda yielded herself, not unhappily, to his embrace. Her head dropped on his shoulder, and she felt his moustache touch her cheek.

"How blind I was!" he murmured. "Hilda, my Hilda, let me hear you say that you love me."

The brown head on his shoulder raised itself and Hilda Vane saw that most wonderful of all sights to a woman's eyes, the lovelight in a strong man's face. Something seemed to burn in her own heart and the tears sprang to her lashes.

"Oh, I do," she sobbed. "I didn't know it, really, but I do."

Robert Quaritch bent and kissed her on the lips. "Thank Heaven," he murmured, "that I did not tear up my letter at the last. I—I nearly did."

He led her back to the seat from which she had risen, and they sat down together. The intoxication of deep joy had seized upon Robert Quaritch, and he talked excitedly, almost boyishly. His years of bookworm bachelorhood had left him, in reality, a young and ardent man, though his habitual reserve and affectation of middle age had earned for him socially the reputation of an old fogey.

Hilda listened to him with growing comprehension as he told her of his plans for the future—their future!—of his determination to earn her a fortune by the exercise of his profession, of the little flat in town and the tiny place in the country he had already projected for her. A feeling of alarm took possession of Hilda Vane. Surely such wonderful happiness could not be for her—she must be dreaming—a dream from which she will wake with a start to find her life as lonely and sunless as before.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly a clock in the neighbouring hall sounded the hour. The silver strokes penetrated faintly to them and Robert Quaritch, glancing at his watch, sprang to his feet.

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed, "six—and I dine here to-night. I must get back and change. Fortunately, no one saw me come in, so I shall take the liberty of omitting a visit to the drawing-room."

He held her hands in his for a moment and looked at her with glowing, tender eyes.

"I can scarcely believe it, even yet," he said; "when I get outside into the darkness and turn my horse's head away from this precious corner of the earth I believe I shall feel my old, grey, sober self again. But I daresay I shall get used to my happiness in time. For an hour or so, good-bye."

Once more Hilda's hands, her forehead, her mouth, felt the thrilling, unfamiliar contact of a crisp moustache and burning lips, and then the doors of the palm-house closed between her and her newly-found and passionate lover.

Robert Quaritch hurried down the corridor his pulses beating, his head in the clouds.

"I am a fool," he observed, half aloud; "one would think me a raw lad. And yet, I am a lucky fool—the luckiest fool in all broad England."

A step at his side and the rustle of feminine skirts arrested him. He halted, turned, and saw Florence Coppinger.

"Ah! Lady Florence," he said, bowing, "you find me trying to slip out in a hurry. I paid a passing call and recollected abruptly that I am to dine here to-night, and that I must rush home to dress."

Florence Coppinger smiled. In the subdued light of the corridor Robert Quaritch noticed, despite his abstraction, the bitterness of the smile.

"I know all about your call," she informed him; "Mr. Quaritch, we have been friends for years. Let me confess to you my share in a foolish freak, designed, if the truth must be told, by that wild little American fiancée of my brother's, and of which I am now heartily ashamed. You received this morning a letter from Miss Vane, accepting a certain proposal with which you had honoured her."

"Y-yes," stammered Robert Quaritch. Lady Florence drew a sharp breath and continued determinedly:

"A similar letter," she pursued, encountering his glance significantly, "was written to Augustine Chesney, who had also proposed to Hilda—to Miss Vane in writing. The letter to him and that to you were sealed and stamped. One was taken at random and burnt, one posted. Till you entered the palm-house just now, Miss Vane did not know which of her two suitors Fate had chosen for her. She owned that she loved neither of you, and Pattie Beresford easily persuaded her to submit the matter to the arbitrament of chance. But I could not let your life be spoilt by it all. Forgive me my part in the folly, and be warned against an engagement to a woman, nay, a child, who is absolutely indifferent to you."

A groan burst from Robert Quaritch, and he would have spoken. But Florence Coppinger had turned abruptly and vanished up a steep and winding staircase.

He took a step in the direction of the palm-house entrance as if to return to Hilda herself. Then he stopped and, passing a hand over his forehead, hurried on down the corridor, crossed the hall, and gained the open air. A groom was holding his horse—he mounted and rode off mechanically.

His own prophecy had been fulfilled — once more he felt himself old and grey. His new-found youth had passed out of his heart and mind like the evaporating fumes of some powerful wine. And in its place were shame and wretchedness.

"Hilda, Hilda, why did you tell me you loved me?"

Part Three: Evening.

Fate Is Made Manifest.

"I CONGRATULATE you, dear, I do, indeed. He is ever so much nicer than the Honourable Augustine, and you can always feel that it wasn't you who rejected ten thousand a year, it was Fate, consulted by my specially-patented method. If only the two poor creatures knew!"

And Miss Pattie Beresford chuckled behind her fan as she sat in the arched doorway that led from the palm-house to her hostess' splendid drawing-room. Near her Hilda Vane was moving restlessly to and fro, hardly heeding her companion's chatter, but glancing from time to time across the brightly-lighted apartment beyond.

"You should have seen Flo's face though," went on Miss Beresford, "when she saw who had come to acknowledge the receipt of the all-important letter. I believe she muttered something about 'impossible'—they say she has been sweet on Quaritch herself for ages. She didn't want me to marry into the great Coppinger family, the stuck-up thing! And so I've owed her one a long time—that's why I wanted her to know he'd proposed to you."

Miss Pattie interrupted herself. "Gracious!" she cried, "here he comes—two's company and three's none. I'll be off. If he makes love as nicely as he writes it, you won't want me hanging about."

She swept her rustling skirts down the aisle between the palms as Robert Quaritch came into the space under the glass dome, and paused by the little figure in the dark dinner-gown. He was very pale, and there were dusky hollows under his eyes. Without a word he offered her his arm, and they moved on through the palm-house together. The change in his demeanour had alarmed Hilda at dinner; his silence now disturbed her still more.

Digitized by Google

"I'm afraid you—you are not well," she stammered at last. Robert Quaritch sighed heavily.

"I have been stricken to the heart," he said. "Hilda, Hilda, why did you tell me you loved me? I—I believed you, and all the while it was a mere chance and not your love that had given you to me."

Hilda Vane's hand loosed itself slowly from his arm, to be pressed to her side. She was trembling, and her face had grown almost bloodless. Robert Quaritch had not vouchsafed her the slightest warning of the thunder-bolt he had chosen to hurl at her. She could not even wonder who had played the traitor. Her mind was a pathetic blank. She sank down upon the very marble seat where they had talked a few hours earlier.

"It—it was very foolish," she faltered, "unwomanly—contemptible. But I hadn't time to think when it was first suggested to me, and then——" She broke off, unable to continue.

Robert Quaritch gazed at her, not unkindly. "I would have taken you on any terms, Hil—Miss Vane," he said. "I would have tried to win your love, to deserve it. It seemed incredible that, as it was, you actually loved me. If you had only not chosen between—between Chesney and me as though by the spin of a coin! I could have borne to lose you, but to think badly of you, to feel myself shamed in your shame and humiliation, that I cannot bear. If—if, above all, you had not said you loved me."

Hilda put her brown head on one slender arm and leant it upon the antique marble at her back. The sound of a sob reached Robert Quaritch's ear, and he stooped over her impulsively, all his native chivalry touched by her grief.

"Forgive me," he said, "perhaps I judged a girlish caprice too harshly—let us think no more of it. We can—we can be friends; you would not, of course—that is—I could not—"

An icy clutch seemed to be laid on Hilda's heart—love, happiness, all the opening beauty of the future were snatched from her by those broken phrases. They meant that she could not ever try to be the wife of Robert Quaritch.

"I'm—I'm sorry," she gasped. "You—you're wrong, quite wrong. But I couldn't explain—I—I've no proof. Please go away; I am a miserable girl!"

Robert Quaritch moved a pace or two away and then returned. "Tell me," he said, "what you mean by 'proof.' I love you still. Heaven help me! If there is any explanation possible, you owe it to me. Why, for instance, do I find on returning to home late this afternoon, a duplicate of the letter which I received from you at mid-day?"

A thrill shook the little figure on the marble seat, and Hilda sat up, her eyes wide and wet. Robert Quaritch held out to her a sheet of note-paper, covered with her own handwriting. Hilda snatched at it.

"It—it wasn't burnt?" she cried. "You will believe me then. See, see, both the letters I wrote were to you. The envelope to Mr. Chesney was empty, and I substituted for it this duplicate, addressed to you, after Lady Flo and Miss Beresford had looked at the original envelopes. So whichever one was burnt, the other was for you. They only thought it—it was Fate."

Robert Quaritch stared at her for a moment, then took her in his arms and folded her there. He was laughing, but there were tears in his eyes.

"My poor, ingenious darling," he murmured, "and so you really wanted me after all." And Hilda sobbed out something that could not have been "No," for Robert Quaritch kissed and kissed again the lips that had uttered it.

"But if one of your letters was—that is if one ought to have been burnt," Hilda was asked at length, "where did this momentous duplicate come from?"

Hilda looked at the document and shivered, almost superstitiously. "It's—it's very strange," she said, "it must be Fate, after all. But it is my letter, there is the C turned into a Q—I was writing 'Dear Mr. Chesney,' when the idea came to me. Before that I didn't mean to go on with the nonsense, really. And there's a blot I made and was in two minds to write the letter over again, only there wasn't time."

Hilda leant towards him tremulously. "Won't you tell me," she begged, "how you got to know about—about——"

Robert Quaritch folded up the mysteriously-preserved duplicate, and pocketed it.

"Some day you shall know," he replied; "doubtless we are the victims of some foolish trick—a trick that Fate has turned to our advantage, since, had this duplicate been destroyed, you would not have risked my believing the truth. And yet, I almost think I would have accepted your word for it."

Robert Quaritch was right. Fate had taken a part in the game. But not for some months did they learn in what way the part had been played, and then it was the amused and inquisitive Pattie who fathomed the mystery.

Lady Florence, it seemed, had had her own reasons for assenting to the proposed appeal to Fate, and during the shuffling of the addressed envelopes—a task deputed to her by the ironical Pattie—had substituted for a letter addressed to Robert Quaritch, one of the sealed and stamped envelopes forming part of her completed correspondence. This letter she had, for its easy identification, turned up at one corner and contrived to have it condemned to the flames. The other, she made sure, was addressed to Augustine Chesney. In point of fact it also was directed to Robert Quaritch.

As for the means by which the abstracted envelope and its inclosure had reached Quaritch in time to soften his indignation with a little masculine curiosity, they were simple enough. Lady Flo had left the stolen envelope among her letters on the escritoire, and early the following morning, her maid had posted it with them.

So Hilda's secret manipulation of her own fortune found an unexpected corroboration, and Fate had, after all, to be thanked for a marriage whose romantic happiness has not ceased to be a marvel among the masculine acquaintances of Robert Quaritch and the feminine critics of his charming little wife.

R. Norman Silver.

SHE: "Cupid is not in it as a marksman, Goosey." He "Why not, Angel?" She: "He's always making Mrs."

"WHEN he saw the enemy coming he turned and ran. I call that cowardice." "Not at all. He remembered that the earth is round, and he intended to run round and attack the enemy from the rear."

SERGEANT, to new cavalry recruit: "Never approach the horses from behind without speaking. If you do they'll kick you on that thick head of yours, and the end of it will be we'll have nothing but lame horses in the squadron."

LANDLADY: "Poor Mr. Lightweight died last week and if anyone deserved to go to Heaven he did." Mr. Heavygaul (who is slightly in arrears): "Why?" Landlady (weeping): "He always paid his board in advance, never complained if his bed wasn't made up, and, oh, such a delicate appetite as that poor saint had!"

LITTLE EDITH had the habit of eating out the soft part of her bread, and tucking the crust under the edge of her plate. The other evening Edith was detected in this, and her mother said: "Edith, how often have I told you about leaving your crusts? There may be a day when you will be glad to get them." "Yes, mamma," replied Edith, "that's what I'm saving 'em for."

YOU know that cheeky fellow Smith. Have you heard his latest trick? He goes and consults a solicitor, and, having received advice, coolly places on the table a three-penny bit. "What is this for?" "Your fee, sir; hope it is right." "Excuse me, no; my fee is, of course, six-and-eightpence." "Well," says Smith, "all right. Six-and-eightpence are fourteen pence; fourteen pence are one-and-twopence: one and twopence are three pence, and there you are!" Solicitor rises in his chair. Exit Smith.

Digitized by Google

The Disappearance of Captain Overend.

The Tale of an Ocean Tragedy.

"I can't sleep," growled Captain Overend, of the Silver Star liner Illwarra, as he rolled over for the fifth time. "She's making bad weather of it anyway, and Dickson won't be sorry to get relief."

He tumbled out and put on his things. It wanted another half hour before his watch was due, but in his present frame of mind it mattered little to him whether he took charge now or later on.

As he stood there in his state-room, Captain William John Overend was a supremely happy man. He had but just been appointed captain of the Illwarra, and this was his maiden voyage as her skipper. That was one reason for his happiness, but there was another almost as weighty. Among the saloon passengers was a certain Miss Nellie Burns, now on a voyage from Australia to the Old Country—his Nellie, Nellie whom he had loved since they were children together; Nellie who had been so proud of him when he first appeared in the brass buttons and jaunty cap of his apprentice days; Nellie whom he, out of his scanty earnings, had sent to a good school, for her parents were miserably poor. And now the dream was about to be realised. He had £250 in the bank, his pay had increased with a bound, and the one obstacle to their earlier marriage—want of means—was removed.

True, he could not see much of her on the journey, for the directors of the Silver Star Line were martinets of the sternest type, and did not hold with their officers carrying wives or sweethearts at all, let alone squiring them during the voyage. And so it came about that poor Overend and his fiancée had to be content with meaning glances and commonplace chats at long intervals, for there was a director of the company among the passengers, and it would never have done for the new commander to have given cause for offence on his maiden trip in his own ship.

Buttoning up his pilot jacket, the skipper left his cosy state-room, still full of fond thoughts of the future. The wind was rising momentarily, and he paused for a second to get his breath ere climbing to the dizzy altitude of the bridge.

Suddenly he became aware of a man and woman standing sheltered in an alleyway to leeward, deep in earnest conversation, and the strangeness of their presence there at such an hour made him curious. Presently the voice of the woman came to his ears, every word clear and distinct in the comparative shelter of the great funnel.

"It can't be," she said, pitifully. "Oh, it can't be! I am bound to him by every tie it is possible to think of. Ever since childhood we've been sweethearts, and till I met you I loved him dearly—and he's worked so hard to be able to marry me! He even paid for my schooling and bought my passage! Oh, I know I ought to love him, but I don't, not now! It's dead, as though it had never existed! Dick, darling, tell me——"

But Overend had heard enough, more than enough. Like a man in a dream he walked back to his room and shut himself in. He could not think; his brain was in a whirl, and presently he appeared on the bridge with a curt intimation to the first officer that he could go below and turn in.

"Old man seems queer to-night," was the first officer's mental comment, as he made for his quarters. "Thinking about his marriage, I suppose. And me best man, great Scott!"

* * *

Alone on the windswept bridge, with nothing but the heaving waste of black and troubled waters around him, Overend's thoughts grew gradually calmer.

His cherished ideal was shattered; his golden idol had feet of clay. The woman whose words had come to his ears with such cruel distinctness was Nellie—his affianced wife, his sweetheart since childhood, and the man with her was none other than Lieutenant Dick Hazely, of the Light Horse, nephew of one of his own directors, and one of the biggest blackguards in Sydney!

In one brief month on shipboard Nell had learnt to forget the long hard struggle Overend had made for her sake, the countless sacrifices, the patient waiting.

And now—now she had flung him over for the sake of a man who had come into her life but yesterday, and who she knew by repute to be a scoundrel! He gripped the wet rail savagely and looked out ahead, where the turmoil of the billows seemed to harmonise with his mood.

He realised now, dimly, that for him life had lost its savour; there was nothing left to live for. This woman had been all in all to him, and now the simple, trustful sailor's heart was broken.

He looked at his watch. In ten minutes the second officer would be on deck to relieve him. Then he walked up and down the bridge—once, twice—with agitated steps, thinking over the step he was about to take. Should he leave a letter for her? No, better to go to his death without a word. She had no doubt been tempted; she had fallen; and he could not find it in his heart to reproach her. "But as for him," he said aloud, though none but the moaning wind heard him, "may my curse be upon him!"

Then a mass of storm-scud obscured the moon, and when the quartermaster at the wheel glanced over the bridge it was vacant.

* * * * *

A week later The Times had the following paragraph:

The Silver Star liner Illwarra, which arrived in London yesterday from Australia, reported the mysterious disappearance in mid-ocean of her commander, Captain William John Overend. He was last seen on the bridge about 10 p.m. last Monday night. This sad fatality was followed next morning, by the suicide of a saloon passenger, a Miss Nellie Burns, who deliberately jumped overboard, sinking before a boat could be launched. From inquiries made by our representative, we learn that Captain Overend and Miss Burns were engaged, and that their marriage was to have taken place at the conclusion of the voyage. No motive can be assigned for this double suicide, and the whole affair wears an aspect of mystery.

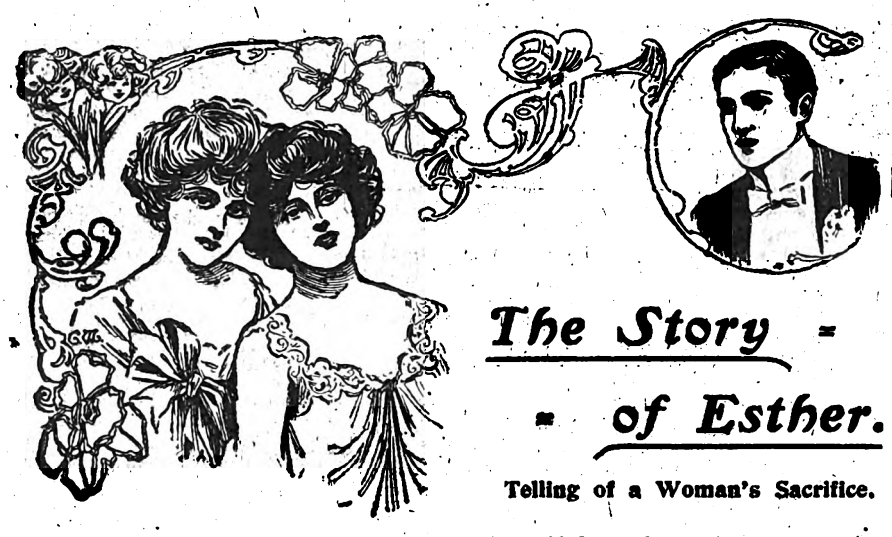
But there is a man living in Sydney to-day—one Dick Hazely, a gambler and loose liver—who, even in the midst of headlong dissipation, can never banish the ugly memory of a certain shipboard intrigue which he carried too far.

Victor Pitt-Kethley.

AGATHA: "What are you standing there and gazing up at that window for?" Marie (agitated): "Willie has gone up to ask papa to consent to our engagement, and I want to stand under to break his fall."

Digitized by Google



The Story of Esther.

Telling of a Woman's Sacrifice.

The wind rustled among the corn, and the poppies nodded coquettishly as the breeze swept over them. Overhead the sun shone in golden splendour, until the air seemed to quiver with the heat. Too hot for anything but to lounge idly in a hammock, or rest under the shade of green trees.

And yet, for the past half hour a young girl had been waiting in the full glare of the sun, on the roadside by the turnpike gates.

"You're sure the carriage hasn't passed?" she asked anxiously, scanning the long white road that wound like a ribbon, in and out the green hill sides.

"You'd do better to come in and rest," returned the woman. "Nothing has passed since twelve save the carrier's cart. Why not sit down a bit, Esther? You can watch the road as well from the window as the gate."

The girl sighed, and half unwillingly went towards the house. She was tall and well built, with a certain dignity of carriage out of keeping with the plain print gown and faded sun-bonnet.

"Is your sister worse to-day?" questioned the turnpike woman curiously.

Esther nodded, but made no attempt at further answer, and after a prolonged inquisitive stare, Mrs. Jordan gave up the attempt to "draw" her visitor, and set about her household duties.

The neighbourhood in general did not regard Esther Arnold and her sister Nerette with a marked degree of approbation. To commence with Nerette was a foreign, new-fangled sort of name for a Christian person; further, it was "stuck up," not to say presumptuous, on Esther's part to reject deliberately the advice of persons older and wiser than herself in regard to the management of the same Nerette.

Plenty of work, that is what she wants," the busy housewives would declare, pointing emphatically to the fair, slight girl, who never did anything more laborious than pick flowers, and occasionally arrange them.

But to all their protestations the elder sister turned a deaf ear. Nerette was all she had in the world, and if she could make her darling's lot ever so little easier, by her own hard work and self-denial, why it was her pleasure and her pride to do so. The two girls lived on a moorside farm, a lonely, deserted spot, where, so the wiseacres declared, nothing would grow but thistles. Despite the wiseacres, however, Esther managed to wrest a livelihood for herself and her sister out of a sandy soil, and what was more, contrived to lay up for a rainy day.

"Here's the carriage, Esther," called out Mrs. Jordan. "Look alive, my girl, the Castle horses don't like waiting."

The occupant of the carriage, a tall, square-shouldered man, with keen eyes and an incisive manner, glanced up impatiently from his book as Esther somewhat falteringly addressed him.

"What is it?" he asked sharply. "What do you want?"

She drew herself up, and her hesitation suddenly disappeared.

"I think," she said slowly, "you are Doctor Martin, are you not?"

"Yes," he returned, regarding the dark face, with its flashing teeth and deep set eyes with some attention.

"My sister is ill," she said. "I heard you were coming down from London to see Lady Lester at the Castle, and so I determined to wait here and speak to you. I want you to come and see my sister."

The physician leant back and regarded his questioner with interest. Not a village girl, nor yet the ordinary type of farmer's wife or daughter. Something out of the common, he decided, and the uncommon, having an attraction even for a fashionable medical man, somewhat affected his manner.

"Has not the local doctor seen your sister?" he questioned.

A shade of contempt lurked for an instant in her eyes.

"Yes," she said simply. "Doctor Barton has seen her—many times."

The physician smiled to himself. Evidently Doctor Barton did not stand very high in the rustic estimation—as personified by this girl at all events. He had not been much impressed himself by his village coadjutor, Barton being one of those eminently annoying persons, who, having no mind of their own, borrow that of the person to whom they may be talking.

"Will you come?" she said quietly.

She betrayed not the slightest sign of anxiety or eagerness, but stood quite still with none of the little gestures characteristic of your modern city women.

For a second he hesitated. It was important he should be back in town that afternoon. If he visited the sick girl it would delay him hours on his journey. He would miss the train; have an age to wait at a sleepy little sun-baked station; and arrive too late for an appointment that meant much to him. An appointment that he had taken infinite pains and trouble to bring about.

No, it was impossible to upset all his arrangements simply to see an ailing rustic. Viola Percival had so persistently ignored his attentions, so chilled his admiration, so skilfully evaded his most artfully-contrived tête-à-tête, that to throw away the opportunity she had at last vouchsafed him of seeing her that afternoon would be madness indeed. Viola lived with her aunt in an old-fashioned house in Fulham.

The doctor thought it dull for her, and hinted that Cavendish Square was considerably brighter. But she never responded in the least.

"My brother Laurie will settle down some time," she always said, "and then we shall live together somewhere nearer town. I shall keep house for him, and it will be altogether delightful."

But at present the prospect of Laurie's "settling" seemed very vague. He was a brilliant, extravagant, not to say rackety young man, of no profession, possessed of a small income and expensive tastes. He was not a favourite with the doctor—by reputation at all events—for the two men had met but once, and then only for a minute.

The physician sighed softly at the dainty picture his thoughts conjured up. Viola with her grey eyes and soft brown hair—Viola! He turned abruptly to Esther.

Digitized by Google

"I am afraid," he commenced.

The immobility of the woman vanished as he spoke. She leant over the carriage side, and brought her face close to his own. The sun-bonnet had slipped back, the doctor noticed that the hair fell in soft curls and clinging tendrils round her temples, and that it was a nutty brown with a touch of gold, as though a ray of sunshine were imprisoned there.

Under her dusky skin the warm blood flushed Esther's cheek, her eyes flashed, and her fingers, long and nervous, bit into her palms.

"You must come," she said. "I say you must!"

And against his will, by reason of the woman's strength of purpose, he consented.

"I can spare you half an hour," he said abruptly. "You had better get in and tell the coachman where to drive."

"Thank you," she said gravely in her former level tones. "You follow the road till you come to the mill, then turn off across the moor. The road is bad just there, I'm afraid you'll have to walk the rest of the way."

He felt aggrieved at the cool manner in which she received his consent.

"Doubtless we shall manage," he said stiffly. "Are you not coming?" opening the carriage door as he spoke.

Conventionality in the wilds of the country could not, in the doctor's estimation, count for much. Print gown and sun-bonnet notwithstanding, he felt somehow the girl would not be out of place in a carriage, and he was unaccountably chagrined when she refused.

"I shall be there sooner than you are," she said. "There's a short cut off the road." And with a bend of her head, she turned off, walking with the swift long strides that marked her out, no less than her height, from other women.

She received him half an hour later at the door of the moorside farm. Upstairs, in a sunny room overlooking the wide expanse of purple heather, a slight, fragile looking girl was waiting.

"This is my sister Nerette," said Esther quietly, and stood gravely regarding the two, doctor and patient.

A very slight examination convinced the doctor that there was little the matter with the girl beyond a latent delicacy of constitution. He glanced keenly at Esther. Was it possible that he had been mistaken in his estimate of her? Was she merely a nervous, excitable woman, ready to take fright at straws, and imagine that her sister's capricious appetite and loss of colour denoted serious illness? He was puzzled—and angry.

He bade his young patient "Good-bye," and followed Esther down the stairs with a look of determination about his mouth that augured ill for somebody.

The girl paused when they reached the hall, and stood, as if irresolute, outside the sitting-room.

Doctor Martin seized the opportunity. With a quick movement he threw the door wide open.

"I want to speak to you," he said, a trifle grimly.

With colour slightly heightened, and eyes that would not meet his own, she entered. He closed the door and followed.

"Miss Arnold," he said slowly, but with a certain intonation that stung—as he meant it should sting—"why did you bring me here, cause me to give up valuable time, and throw out my arrangements on a frivolous pretext?"

She did not meet the accusation with a quibble or evasion, but answered, her head thrown back, and her face set.

"You think it frivolous?"

"Undoubtedly. Moreover, you know it to be so. You are a woman of some intelligence, not likely to be deceived in ordinary matters, or every day occurrences. You do not need me nor anyone to tell you there is nothing much the matter with your sister. Why then trouble me to this extent? Unless," with a sudden lowering of the voice, "unless you had some other and more urgent need for my assistance?"

For a while there was silence. In the old-fashioned parlour, sweet with lavender, mignonette, and other scents of bygone times, the ticking of the clock sounded curiously loud. The doctor watched her face intently. Why had she brought him to this lonely place? What secret had this curiously self-contained woman in her life? What strange confession was he about to hear?

With a swift gesture she turned to him. "You are right," she said, "I was deceiving you. I brought you here, as you say, under false pretences. Excuse, I offer none; explanation, there is none to give you. But," and she laid her hand upon his arm, "deception is not always a cloak for evil. Sometimes circumstances are too strong for us, too strong even for men, how much more for women? I have brought you here in an hour of danger, distress. I ask you—having no claim, no right to ask it—for help!"

"Well?" he said. "Well?"

She paused and her breath came quickly. "There is a man here ill—dying. I want you to help me save his life. But you must promise secrecy, promise no one shall ever know, or hear, who or what you see."

An odd situation truly for a West-end physician—a lonely farmhouse, miles from any habitation, and a woman with a strange and dangerous secret for company!

Yet something in the woman appealed strongly to Paul Martin. Her strength, her courage, her daring drew him towards her.

"Will you promise?" she asked, and in the dimly-lighted room her face, glowing with life, held his eyes.

"Yes," he said quietly, "I will!"

She fell back a little and ran her fingers through the short, dark curls that fell over her forehead. It seemed a gesture of relief.

"Come," she said, and strangely stirred, he followed her into an adjoining room.

A man was lying half unconscious upon the bed. His head was bound up, and there had been some attempt at bandaging his shoulder.

He was young—about five-and-twenty—and when in health must have been good-looking in a boyish sort of way. The face reminded the doctor of somebody, but of whom he could not think.

"Is this man your brother, or related to you?" he asked sharply.

"No," she said; "no relative."

The doctor frowned and his manner grew a shade more distant.

"How long since he met with his—accident?" with ever so slight a sneer on the last word.

Esther shook her head. "I can tell you nothing—nothing," she said. "If you are going to help us you must deal with things as they are now."

"Draw up the blind," he told her sharply, "and fetch some brandy."

She obeyed, and stood watching the skilful fingers until he spoke again.

"The man has been shot," he said gravely, "in two places; the arm and the shoulder. He is in a critical condition!"

"Yes."

"His head is badly injured," he went on. "He seems to have struck it on something sharp."

She shivered, and her fingers twined round the rail of the bed.

"The wound is quite recent." Then, turning upon her. "How far is the nearest town from here?"

"Leeminster — some fourteen miles."

He looked at the face upon the pillow and surveyed it curiously.

"Too far to remove him, I'm afraid."

TWENTY SPLENDID GRAMOPHONES are offered for competition in this number.

Digitized by Google

THE LOVE PROBLEM SERIES commences on Page 798.

"Move him!" said Esther hoarsely. "What do you mean?"

Before the doctor could reply the sick man stirred, moaned a little and opened his eyes. And as he met their glance the doctor did, for him, a strange and unprofessional thing.

He showed surprise.

For as the man opened his eyes, there flashed into the doctor's mind the conviction that somewhere he had seen the face before. Time and place were a blank, but that it had been in very different surroundings from the present he was convinced.

"His name?" he asked sharply, laying his hand on Esther's arm.

But the sick man himself gave the answer.

"Jack Hazeldean—much at your service!" he cried in the high-pitched voice of delirium.

Doctor Martin of Cavendish Square, and of much reputation, felt himself turn pale. He had consented to do his best for the man's recovery, had pledged himself to secresy concerning the man's whereabouts, not knowing who he was.

Truly, the fashionable physician had done a nice thing for himself. Jack Hazeldean was the name of a notorious thief!

* * * * *

All the way up to town Paul Martin strove to discover the identity under which he had previously seen the wounded man at the farm. Jack Hazeldean, albeit all too well known to the proprietors of family jewels, not to mention the detective force in general, and one or two bright and shining lights of Scotland Yard in particular, had never yet been upon trial. Not for lack of evidence against him, but for lack of ability to take or keep him. Twice he had been arrested, sent on trial, twice he had escaped before the day of trial arrived. This being so the doctor could not—he reasoned—have been made familiar with his features from the pages of an illustrated paper. Where then, had he met the man?

As for the particular undertaking in which "Jack" had received his injuries, the evening papers cast a lurid light upon the subject. Lord Neswell's house had been broken into with the object of stealing the famous Neswell diamonds. Luckily the thief had been discovered, and the jewels saved. "Jack," however, had escaped, but not before one of the house party had fired at, and to the best of his belief, wounded him. From the description of the man the police believed it to be the work of Jack Hazeldean, but where that notorious person had hidden himself could not be discovered.

Doctor Martin groaned in spirit. He knew—and raged at his knowledge. Why the thief should have taken shelter at the farm was a more difficult problem. Paul Martin was not often wrong in his estimate of men and women, and Esther had struck him as being a particularly strong-willed, self-reliant young woman, not likely to be carried away in her judgment by good looks or a fluent tongue. How then had the wily Jack gained such an influence over her?

Unless—the doctor stirred uneasily and half repressed a sigh.

"A pity!" he said. "A pity! All women are fools, I suppose, where a lover is concerned."

Circumstances stood in the way of his seeing Viola Percival for the next week or two. The moorside farm and the sick man took hold of his imagination to the exclusion of other things. He would not admit that the dark-browed Esther entered into his thoughts somewhat considerably, but put his interest down to professional anxiety for his patient. He had received two or three notes from Esther—curt, business-like communications that amused yet piqued him. The patient was getting on rapidly, nearly well, in fact. No necessity evidently for him to run down again, and yet, for no good reason he could give, the doctor found himself one evening outside the farm.

Esther looked worn and thin, and her eyes did not meet his glance so fearlessly. He learnt the reason later. The neighbours, in the inscrutable manner known and practised among inhabitants of a country place, had found out that a stranger was staying at the farm. Evilmongers seized on the rumour, and tossed it one from the other, till Esther herself was shunned, and the farmhouse given a wide berth.

Something of this Paul gathered at the inn where he had put up for the night. And, moved by indignation and a host of strange and complex emotions, he wrote and asked, or rather, commanded Esther to come and see him in town.

"You're a young girl," he said, standing severely before her, "and don't know how the world talks, or the things it says. I have kept the pledge of secresy I gave you, but the time has now come when, failing other things, that pledge must be broken. The fellow is well enough to be moved by this time. Indeed, he ought to have left without being told. Now, understand me, either he is gone from your house by this day week, or I take such steps as will effectually remove him. I mean what I say, Esther."

Unconsciously he had used her name, but if she noticed it she made no sign.

"If you mean you will tell the police," she said, slowly, "they know already. He would have got away by this time only they watch the house night and day. There's only one chance to save him, only one." She paused and then turned to him with the eloquent gesture of appeal she used when greatly moved. "You must save him," she said—"You!"

Once more he felt the woman's fascination strong upon him. He leant and took her hands—well-formed and slender, for all that they were roughened with hard work.

"And then, Esther," he said hoarsely—"then——"

Her face flushed a dark, deep red, for a second she stood with lowered eyes, then, drawing her hands from his, she spoke—

"He——" she commenced.

The doctor interrupted with a sneering laugh.

"Don't trouble," he said bitterly. "I understand—he is your lover. That, I suppose, is why I am to save him."

Something seemed to choke her. She raised her hands to her throat, as though she were being suffocated.

"This fellow," he went on savagely, "This mean-spirited cur who seeks protection from two women, why am I to help him escape justice, why am I to shelter Jack Hazeldean, the thief?"

Esther, standing by the table, saw a woman pausing in the doorway. A tall, slight figure came quickly into the room, and turned to the doctor with a passionate appeal.

"You will save him because I ask you, I, the woman that you love!"

"Viola!" he cried. "Viola!"

"Oh, Paul, Paul," she said, "forgive him, help him, and take pity upon me. Jack Hazeldean is my only brother Laurie!"

* * * * *

It is an axiom that character, not circumstances, makes or mars a life. At times, however, the strongest personality is as wax in the grasp of circumstances. For three years it had been the strongest desire of Paul Martin's heart to gain the love of Viola Percival. And now, now that the fruit so long withheld was within his reach, aye, within touch of his hand, the joy of possession seemed to have lost its edge.

And yet he would not have had things otherwise. He loved Viola with the quiet strength of a deep-seated affection. The strange interest that Esther had roused in him was unworthy of his better nature—so, at least, he told himself. It was glamour, he decided, and felt scornful that he should feel attracted by a woman who had so little self-respect as to love a thief.

Strangely enough the fact that the aforesaid thief was Viola's brother never affected his attitude of mind towards her.

Digitized by Google

He was only conscious of a great pity for Viola, and a resolution to shield her as far as possible from the consequences of her brother's evil-doing.

Laurie had written to Viola from the farm, intreating her aid and assistance. She had never had the slightest suspicion as to his mode of life, and the revelation had stunned her. She had gone instinctively to Paul, and arrived just in the middle of his interview with Esther.

Paul was glad in his heart that for some reason Viola never asked for an explanation of that interview. Esther had quietly slipped away, and Viola had been too much occupied to note she had gone. Later she did nothing but contrive impossible schemes for Laurie's escape, and racked her brain—and Paul's—to hit on some way to save him.

But, as Paul had foreseen, the way was made plain, not by himself or Viola, but through Esther.

"Have a trap with a fast horse waiting by the turnpike gate on the road to Leeminster Monday afternoon at five," she wrote. "Let the driver have two railway tickets from Leeminster to London in readiness, and arrange for two persons to be met at the terminus in town." Nothing more, not a word as to whom one, at least, of the two persons was to be. Paul smiled in a cynical fashion as he read, and his mind conjured up the boyish-looking figure of Hazeldean side by side with Esther, tall and dark, with her glowing face and deep-set eyes.

Well, so be it. In two days at most he would see the last of this dusky-browed woman. He could look forward to a future with Viola. Viola of the calm eyes and gentle smile.

He arrived at Leeminster on the day appointed about two o'clock, dispatched a trusty messenger with a horse and trap and the all-important tickets to the turnpike road, and then waited with what patience he could command for the arrival of Esther and her companion. He judged it wiser not to be seen in their company, and accordingly took up a position in the waiting-room of the station, where he commanded a view of the platform without being observed.

The up train was due at 5.30. At 5.15 he commenced to grow anxious. Could they have missed the trap, had the police been too many for them, was all his care and trouble to go for naught? He bit his lips and stared hungrily at the crowd of loiterers on the platform.

A long-drawn whistle in the distance proclaimed the approaching train. Nearer and nearer it came, and gradually slowed down. With brain on fire Paul Martin scanned the faces of the people. The hurry and fuss of belated passengers struck chill to his heart. So late, so late, and yet they had not come!

The guards began to shut the doors, the engine snorts in complaining fashion, preparatory to a final shriek. Paul turns sick with apprehension. Suddenly two figures come in sight, urging their way among protesting porters and insisting newsboys. Paul strains his eyes as they pass the waiting-room, and falls back with a start. A tall, broad-shouldered woman—he had been prepared for that, but the sight of her companion comes upon him with a shock.

He had expected Hazeldean, or rather Percival, with Esther. Instead, he saw Nerette, her sister.

A thousand fears and strange forebodings shot through his mind. It was so unlike Esther to have left Hazeldean to his fate, that at first he thought he had misread her letter. No, there it was—"have two tickets in readiness—arrange for two people to be met in town." Two people—herself and Nerette!

So much for woman's devotion! Instead of saving her lover, Esther had merely removed herself and sister from the scene of his arrest. Paul felt sick with revulsion of feeling against her.

But there might yet be time for him to save Viola's brother. With all possible speed he made his way to the Moorside Farm, hoping against hope that he might not be too late.

A moment's glance as he neared the house showed him the game was up.

A knot of men were grouped a little distance from the gate, farther up the road—somewhat conscious of their own importance—two village constables were waiting, while a fringe of idlers lounged within easy hail.

A short, stout man advanced to meet the doctor. Paul had seen him once or twice before, and knew him for the local inspector of police.

"It's a bad business, sir!" he said, with a nod in the direction of the farm house. "Reckon it's hard on Esther, but——" and he shook his head portentously. He was evidently primed with information, and bursting to impart it.

"You knew the man was here?" asked Paul.

The inspector nodded.

"For the last week," he said, "we have only been waiting for him to get well. One doesn't like to nab a man but half alive, so to speak. Besides"—he discreetly lowered his voice—"I had a bit of sympathy with Esther. It wasn't quite professional, I know, but I like the girl, and I'm sorry for her. So I promised her to wait till he was better. She and her sister went out of the way this afternoon, poor things, and now"—he paused and nodded towards the house.

"I don't want any violence if it can be done without," he went on loftily. "By-and-bye he'll sneak out—thinks the coast's clear, you know, and then we'll drop on him. If we went indoors like enough he'd show fight. One of my men might get shot, and there'd be trouble."

"How long shall you wait?" asked Paul, with dry lips.

"Not after eight, it grows darkish about then, so if he don't come out we'll have to go for him."

The doctor gazed round helplessly. It had gone seven already, there was but an hour remaining. An hour in which to get this hunted wretch away from his pursuers!

Bribery? One glance at the inspector showed him the futility of attempting such a thing. Fight? What could one man do against twenty? And there was only an hour in which to make a plan. The peaceful summer evening, the sky primrose-tinted, save where the heather cast its purple shadow on the horizon, maddened him. The far-off song of a wild bird sounded in his ears like a scream of agony.

Eight o'clock—by that time Esther and Nerette would have arrived in London. By that time——

The inspector drew out his watch, and waited with phlegmatic calm for the hands to point the hour.

At that moment Paul's quick eye saw the creepers at the side of the house farthest from where they stood vibrate. Something was clinging to the long, tough tendrils, swaying nearer and ever nearer to the ground. Paul caught his breath and waited.

The figure touched earth, crept softly to the hedge—crawled through, and——

A shout went up, the cruel, exultant shout men give when the thing they hunt comes within sight. In a minute inspector, policemen, idlers, were after the fugitive full cry. Along the moor, over the hillocks, fragrant with gorse, he fled, panting and straining for that which men fight for, die for—liberty!

The tall, lithe figure of the man was seen to be making in the direction of a wood some half mile distant. There the undergrowth was so thick, and the paths so many, that it was possible, could he once gain its sanctuary, he might escape.

The inspector saw the danger, and balanced the chances. He could not afford to let the man slip through his fingers; but, on the other hand, being a humane person first and a policeman after, he did not want to fire. Possibly distrust of his own powers as a marksman had something to do with it.

Be that as it may, the decision was suddenly taken from his hands. Among the group of idlers who had joined the chase was a young fellow who had shown even more anxiety for the capture of Hazeldean than the inspector himself. He was dressed in the regulation velveteen of a gamekeeper, and carried a gun. Whether, as he stated, excitement got the better of him, or whether, as some say, he owed the thief a grudge for love of Esther, none ever knew. But as the flying figure gained the entrance to the wood, he caught the musket to his shoulder and took aim. A report rang out upon the quiet air—a report and then a thud, and a scream startled the echoes far and wide—a scream like a shot plover gives among the wind-swept marshes.

Do not Miss our New Serial, "THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY."

A great dread of what he should behold under the shadow of the trees possessed Paul Martin. He ran with heavy dragging feet like a blind man along an unknown road. The others followed, hushed into silence.

The quarry was run to earth at last; the thing that they had hunted with such fierce delight, such savage zest, lay crushed at their feet.

"Laurie!" cried Paul, in a broken voice. "Laurie!"

But when he reached the figure, and saw the face in the fair light of the early moon, a cry of exceeding bitterness broke from his lips.

Not the thief, not the man on whose liberty a price was set, lay there before him, but Esther—dark-browed and beautiful Esther—the woman whom he loved!

She raised herself eagerly and clung to his arm.

"Safe?" she questioned. "Safe?"

He answered her, his keen eyes watching her face the while, his fingers, infinitely tender, seeking to staunch her wound.

She smiled at him in her old, swift fashion as he knelt beside her. "I look like a boy, don't I?" she asked. "I'm glad I saved poor Jack. I wish——"

She broke off suddenly, fixing her large eyes earnestly upon him. "It's no good!" she said softly; "it's no good! You can do nothing for me. And you know it."

And when he stammeringly denied it, begging her brokenly to try to live for him, she shook her head and told him she was "quite content!"

"Send them all away," she asked. "I want to speak to you—alone."

"Paul," her fingers slid into his own, "Jack never cared for me."

"What did it matter?" he asked. "What did anything matter now?"

"You thought I loved him, but I never did. It was Nerette he cared for. But I was afraid the gossips might say things about her, so I let them think it was to see me he came. I never knew him as other than Jack Hazeldean, nor did I ever guess the sort of life he led. Not until the night he came to the farm half-dying. Then I had suspicions, the next day I understood."

"Why had she not told him? How much bitterness of suffering might have been spared them both?"

"Best as it is!" she said. And then, "My love could never have brought you happiness. Best as it is!"

She did not speak again, but lay quite still, while his arms clasped her jealously, as though to hold her as his own even against the King of Terrors.

In the hush of the quiet night Paul knelt beside her. The shadows of the trees—touched here and there with silver—fell like a veil upon the earth.

"Dear heart," she murmured, "it grows cold!"

Closer he clasps her, raining kisses on her hair, her eyes, her lips.

At last she stirred, and with some difficulty raised herself level with his face. Resting her hands upon his shoulders, she gazed into his eyes with a look of infinite longing, a look that bridged the gulf that lies between this life and eternity. [illegible] as she gazed she stood upon the other side. Esther [illegible]at—and the remembrance brought his solace [illegible] come—she had died happy—died in his arms, [illegible]oved most dearly in the world. She who was [illegible]? Well, not altogether. For love is stronger [illegible]airer than life; and in that other world, Esther [illegible]loves still.

Orme Lewis.

REGARDING OUR SOCIETY REVELATIONS.

Since Short Stories introduced the new form of article, of which "The Confessions of Cynthia" was the first, I have received hundreds of letters from readers who cast a doubt on many points in the stories. These readers I have, I am pleased to say, been able to convince, and to remove any doubts from their minds.

One point raised concerned the absurd pet names used in Society. The truth of Cynthia's statements is now borne out by the newspaper reports of a great Society law-suit at the moment of writing being tried. In this law-suit one of the litigants supplied the court with a list of the names of her personal friends (many of whom were titled people) together with their pet names. This list was as follows:—

Real Name.	Pet Name.
Lord C.	"Toby," or "Bobs."
Mr. L.	"Pickles."
Lady H.	"Hydey."
Mrs. G.	"Midget."
Mrs. B.	"Aggie."
Lord A.	"Pater."
Sir C. H.	"Topps," or "Bundle."
Mr. B.	"Buck."
Lord H.	"Warrior."
Mr. O.	"D.S.O."
Lord C.	"Rock."
Capt. B. H.	"Tommy."

Reference to the morning papers of December 3rd last, will bear out this statement.

After this I am sure doubting readers will have no hesitation in believing that the pet names which appeared in "The Confessions of Cynthia," and which will be found in "How I Chaperoned Belinda," are in no way exaggerated.

Result of the "Title" Competition.

The Gramophones have been awarded as follows:

F. H. England, 30 Grafton Street, C-on-M, Manchester.
J. Foster, care of J. Love, 63 Dufferin Avenue, Dublin.
R. Jones, 27 Latimer Street, Liverpool.
Reed Ison, 73 Dartmouth Park Road, N.W.
Miss E. Skerry, Clifden Lodge, New Road, Ascot.
F. Wright, 13 Richmond Terrace, Aberdeen.
J. W. Ryder, 233 Spa Road, Bolton, near Manchester.
Thos. Wragg, Edensor, Bakewell, Derbyshire.
Mrs. Stanley, 30 Garturk Street, Govanhill, Glasgow.
C. Barlow, 3 Victoria Avenue, Alma Park, Levenshulme.

Result of the Madge Morris Wedding Cake Competition.

An Edinburgh girl wins the centre ornament.

Her name is: Miss M. Humphrey, 24 Castle Street, Edinburgh. The list of the hundred competitors who won pieces of the wedding cake is too long to publish here but can be had on application.

What He Would Propose.

"This year if any mistletoe within her 'old oak hall' is found, I'm going to propose to her—to leave it there the whole year round."

He Didn't Like It.

"What was the trouble between you and young Mr. Softy?" "Why, he said his brain was on fire, and I broke a hand grenade over his head."

Swellington's Mistake.

Swellington (at the ball): "I wonder if that plain woman over there is really trying to flirt with me?" Cooler (politely): "I can easily find out, sir, by asking her. She's my wife."

Altogether Too Good.

Mrs. Hicks: "Bear in mind, young man, that Santa Claus brings presents only to good little boys." Dick Hicks: "That just hits me. I've been so good for a month that none of the boys will play with me."

He Looked Ahead.

Garry: "As you intend to marry her, why did you consent to her riding a bicycle, when you are so opposed to them?" Merritt: "Well, I knew she would have her way in the end, and I calculated that by giving in now her father would have to pay for the machine."

Poor Artist!

Wealthy Amateur: "Since you spoke to Jones and myself about this Christmas scene, Cadmium, we have arranged that one of us shall have it." Cadmium (brightening): "I am glad of that, very glad; glad on your account, too. Which of you has it?" Wealthy Amateur: "Well, we are going to toss up for it, and the one that loses takes the picture."

Warm Affection.

They skated one Christmas, but little they said, for they'd just been made known to each other, but he wished as they over the bright surface sped, that they thus might through life be together. A crash—they went through! "Oh, how awkward!" cried she. "'Tisn't deep; but has anyone seen us?" "Never mind—let me tell you—I love you," said he, "since the ice is now broken between us."

Sacrifice the First.

He had been working all the winter to get a place in the brass band as a cornet player, and just as his hopes seemed to be on the verge of fulfilment, she met him on his way home from the post-office. "George, I wish you wouldn't play the cornet in the new band." "Why not?" said he, in surprise. "It is the place of honour, and I get a great deal of attention by it, dear." "Yes, I know," she said coaxingly. "It is so nice to have you noticed by everyone, and all that, dear, but——" She paused and hung her curly head a little lower. "But what?" said he sharply. "Blowing the cornet makes—makes——" Her voice sank to a pouting whisper. "Makes the lips so stiff and hard?" George has decided not to be the cornet player in the band.

Christmas License.

Stern Father of the Girl: "I saw you kiss my daughter at our party last night, and I want you to know I don't like it." Young Man: "You may not; but I do."

An Appropriate Keepsake.

"I presume you carry a memento of some sort in that locket of yours?" "Precisely, it is a lock of my husband's hair." "But your husband is still alive!" "Yes, sir; but his hair is all gone."

Tit for Tat.

He.: "When will you learn that razors are not the things to sharpen slate pencils with?" She: "I don't know. I suppose as soon as you've learnt that hairpins are not intended to clean out pipes!"

And He Did.

She: "Don't you feel a draught over there near the window?" He (taking the hint): "I don't know that I do. What would you advise me to do: pull the blind down, or move over nearer to you?" She: "Both."

The Actor's Farewell.

Physician: "You cannot possibly follow your profession more than five or six years longer. I have known it for a long time." Star Actor (wrathfully): "Then you ought to have told me before this. You have cheated me out of several farewell seasons."

How a Girl Catches a Ball.

When a girl tries to catch a ball she throws her arms wide apart, waits until the ball hits her on the nose, turns her hands with a windmill motion, runs after the ball, picks it up, brushes her hair out of her eyes, and smiles, as though her way of doing it cannot be improved upon.

The Uses of Friends.

Jinks: "I tell you what it is, there is nothing like having lots of friends." Winks: "I presume not." Jinks: "No, sir. Just as quick as I lose a situation, my friends all rush round hunting for a new place for me, so as to save me the trouble of borrowing money from them."

Adding Insult to Injury.

She (just kissed): "How dare you, sir?" He: "I hope you will pardon me. I didn't think." She: "Think! Of course you didn't think. But your inability to think is no excuse for your conduct. I suppose you mean to tell me that if you had stopped to think you would not have wanted to kiss me."

All Men are Fools.

Old Friend: "Well, how is your flying machine getting on?" Inventor: "Getting along? I finished that twenty years ago. Every detail is complete. There it stands, ready to go." "Why don't you show it to the world?" "Can't. All men are fools." "What's the matter?" "Can't find a man anywhere with sense enough to climb up a steeple and try it."

A Christmas Terror.

The stout man with a large package beneath his arm hurried through the crowded thoroughfare, closely pursued by a small man of haggard aspect, with a thick stick in his hand. On and on, relentless as the ticking of a clock, the forlorn man dogged the other, and those who passed him heard an occasional word drop from his lips, indicative of despair, of awful terror. Finally some of the crowd turned and followed the pair, determined not to miss the fun. The crowd grew larger, and finally a bold man went up to the person of haggard countenance. "What's the matter?" he asked. The little man turned. "Matter?" he echoed. "See that man with a bundle? He is my next-door neighbour, and in that bundle he has a drum which he has bought for his small son to play upon." But the crowd waited no longer. It surged ahead with relentless fury and left him to work out his own vengeance, and when peace had been restored the remains of a battered man and a battered drum lay upon the pavement.

Digitized by Google

A Modern Cinderella.

And of the Prince Who Won Her.

"Mamma, mamma, what do you think?" cried Lyda Stuart, as she rushed into the room where her mother sat, with flushed cheeks and dishevelled hair. "I have found two tickets for the ball to-morrow night—no name or anything on them by which I could trace the owner—and oh, mamma, I want to use them; I want to go!"

"But, my dear," espostulated Mrs. Stuart, as Lyda paused breathlessly, "how——"

"Why, you kept one or two of my evening gowns, you know, mother, and I am sure the white one would do beautifully, and Tom is still quite presentable in his dress suit even if it is a bit tight—and here are the tickets, so why not? The only thing is that I want you to go too, darling," with an emphatic kiss on her mother's cheek.

"I should not care in the least about it, dear, and am afraid you will be disappointed."

"Oh, I know I shall be in it, and not of it, but that does not matter. I shall enjoy just watching it all, and hearing the music. I may combine business with pleasure, too, mamma, by getting some new ideas for my sketches."

"We will see what your brother says, dear," Mrs. Stuart answered.

She would have been loth indeed to deprive this daughter of hers of any pleasure that might come in her way, for in the reverses that had fallen on the family since Mr. Stuart's death, his wife's greatest grief had been for Lyda. The disaster had come on the very eve of her coming out, and ever since they left their beautiful English home and came to this big, seething, lonely American city, Lyda had worked steadily at illustrating.

Now she was making a success at it, and there was also beginning to be quite a demand for her dainty water-colour work.

When Tom came home, Lyda immediately pounced upon him, and related her wonderful news. He readily agreed to take her, but he warned her that they would not be likely to meet any of their few acquaintances, and that therefore she would have to be satisfied to dance with him, or be simply a spectator at her first ball.

The next day they scanned the papers for some mention of the tickets, but none appeared, so they felt justified in using them.

That night Lyda was all excitement. The white gown had required very little alteration, and as Mrs. Stuart put the finishing touches to her daughter's toilet, she felt very pardonable motherly pride in her.

"How do you like me, Tom?" Lyda asked, as she entered the little sitting-room.

Tom whistled. "By Jove!" he ejaculated, as he gazed at the picture framed in the doorway. She laughed happily, taking innocent pleasure in his astonished admiration.

"I knew you were good-looking, Lyda, but you're quite too stunning to-night; isn't she, mother?"

"She does look pretty, but we mustn't turn this bright little head with too much flattery. Remember it is only for one night," Mrs. Stuart answered a little sadly.

Tom wished that his own head were a trifle steadier. It had been aching most fearfully all day, but he would not say a word to mar Lyda's pleasure or to cause his mother any anxiety.

He felt rewarded for the effort he had made when he saw how much Lyda enjoyed her novel experience, and in listening to her bright comments on the glittering panorama.

Tom feared that dancing might tax his powers of endurance too far, and was wondering what excuse to make to Lyda, when a hearty voice exclaimed: "Why, if it isn't Tom Stuart!" And a friend from their native land shook him vigorously by the hand.

Lyda was soon gliding round with this friend of her childhood. She naïvely explained to him how they happened to be at the ball, so he took great pains to introduce his friends, and after that she did not lack for partners.

Flushed and happy, she finally went to prepare for her home-going. When she emerged from the cloak-room, she expected to find Tom waiting for her, but he was nowhere to be seen, and she stood rather nervously watching for him.

As she looked rather anxiously about for her brother, she happened to encounter the gaze of a man who stood near. He was distinguished looking, and Lyda had noticed him several times during the evening, secretly wishing that she might have met him.

As she looked up, he seemed to realise that he had been staring at her, for he started a little and turned away.

Lyda did not know what to do. Where could Tom be? If only one of the men she had met would pass that way. Her trepidation increased. Noticing this, the man who was still covertly watching her approached.

"Can I be of any assistance to you?" he asked courteously, "perhaps I could find the person you are looking for?"

"It is my brother," Lyda half gasped, raising a pair of very frightened blue eyes. Meeting his kindly, encouraging look, she hurried on.

"I thought he would be here, and cannot understand what keeps him. Ah, there he is! Thank you so much," as Tom hurried to her, looking very white.

"Why, Tom, what is the matter?" she questioned anxiously, noting his pallor.

Hugh Thurston stepped aside, wishing devoutly that "Tom" had not appeared quite so soon. Of course, he was glad that the sister's anxiety was relieved, but he very much wanted to know who she was.

"Why, I had a sort of giddy faint spell, little girl," Tom explained hastily. "My head has bothered me all day. Awfully sorry—hope you have not been frightened."

"I was rather, but it's no matter. I am so sorry you are ill; why didn't you say so, and we could have gone home sooner? This gentleman"—nodding towards Thurston—"had just offered to go in search of you."

Tom turned to Thurston and thanked him briefly, explaining his own delay. Lyda bowed a slight acknowledgment as they passed, but something in his eyes as they met hers made her heart give a sudden bound and brought a deeper flush to her cheeks.

"Who on earth can she be?" Thurston wondered. Evidently they had not come in a carriage, for she wore a hat, and a dark ulster hid her ball gown, and he knew from her accent that she was English.

Looking down, he saw a little gold pin lying in the corner where she had stood while waiting for her brother. Picking it up, he hurried downstairs and searched the corridor for her, but she was nowhere to be seen.

Thurston started to take the pin to the desk, but he changed his mind, and tucked it away in his card case. Then he went back to the ballroom and tried to find out who she was. But no one seemed to recognise his description. In such a crowd, in fact, there were many who might have answered to it, so

Digitized by Google

Thurston was forced to leave without obtaining any clue to her identity.

He marvelled at the depth of the impression that this girl's face had made upon him. His wealth and good looks won him so much favour among women, that he had come to regard them with great indifference.

He inserted an advertisement concerning the pin, but no answer ever came, and he strove to forget the owner, but many times the blue eyes seemed to look at him through the smoke rings, or come unbidden between him and a printed page.

The day after the ball, poor Tom was in a raging fever, and the weeks which followed were anxious ones indeed in the Stuart's little home, for Tom had a bad case of typhoid.

Their small savings dwindled rapidly, and Lyda worked incessantly to renew resources. Mrs. Stuart became so worn by her vigil at the sick boy's side, that the doctor feared that she too would be attacked by the disease.

Lyda, worrying about her mother, grieving because she thought that she had aggravated Tom's illness by taking him to the ball, and working even harder than usual, had grown thin and pale, and there were heavy circles under the blue eyes.

One afternoon, as she was doggedly putting the finishing touches to some dinner cards that were to be called for that day, the bell rang.

"Come in," Lyda called softly, thinking it was the doctor. "Go right in, doctor," she added, without turning her head. She was not willing that he should see the traces of tears that would brim over occasionally and impede her progress.

"I beg pardon, but my sister sent me for the cards," said a voice that was certainly not the doctor's. She rose quickly.

"Oh, pardon me," she exclaimed, then stopped short as she recognised her "ball man," as she had mentally termed him.

Hugh Thurston started eagerly forward.

"You!" he cried, with a glad ring in his voice, "you!"—I have so often tried to find you since the ball. But child," taking her hand gently in his as he saw her pale cheeks and tired eyes, "what have they done to you?"

The cheeks became so crimson and the eyes so wide with astonishment that he came suddenly to himself and dropped her hands.

"Of course, you don't understand," he explained rather lamely. "You've probably never given me a thought." The blue eyes were suddenly veiled. "You didn't leave any slipper behind that I might know of but—I found your pin after you had gone and I wanted to find the owner." He had pulled out his card case while he was speaking and now he handed the pin—a lover's knot with a diamond centre—to her.

"But it is not mine," she said, looking up with a demure little smile.

"Isn't it?" he asked surprisedly. "It doesn't matter though"—somewhat irrelevantly—"for I've done better than find the 'owner'—I've found the princess," and as their eyes met, the princess knew that the prince had come.

Winifred Alan.

CRITIC (who has dropped in for a little talk): "And what are your views on marriage?" Artist (in no humour for argument): "Oh, I am wedded to my art." Critic: "And I suppose you, too, consider marriage a failure?"

"GREAT thing—presence of mind," said Gooding; "I might have been a rich man to-day if my presence of mind had not failed me one time." "Indeed! When was that?" asked a friend. "You remember my uncle George—rich old duffer? You know I am his heir. Well, sir, I was with him one day when he was taken with a fit. I was so frightened that I lost my presence of mind and called in a doctor, and uncle George is living yet."

A REMARKABLE LETTER.

GIFT OF £50 FROM ONE READER TO THE REST.

We have received the following communication from an anonymous correspondent living in America:

DAYTON, OHIO, U.S.A.
NOVEMBER 25th, 1902.

DEAR EDITOR AND FRIEND,

IN February, 1894, I received from you a cheque for £10 as a prize in connection with a competition that ran in SHORT STORIES.

That £10 was the foundation of a fortune which I have now, thank God, accumulated. I was a single young man at the time, and could find no employment in England. So, with the help of the £10, I emigrated to America, and, after knocking about New York for a few months, found my way to Dayton. Here I started in the cycle business and, when the boom came in 1897 and 1898, I made a lot of money. This money I speculated with and have now turned into a fortune.

My reason for writing you is to express my gratitude to you for having offered the £10, and to say that I have now decided to give to the readers of SHORT STORIES through the medium of your paper five times this amount every year I am spared.

I therefore inclose you bills for two hundred and fifty dollars, and ask you to distribute these in five sums of £10 each amongst the readers of SHORT STORIES in a competition the nature of which I leave to yourself. All I ask is that the announcement may be made and the competition closed in time for the prize money to reach the winners during February, which is the month in which I received my first £10.

You are of course at liberty to publish this letter, but I do not append my name as I have no desire for notoriety and simply make this offer out of pure gratitude in the hope that those who receive the £10 prizes will turn them to as good account as I was able to turn my £10.

Your Obedient Servant,

DAYTON.

(Next week, the competition in which the five prizes of £10 each are offered will appear.—Ed. S.S.)

Digitized by Google

A Dangerous Test.

Which Nearly Ended in Disaster.

"Miss Anstey, allow me to introduce Mr. Gurden," said the actor-manager to his principal lady in the green room, between the acts.

She smiled, bent her head, and at once made him feel at home in her society.

From the stalls of that provincial theatre Gurden had watched her during five nights of the company's fortnight's stay in the town, had watched her with growing interest, as she displayed her talent in a characteristically unaffected manner. He was not a hanger-on of actresses, but a bank cashier with a serious outlook in life, although still in his early thirties. Having been introduced to the manager, Gurden had openly expressed a wish to know Miss Anstey, hence his introduction. Their talk was not made up of the usual platitudes of such occasions; it was more like that of an interview by a journalist in search of "copy." His few frank compliments charmed her, they were so natural, so much of the man himself. At the outset he was plainly an admirer, but not one of the common sort, and this fact there and then put him into favour.

Her interval was a long one. When it ended he left the green room with an encouraging invitation to drop in any evening during the company's stay in Illchester; as he did so, he was followed by the intent gaze of the "juvenile lead," the one who is popularly known as the hero of the play. He (described on the bills as Mr. Henry Montgomery), from an unobserved corner, had narrowly watched the interview; but not more narrowly than Betty Scarsdale, the low comedy actress. A young man of fine physique and a good-looking face, his admiration of Miss Anstey was an open secret to every member of the company. To her he had declared love—"an undying, ardent passion," had been his avowal; to which she had given a quiet negative, kept the affair private, and maintained the even tenor of her way as though such an occurrence had never come about.

"A new admirer," mused Montgomery, as he gave some fresh touches to his "make-up" before the green room mirror whilst awaiting his turn to go on, "and a serious one—that I can see by the cut of his face. Well, it will go hard with him or me if he makes Alice Anstey his wife; for, by Heaven, if he does, there will be a real tragedy for some of us to play. He's not one of the common or garden hangers-on at stage-doors, that's evident. At any rate, I'm going to watch them, if she remains here, when we break up next week; thanks to the powers that be, I can find somewhere to stay here, if she does."

With that he went out to take his turn before the audience.

As he passed out, Betty Scarsdale entered from the stage. "M'm," ran her thoughts, "I am keeping an eye on you, Mr. Smith. You think yourself safe here, that no one knows your past, and you can do as you like; but what about poor May Brander, whom you left in the States, and the scandalous trick you played her brother? Of course, you don't think that I know these things; and you would be equally surprised to hear that May and I were at school together and that I met her after you had left her across the Atlantic, and was given a message to you, one that would soften the heart of any but a wretch like you. But I shall not deliver it, now that I know what you are—I think that May is better off without you, or any of your kind. Ten to one you have somehow got to know that Alice has a private fortune of her own; if you didn't I'll bet that you would not be so keen on making her think that you love her. But I'm going to see a happy 'curtain' to this drama in real life, so far as Alice has a part in it, if it costs me every penny of my savings to lie by and watch the play."

On the following night Gurden took advantage of Miss Anstey's invitation to drop into the green-room for a few minutes between the acts. The company of which she formed a member was a repertoire one, giving a fresh play every other evening; so that to his friends his new and violent liking for a theatre seemed more for a play than for its leading actress. But had they known of his nightly visits to the green-room they would probably have felt some alarm that so eminently respectable and serious-minded a bank cashier was becoming the regular companion of strolling players.

One visit led to another. Then, at Gurden's cost, came a supper party at an adjacent hotel—the members being himself, the manager, Miss Anstey and Betty, the latter having thus far kept the whole secret of what she knew relative to Montgomery's doings in America. On the succeeding Sunday evening (the day after the company broke up), these four sat down to a tastefully arranged little dinner at Miss Anstey's rooms. Here it was that Gurden had his first experience of her society in private life. He had been charmed with her as an actress. As a lady far removed from all stage matters, in which light he now saw her, he was enchanted. Up to this he had, to himself only, frankly and wholly admired her. Now he was deeply in love with her. That night he went away thinking her perfect, the first of her sex. Hitherto his life had been spent in work, without a thought of womankind. Motherless and with no sisters, he had grown to manhood altogether outside the influence of woman. Eight years in a town many miles from his native place, and all the time in lonely "diggings," had made him something of a recluse. Now the whole strength of his deep, reserved natura was stirred. He loved as few men love; loved to such an extent that he could not hide it.

And she—the dullest of women, could not but see his bent. To him she was no more than a poor actress dependent on her talent for a living. What wonder then that she respected his passion, was touched by it, and decided to remain a while in Illchester? This last item was told to Betty, with whom Miss Anstey was on very friendly terms. Betty said that she had already determined to take a "rest" in the place (as theatrical people term a spell of idleness), for which fib it is to be hoped that the recording angel forgave her.

Towards the end of that week Gurden called to spend an evening by appointment with Miss Anstey. After some music they sat talking a while. Then he rose to go. The coldness of the night necessitated an overcoat, and when he was about to put it on she stepped forward to help him. That was the crisis, the psychological moment when his love was too great to withstand.

"Alice!—Miss Anstey!" he murmured in a low, deep passionate tone, "I——may I?" He had refaced her. His right hand was half round her waist. In his left hand hers was gripped in a manner that gave a pleasurable pain. Abashed at his own abruptness, fearful of giving offence or of speaking too soon, he stopped as suddenly as he had commenced to declare his love. They stood almost facing each other, her large grey eyes looking up in an inquiring, half-shy, half-encouraging way at his earnest face.

Her quietude and open gaze gave him new assurance.

"Miss Anstey," he began again, "I should like to tell you something, to ask you something; but——"

Had he been more accustomed to women he would have known that her warm passivity was proof of how ready and willing she was to hear what he had to say. "Perhaps I ought not to—I may be trespassing on your kindness. I——" Was the opportunity to slip by? Would he drift from the subject, leaving it merely suggested? Would she have to wait for another occasion, never hear what he really had to say, or help him to say it now? And yet was there truly any need of it being said? On his part, was not that arm about her waist sufficient? On hers, the quiet bearing, and the passive happiness on her face were surely satisfactory pledges that she both knew and accepted what he wished to say. They had known each other only a fortnight. They were standing in the position of acknowledged lovers, he to her and she to him. What need could there be for more declaration? Only that, in view of what might be inferred this way or that, a few words would prevent misunderstandings. He seemed unlikely to say them as matters stood. Hence she saved the situation by remarking:

Digitized by Google

"Yes, you have something to tell me. What?"

"That I love you!"

"Why," she smilingly answered, "I knew that, you silly. I thought it was some news you had."

"And I want you to marry me—to be my wife."

"Well, that is the natural conclusion—isn't it?—although not always arrived at." She was inclined to a pleasantly jocular mood, but made not the slightest effort to free herself from his half-embrace. There was between them an affinity that sent reserve far into the background and was quickly making them feel at home under each other's touch; yet he scarcely knew how to take her mood.

"But you, Alice?" he said, anxiety marking his voice; "I may call you Alice—may I not?"

"Of course you may. What else should you call me?" was her sweetly tantalising reply.

"But you?" he repeated interrogatively.

"Ah, me?" She turned away from him, naturally and gently, not as if wishful to be from his side. "I am afraid I don't understand myself and shall never be satisfied." He watched her movements tenderly, as she partially crossed the room. "Do you know," she added, with a winning smile, turning and pausing by a table on which she rested one hand, "I have registered a vow never to marry any man, though he be a prince, a hero, or a genius, unless he first proves his love by some very great sacrifice. Am I not quixotic? I know I am romantic. But there, men are so light in their love; and I have made my vow and must keep it. In fact, I shall keep it, no matter how I love; for I could not believe in his love if I did not test it in some uncommon way. Is it not foolish of me? But then, you know, we are all foolish in some way or other at some time or other."

Here she returned slowly and smilingly to him. He took her gently in his arms, kissed her, said that he was ready to make any sacrifice she could suggest and went his way, feeling that he had suddenly entered on a new life.

* * * * *

"Is the manager in?" It was Montgomery who put this question to the first clerk he saw behind the counter of the branch bank where Gurden was cashier.

"I think so. What name, please?" was the answer.

Montgomery took out his card-case, drew one from it, wrote a few words on the pasteboard, then handed it to the clerk, who proceeded with it to an inner office, reading the written message en route. In a couple of minutes he returned and ushered Montgomery into the manager's private room.

"Good day, Mr. Montgomery," said the bald-headed manager, as his clerk disappeared. "Take a seat. I see by your card that you have a letter of introduction from our chief secretary."

"I have," answered Montgomery, handing forward the letter.

"So you wish to become a bank clerk, Mr. Montgomery?" the manager said, looking up from his perusal of the missive.

"Yes, I should be very glad of an opportunity in that way," he replied; "and Mr. Davies" (the secretary), "who was a friend of my mother's family, thought you were in need of one."

"Well, I am, and as Mr. Davies so strongly recommends you, I shall be pleased to give you a start. You have, I see," (referring to the letter) "worked in a bank before, although it is some years ago." He went on to talk of the vacant post, salary and promotion: then Montgomery departed, to begin his new duties on the following morning, muttering to himself—"Now, Mr. Gurden, it's you or me for the prize, and if my ingenuity cannot get you disgraced here, it won't be for the want of trying."

* * * * *

"How late she is!" Gurden murmured under his breath, as he produced his watch, gave it a glance, and returned it. The pointers indicated ten minutes past nine. "She promised to be here at eight-forty-five, and I don't see anything of her yet." His eyes searched the street to right and left.

There was an anxious, troubled look in his intelligent blue eyes, and about his mouth a drawn expression, accompanied by a nervous twitching of the brows. It was the night of the shopman's holiday; few people were about, and he was pacing to and fro outside an arcade in Illchester.

"Isn't she coming, I wonder?" And again he paused, examined his watch, replaced it, and resumed his slow march from about twenty yards on one side of the arcade to the same distance on the other.

Fifteen minutes past nine—nine thirty-five—a quarter to ten, and yet she came not. Still more anxious grew his expression, more troubled the look in his eyes, and more restless his movements. Again and again he peered into the arcade and round the long, street-like square in which he walked. The look of a condemned man for a reprieve could not be more full of expectant anxiety than was Gurden's; but his eyes were still unrewarded, and his heart increased its beating.

"What can be the matter?" he, in his strained condition, muttered half-aloud; and a passing newsboy gave him a questioning glance. "What has kept her, I wonder? Surely she has not made a mistake! I told her plain enough to meet me here, and she knows the place," he noiselessly continued. "Can she have suddenly been taken ill, or some accident have happened to her? Something must have gone wrong, or she would be here, I know." Another five minutes of terrible suspense passed away, five minutes which seemed five hours to the conscience-stricken man.

"My God!" he at last cried within himself, "I can't stand this any longer. I must know what is the matter. After the horror I have gone through, I'm not going to let the thing slip now." He abruptly turned on his heel, and hurried away to a thoroughfare on the opposite side of that busy centre of the town. Presently he opened the front gate of the house where he had spent some very happy evenings (though the succeeding nights had been followed by a hot conflict between love and conscience). He bounded up the six stone steps and gave a spasmodic knock at the door, which was quickly opened by a prim little servant maid.

"Is Miss Anstey in?" he eagerly asked.

"No, sir. She left early this mornin', and took all 'er luggage away with 'er."

"Did she say anything about coming back?"

"No — she said she shouldn't be comin' back no more."

"Has she left any message for me?"

"No, sir, not as I knows of. Wait a minute, please, an' I'll see." She disappeared within. Soon the girl returned with the message that Miss Anstey had left no message of any kind for anyone.

"Thank you." He sprang down the steps and made all possible haste in Turn to pages 792 and 819 and win a Gramophone.

Digitized by Google

TWENTY SPLENDID GRAMOPHONES are offered for Competition in this Number.

the direction of the town. Again he entered the square, fully expecting to see her whom he sought waiting for him. But his intense gaze failed to find her. During the next three or four minutes he stood in doubt. He was weighing the advisability of what best to do. Then the look of troubled irresolution passed away. He turned up his coat collar (for the nights had grown colder than the one when a lift at his overcoat had brought about a declaration of love), buttoned the garment, meanwhile saying to himself, "I suppose I must get out of this; there's nothing else for it now," and strode off in the direction of Fleetthorpe, a village four miles away.

On some rising ground just without the town he paused, and looked back at the wide group of lights below him, which he expected he was leaving for the last time—and leaving a disgraced name behind him. But self-accusing retrospection was then useless. He had cast the die—the hazard was his, and he had taken it, though certainly not without much thought, and as the last desperate thing to win her.

Like many another good, and many a better, man, he had bartered away his fair prospects and the well-earned reputation of fifteen years of honest dealing in business and private matters—all to please and win a woman.

He turned his face once more towards the darkness where lay Fleetthorpe. A lump rose in his throat. He smothered a sigh, muttering, "Yes, that will be the best thing to do now; go on, and stop there to-night; then catch the first train in the morning. I mustn't be seen to leave Illchester by rail—a cabman might recognise me; and if I get to Liverpool by three to-morrow afternoon, I shall be soon enough. Yes, that's what I'll do; probably she has gone on ahead. She must have made some mistake and will put it right." He stepped forward at a brisk pace, his head drooped in conscious shame.

When he had walked about a mile he checked his speed somewhat; then, as if acting on a sudden impulse, he came to an abrupt halt at a bend in the road. For the space of a minute or so he stood quite still. His face was turned towards the town again. "I might put it back and make things all right," he said, under his breath. "I should be glad to, if I were sure of not seeing Alice again." With her name her image rose in his mind. A sigh fully escaped him, and he muttered, "But if she has gone on to Liverpool—she is surely awaiting me there."

Again he swung round and began to increase the distance between himself and Illchester. At that juncture, just as the curve in the road was fully rounded, he thought he heard a scuffle; then a faint cry reached his ears. "Heavens!" he whispered, "there's something wrong going on here, surely." His head was slightly drooped and turned aside, with one ear in the direction whence the sound had come. Again he distinctly heard a muffled cry, and with a couple of bounds he passed through a gap in the hedge between the road and the woodland that skirted it. Here he paused and listened. Now he was sure he heard a struggle going on, and he rushed forward amongst the trees—his feet scattering and crunching the dry leaves and twigs as he went. Other footsteps sounded on the still night air. He doubled round a huge cluster of bramble bushes and paused at the sight of a woman motionless on the ground.

"Merciful powers, there is something wrong!" burst from him. Then he leapt forward, casting a hurried glance round; but seeing no one, he stooped, raised the still form, and, half-dragging, half-carrying her, he bore her to where the ghostly light of the rising moon made the woman's features look ghastly in their whiteness. The instant he reached an open space he laid the burden down and bent his gaze on her face.

"Oh, horrors, it is Alice!" hesoried out, dropping on his knees by her side. In an instant her head was on his arm. He called her name eagerly, and wildly ran his hand over her head in search of possible injuries, and was greatly relieved when he found none. Now he chafed her hands and now her temples, white and almost pulseless; now he passionately kissed her, and again repeatedly called her by name. But there was still no sign of returning consciousness. He sprang to his feet and stood irresolute. He knew not what to do. Again he dropped on his knees. Once more he chafed her hands and face; again he kissed her and spoke her name in her ear, while his frame trembled with anxiety, and he grew impotently frantic at his helplessness. At last her eyelids slowly lifted, and her eyes—as her thoughts assumed a less chaotic taste—put on a frightened look.

"Oh, please let me go!" she faintly murmured; and, turning away, she endeavoured to rise.

"Alice! Alice!" he eagerly and gladly exclaimed. "Don't you know me? I'm Fred! Don't you know me, Alice?"

At the sound of his voice she made a move towards him, tremulously gazed at him for a moment, then murmuring, "Fred, Fred," she nestled to him like a frightened child to its mother.

When she had fully regained her self-possession, and he had led her on to the roadway, he asked her how she came to be in such a predicament.

"I was coming to meet you, when a hand suddenly covered my mouth, and I was dragged in there before I could cry out or do anything," she replied, indicating the place where he had found her.

"But however did you get here, Alice?"

"You said last night that it would be best to book from Fleetthorpe to Manchester and then re-book to Liverpool; so, when I sent my luggage on this morning (as you told me to) I thought I would come out here and spend the day at Fleetthorpe for a change, instead of remaining in Illchester. And I did so; and when the evening came, and it was time to come to meet you, I thought I would walk—the weather was so fine; but I think I started late and lost my way; then he (the man who had decamped) molested me."

"Has he hurt you much?" Fred anxiously inquired.

"No, dear," she answered, smiling to reassure him.

"You feel quite all right now?"

"Yes, but for the shock and a little rough shaking, I am no worse."

"I should like a chance of shaking him," Fred growled, as their conversation brought the molester back to his mind.

"Don't heed the unpleasant affair, dear; it isn't worth while to look for him, although he did seem familiar in the one glance I had of him."

"I don't know about the worth of the matter; but I should take good care to find him if we had time to spare. As it is we must be moving, Alice. We must catch the Teutonic to-morrow afternoon."

"But you haven't got the money, Fred, have you?" she asked, giving him a look wherein anxiety, incredulity, and fear struggled for the mastery. Now that the climax was reached her joy at proving her power over him was lost in her horror of what he had done to satisfy her.

"Yes, came the low, slow reply; and he turned away his shame-flushed, guilt-paled face. "I promised you I would, and I've done it," he added, in a voice full of bitter resignation

For a moment she looked at him with eyes full of a chaos of expressions, the predominant one being loving trust; then she instinctively poised herself on her toes, reached up her arms, clasped them round his neck, and breathlessly exclaimed:

"Oh, Fred, there's no need for it! I was only trying you, and I didn't think you would do it. I thought you would come at the last minute and say that you could not do it; then I would tell you all, and we would go away as we have arranged. Oh, what shall we do?" The enormity of the crime into which she had led him, in her foolish desire to test the strength of his affection for her, now flashed upon her with such force as to put all other thoughts and feelings completely in the background, and made her tremble at the probable consequence of her rash act.

Digitized by Google

"What do you mean?" he gasped.

"There is no need of it. I have plenty. I was only testing you!" She tearfully rejoined, her eyes drooping, at the consciousness of her shame. "Oh, why did I induce you to do such a thing?"

"Do you really mean what you say?"

"Yes, dear. I have a private fortune—enough for us both. I was with the Gaiety Comedy Company only because I was fond of the stage. But, because of what I've seen with others, although I love you so, I wanted to see if yours was only a passing fancy; and that is why I proposed you should rob the bank, and we should go to South America with the money. I never thought you would do it, really. Oh, forgive me, Fred!"

"Thank God!" he devoutly murmured. "Don't cry, Alice," he gently said after they had stood some minutes in a contemplative embrace. "You know now that mine is no fleeting fancy; and the wrong that has been done can be undone, thank Heaven."

Footsteps were heard down the road behind them, coming their way—townwards. They moved slowly forward, on a strip of greensward by the side of the turnpike and overshadowed by the high thorn hedge. A dark form appeared, and was soon abreast of them.

"That's him!" involuntary whispered Alice.

Fred sprang into the middle of the road at a leap. "And Montgomery!" he cried. Whereat the other fled as if death were at his heels. After him went Gurden, at the spur of instinct; but Alice's voice crying, "Oh, Fred, Fred, don't leave me here alone!" caused him to give up the chase at once. He returned to her, and together they walked back to Illchester—she persuading him to take no further notice of Montgomery (if the runaway were indeed her late fellow-actor), but to put the money back on the following morning, resign his post, and accept half her fortune by an immediate private marriage.

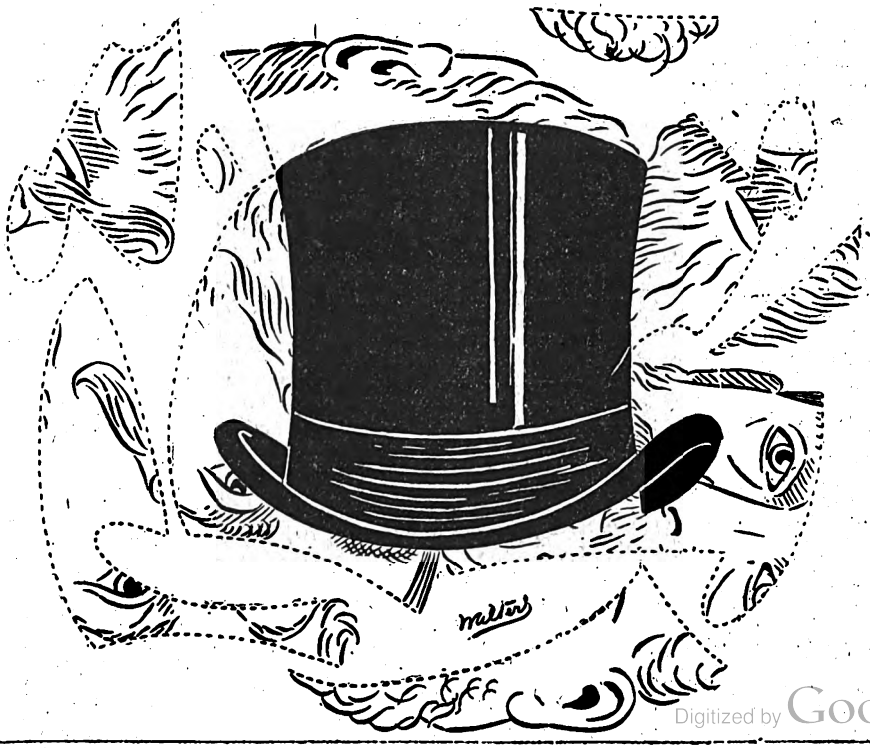
Early next day Gurden was at his desk, but not so soon as was Montgomery, who at once informed him (with a vengeful delight that could not be hidden), that the manager was waiting to see him "inside," meaning in the private room.

Gurden fully surmised that his sin had already been discovered, and rightly attributed that fact to Montgomery, who, late on the previous night, had called at the manager's house and so far assured him of Gurden's theft as to cause a very early attendance at the bank and an examination of his cashier's books.

When Gurden entered he saw his books on the manager's table and a severe look on the latter's face. Before his superior could speak he cut the matter short by confessing, in very few words, what he had done, putting the money on the table as he spoke, then verbally tendered his resignation, and expressed a hope that in view of his past, the matter would go no further. He had, he said, come to the bank before his usual time in order to replace what he had taken.

Whilst the manager spoke of his sorrow at the slip of so trusted a servant, his pleasure at the turn the affair was taking, and examined the money to see that all was right, a commotion began in the bank itself. The manager rose to ascertain the cause of this, and through the open door Gurden saw a detective arresting Montgomery on a charge, as the officer said, of embezzlement in the United States—a crime that was being paid for by the imprisonment of a partially-innocent man, the brother of the girl whom Montgomery had secretly married there and then left to work or starve, the affair on which Betty had mused when Gurden was introduced to Alice at the theatre. This was the last that Gurden ever saw of his criminal rival, of whose past he and Alice now heard from Betty. His resignation was accepted, and Betty told him at the wedding that he had merely exchanged an arduous post for a loving wife and ample means—whom she would have helped him to win had her services been needful.

J. E. Patterson.



COME AND WIN A GRAMOPHONE.

SPECIAL CHRISTMAS OFFER to readers of "Short Stories" who would like to have a Gramophone with which to amuse their friends at Christmas parties.

The accompanying picture is composed of the various sections of the face of a gentleman well known to Britishers.

WHAT YOU MUST DO.

Cut out the sections round the dotted lines, and piece them together under the silk hat to make the complete face. You will, of course, find that there are too many sections, so that you must select the correct ones.

To each of the ten readers who send in the neatest correct faces will be presented a handsome Gramophone.

Remember, neatness counts, and the Editor's decision is final.

Address your attempt to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, W.C. Mark your envelope "Face." Attempts must reach us not later than first post on Tuesday, December 23rd.

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY.

A FOE IN THE FAMILY

By NOWELL CAY.

Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

LAST INSTALMENT.

BIBLIOTECA BODLEIANA

A Tragic Event.

ILDEN was looking pale and haggard. His set face showed the signs of a long-drawn suspense. For more than twenty hours he had been seeking his wife without a moment's rest—without a moment's respite from the anxiety which consumed him.

The night had been wasted in following a false clue, provided by his detective. It had led to nothing, and the discovery of its futility had left him with barely time for the carrying out of his own plan—the only one which suggested itself.

He remembered that he had been determined to see Percival immediately after his father's funeral, and insist on his giving some account of his connection with Despard. It was more than ever important for him to do so now, when the discovery of Despard might solve the problem of Florence's disappearance; and he had started on the long journey north, chafing at the obstacles which an unkind Fate seemed determined to place in his way.

The trains had been delayed by fog, and just outside York there had been a slight accident which necessitated further waiting.

It had become certain, then, that he could not be present at the funeral, and to his annoyance at the unavoidable breaking of a promise was added the more serious consideration that he might lose his only chance of seeing Percival Ilden.

There was little doubt in his mind that his cousin would do his best to avoid him. It was only till the interment of his father that he could be sure of his whereabouts, and Ilden became more and more anxious and impatient as the time of the ceremony passed, finding him still in the train, but creeping nearer to his destination.

When he reached Mordenhale station at last it was to find that his anxiety had been justified. A pile of luggage bearing Percival's label stood on the platform.

"Mr. Ilden is leaving Mordenhale, then?" he said to the station-master.

"Yes, sir. He is going out of England, I believe. He is expecting to catch the four o'clock train."

Ilden glanced at his watch. There was time left for their interview, and he strode hastily up to the house to meet the man he sought in the hall.

The news of his arrival reached Grant as he was packing for his departure into the world, and put an end to a last uncertainty for him. He had been feeling that he was committed to assist Catherine in her search for her cousin until it ended. Now he had no tie to keep him, and relief at an ordeal avoided mingled itself with a less selfish relief to know that Catherine's fears had been unfounded.

There was no need to see her now, he told himself. It would be safer for him not to do so, and he seated himself to write her a farewell letter, a letter which tried his fortitude to the full.

Downstairs, meanwhile, Percival had concealed his instinctive disappointment at seeing Ilden alive to greet him with a show of geniality.

"Thank Heaven you have turned up, old man," he said, holding out his hand. "We have all been quite uneasy about you. It seemed so unlike you to miss the funeral. I am sorry you are too late even for the reading of the will. They are wrangling about it in there now."

George ignored the extended hand and the unusual show of geniality.

"I want a word with you, cousin Percival," he said, his voice hard and uncompromising.

His cousin had adopted his genial tone with deliberation however, and had no intention of abandoning it.

"By all means. Come in here. We can have a chat all to ourselves there, and I have no doubt I have news for you. Not that I can give you long. I have only been waiting for this sad business to finish to get away from this wretched climate, and my train goes at four."

He was leading the way as he spoke to the drawing-room, a long, low room on the ground floor opening through a conservatory upon the garden, and Ilden did not interrupt his speech until he had followed him within and closed the door.

Then he turned upon him with an abrupt incisive question.

"Where is my wife?"

Percival was still smiling.

"You speak as though I were Lady Ilden's keeper."

It seemed to George as though he were trying to gain time to think out an attitude, and he interrupted him sharply.

"You know where she is."

"At the present moment, no. Neither Lady Ilden nor Catherine cared to accept my invitation to stay here, so I cannot pretend to be acquainted with their precise whereabouts."

A shade of bewilderment was creeping into the tragic determination of George's mood, but he still spoke with accusing hostility.

"You admit that you have asked my wife here. You shall tell me before you leave this room where you saw her."

Digitized by Google

"With the greatest pleasure. It was in the churchyard less than an hour ago, when I imagine that she was hoping for your appearance, and feeling uneasy that you did not come."

"It is a lie," said George. "You are trying to deceive me."

For answer Percival shrugged his shoulders and rang the bell.

"Will you kindly tell his lordship where Lady Ilden is at the present moment?" he said to the footman who answered it.

The man answered without hesitation.

"Nobody seems to know for certain, sir. They are looking for her in the grounds and in the Church wood. They say that she caught sight of the man the reward is offered for, and went after him by herself. But I was told they hadn't found either of them, and Miss Hay is in a great state, thinking he may have done her an injury."

It was very far from being the answer that Percival had expected, and the complacent smile faded from his face. He forgot to look for the effect of the announcement on his companion. Despard was in Mordenhale, if this story was true, and he reviled his own luck in not having got abroad a day earlier. He was questioning the footman with every sign of anxiety. According to the vague rumour which had already reached the house, Despard had watched the funeral from the coppice. It was thought that he had been waiting there to shoot Lord Ilden.

Percival's wits came back at the suggestion. It was not likely that the desperado would allow Lady Ilden to overtake him. Till she had given him his sister's message there was more to be hoped for than feared from the presence of the two men in the same spot. He turned to his cousin.

"I did not know Despard was here. Lady Ilden will need our assistance. This is the shortest cut to the Church wood, where she was last seen. I will follow you in a moment when I have found a revolver. From what we have seen of Despard, he appears to be a desperate character."

But George was already questioning the footman excitedly, trying to discover the spot at which his wife had last been seen, and he had hurried through the conservatory and into the grounds before Percival's sentence was finished.

It was not till he was running across the lawn that a doubt entered his mind of the truth of this story he had heard, strange and incredible as it sounded. It came to him with a sudden deceiving clearness that the footman had been prepared with it. It was a trick intended only to get rid of him until Percival had obtained the start of him on his flight out of England.

He stopped undecidedly, and took out his watch. It wanted twenty-five minutes only to four when Percival's train left the station, and, with a sudden resolve, he turned back.

His cousin should not be lost sight of. He should come with him on his search, and he turned back, unconscious of the fact that he had been seen by Guy Despard and Florence, as he stepped out on the lawn.

To Florence his appearance had seemed in the light of a miracle. She was half afraid that it must only be an illusion of desire. How was it possible that George could be at the house alive and well and she not know it? Then the thought of his danger came to make his appearance seem more real. It was really her husband; but Despard would see him and kill him.

She had pursued the unkempt figure which she had recognised from the churchyard, catching a glimpse of him now and again among the trees, but failing to overtake him or make him turn his head in answer to her appeals. The

(Continued on next page.)

Swallowed 150 Coins.

A MAN'S ASTOUNDING FEAT.

An astounding case was reported recently in the Lancet. A poor Pathan who was crossing the frontier into Afghanistan with his hard-earned savings had an idea that he would be robbed. Without hesitation he proceeded to swallow the whole of his hoard, amounting to some 150 coins, and then, when the danger was passed, he coolly went to a military hospital and asked to be—and was—cut open so he could get his money again. An iron constitution like this is not likely to be undermined by indigestion or its allied ailments.

Few people, however, are blessed with such a constitution, and thousands suffer the agonies of indigestion who have not swallowed any indigestible substance. For all forms of this ailment Chas. Forde's bile beans are the world's specific. Describing how they cured her of acute dyspepsia Miss Annie Green, of Denton, Newhaven, said to a Bognor Express reporter. "So weak was my digestion that I dared not eat any solid food. For months on end I lived solely on milk puddings, until naturally I became ill and depressed. For three years I suffered from indigestion in its most acute form, and I never knew what it was to be without pain. I could not do any housework, and I began to despair of ever getting better. All I seemed to want was to be still and do nothing. I had severe pains in my chest and between the shoulders, accompanied by headache and a constant feeling of languor. My nerves were so shaken that I feared to go out after dusk. At night my sleep was disturbed by horrible nightmares. I took pills and tonics without relief, and one day I bought a box of bile beans. To my surprise a few doses brought relief. I persevered, and slowly but surely my condition improved. The distressing and painful symptoms I had so long endured gradually left me until I was eventually quite cured. My indigestion is now all that it should be, and my constitution is stronger by far." Bile beans for biliousness never fail to cure indigestion, headache, pains in the chest and shoulders, sleeplessness, biliousness, and all liver and kidney disorders. For constipation, piles, anæmia, and all female ailments, colds, rheumatism, influenza, they are unrivalled. One and three-halfpence or two and nine a box is the price at all chemists, or from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C. There is nothing like them for restoring and keeping in order the digestive system.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE RED WHITE & BLUE
DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST AND AFTER DINNER.
In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.
SOLD THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

Digitized by Google

pursuit had led her into the grounds of the house and to the sequestered south lawn outside the drawing-room.

But here he was lost sight of. It seemed to her as if the figure had disappeared near the shrubbery away from the house, and she waited there seeking and calling distractedly to the hidden man that she would do nothing except ask him for her husband and tell him something that his sister had said for him before she died, and something also that his sister did not know. But there had been no answer, and she had waited and waited near the spot where she had seen him last, whilst Catherine and the others were searching the wood for her, fearing to leave it, lest she should lose him altogether, and with him all chance of knowing what had become of her husband.

And then from the window of the conservatory across the lawn she had seen the husband she already mourned as dead, appear clearly coming towards her hastily. She had watched him with a breathless wonder turn and retrace his steps, and then too late, as he re-entered the house, she had started forward calling to him. For as he disappeared she had seen another figure rise from the shrubbery close by the window through which George had just passed, and enter after him.

The next moment the report of a revolver ringing out into the silence of the garden seemed to put into one terrible expression all the sickening dread that had been in her heart.

She ran now only to see the verification of her fears. In the drawing-room a crowd had already collected, drawn from the next room by the report which had put an abrupt ending to the wrangling over the will that had still been going on there. They were all gathered in a close group round something in the centre of the room, all except the two or three who held Guy Despard a prisoner against the wall.

The murderer was making no effort at escape. His eyes held a satisfied smile which made his white face even more terrible. But Florence did not glance at him. She was pressing forward with eyes that strained themselves only to see the figure that lay extended on the floor in the centre of the room. Somebody in the centre of the group seemed to rise from his knees.

"He is quite dead," he said, "shot through the heart, I should say."

The words sounded the death-knell of her last hope.

The Foe Discovered.

The report which drew everybody into the drawing-room reached Grant Ilden in the midst of writing his last farewell to the girl he loved, but whom he felt that he could never ask to be his wife, and for a moment he sat undecided trying to explain it to himself.

Then the sound of hurrying feet downstairs took him down unwillingly, and he was ready to regret the impulse when in the hall he found himself face to face with Cathie who came hurrying in excitedly from the grounds. He had intended never to see her again. It would only make parting harder, and he was afraid of the temptation that might come to throw honour to the winds if she showed by a word or look that his going would pain her.

She turned to him instinctively, laying her hand on his arm.

"What has happened? There was a shot, and they tell me cousin George is here?"

"I know nothing," he said. "I was upstairs when I heard it. Everybody seems to be in the drawing-room."

They went there together, Cathie with her hand still on his arm in unconscious reliance, followed by some of the servants who had been accompanying Catherine in her vain search for Florence in the wood.

The little crowd had cleared now from the silent figure on the floor, and Cathie uttered a cry, seeing her worst fear realised.

"It is George. He has killed him."

But even as she spoke she saw that Lord Ilden was at the other side of the room holding his wife in his arms. At the same moment Grant's startled exclamation told her the truth.

"Good God! It is Percy."

"The man who deserved death at my hand." Guy Despard's voice, calm and emotionless, sounded clearly above the whispering around him and silenced it suddenly. "I have to ask your forgiveness, Lord Ilden," he went on in the same collected tone, "for the many attempts I have made to take your life. A just and all-seeing Providence guarded you and saved me from the sin of taking an innocent life in my ignorance. Now that I have found the villain who, by taking your name, tried to brand you with the shame of his ill-doing, He has no longer turned my aim or robbed me of my just vengeance."

To George himself the words were still only the meaningless rambling of a maniac. It was not till afterwards that his wife and Catherine together enabled him to understand how nearly he had been made a victim for the heartlessness of his cousin, who after all had deserved his suspicion by being his only actual foe.

And it was only in prison that Despard explained how his first suspicion of Ilden's innocence had been conceived during the cross-examination at Pennybrook Hall, and strengthened by Percival's kindness in setting him at liberty; how he had gone to Castledale to make inquiries, and found his suspicion confirmed.

For the present his explanation passed almost unheeded. George had thought only for the girl-wife, so unexpectedly given back to him, who trembled in his arms, scarcely able to believe yet that it was really he, alive and uninjured, who held her.

They were the first to leave the room, with its terrible tragedy, which only served to emphasise the danger through which George had passed.

As they sat in the pleasant little morning-room, where he had taken her, holding each other's hands and drinking deep of the love and thankfulness which each saw in the other's eyes, Florence was struck by a sudden thought.

"And now that you know that I did not help you a bit by marrying you," she said, "are you not sorry that you made me your wife?"

"Only for one reason," said George, and the lovely face looking into his grew serious.

"That I cannot marry you again, and ask everybody I know to rejoice with me in my good fortune."

It was afterwards, when the body of Percival Ilden, the foe in the family, whose tragic removal left Ilden at peace with his relatives and the world, had been carried to the principal bed-chamber of the house he had called his own for one short half-hour, that Sir Charles Barton took Grant aside.

"I am glad that you agree with me about your father's will," he said. "I do not wish to say anything against the dead, but there can be no doubt that your brother used undue influence to make him forget his other children. Now that you have the disposal of the property you will not forget that."

Grant was not in a mood to discuss the question; but it brought with it a sudden realisation, and he went up to his room to tear up a half-finished letter that need never be delivered now.

The End.

See Our Competitions On Pages 792 & 819.

(Don't miss reading our new serial by Louis Tracy, entitled, "The Albert Gate Mystery," on page 793.)

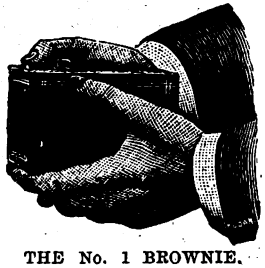
Digitized by Google

FOR THE CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

A KODAK FOR 5s.

THE NO. 1

BROWNIE.

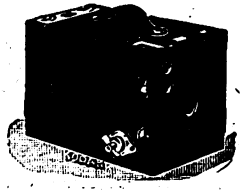


THE No. 1 BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2¼ by 2¼ inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 Brownie is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark-room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK.



THE No. 2 BROWNIE.

THE NO. 2

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2¼ inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE. PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of KODAK Ltd., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow.

Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, London, W.C

For Love of Doris.

The True and the False.

Lieutenant Walter Manfield read the note with contracted brows and crushed it within his strong grasp. It was a reminder that a certain debt ought to have been paid a week previously.

"I must get Doris in the mind to marry me very soon!" he reflected, giving the last touches to his toilet. "Perhaps it is as well that the note came just now, as it may stimulate me to make a great effort, if I get the chance this afternoon. I daresay many a marriage proposal has been made and accepted on a Spring afternoon in the Park! These fellows will not wait much longer, and I can't go on as I am. It's either marriage or foreign service!"

He revolved the position in his mind as he strode along. Doris was the only daughter of Sir Arthur Manfield, Bart., whose fortune she would inherit almost entirely, for the old man idolised her and was not likely to divert any considerable portion of his wealth into other channels. The title would go to Lieutenant Manfield, with a small annuity, no doubt, but he would succeed to a barren title, for he could certainly not keep up the dignity unless he obtained the Baronet's daughter as well as his Baronetcy. He had tried Doris before, but the result had not been favourable.

"Still, I do not intend to be discouraged. The stake is too important a one to be given up lightly!" he soliloquised, as his eyes sought his cousin's form among the frequenters of the Park. "Ha, there she is!"

He was soon by her side on a seat. It was sufficiently warm to permit of a rest on a chair without taking cold, and it was fresh enough to produce roses on the fair cheeks. Most men would have been bewitched by her beauty, but Walter Manfield had other thoughts for the moment.

"Doris," he said tenderly, after having watched the loungers for three or four minutes, "let us walk to a more secluded spot. I have something to say to you, and I cannot endure to have the eyes of other men riveted on your beautiful face while I am speaking. And I must speak!"

The girl's face coloured over so slightly at the compliment, but she made no attempt to move.

"I am a little tired, Walter," she replied, with a touch of weariness in her tone. "I have been walking about and need a rest. We can stay here. Do you feel cold?"

"Not at all!" he responded quickly, trying to speak brightly in spite of his annoyance.

He could scarcely help guessing that the weariness was caused, not by walking, but by the thought that she would have to listen to something which she had already heard and did not wish to hear again; that this was so, was proved by the vivacious manner in which she spoke immediately afterwards.

"I call this a splendid day and there are so many people in the Park! There is old Lord Wallington—do you see him, Walter? We had a splendid time at his place last year, father and I, you know. And I really believe I saw——"

An impatient movement on the part of her companion stopped her.

"What is it?" she asked curiously.

Walter Manfield was looking steadfastly past his cousin at a man of martial figure. He shifted his gaze as soon as Doris spoke, but she had noted the direction of his eyes and followed it. A soldierly-looking man, with bronzed face, stern, with black eyes that were intently fixed on her, and a firm chin. The face was one that would attract attention anywhere, and it pleased Doris, but the man started as he became conscious that the girl he was so intently watching was also watching him, and he turned aside hurriedly.

"Who is that?" she inquired, turning to her cousin.

There was no need to explain further; Walter knew that she had seen that handsome face.

"It is Lord Marston," he replied, with a shade of vexation in his voice. "Rather rude of him! I cannot say that I like him, although he is a brother officer."

"Oh, he has just returned from India and succeeded to the title, has he not?" inquired Doris further. "Won the V.C. in a fight with some tribesmen, I think."

"Rather a rough sort of fellow," observed Walter, with a hard expression on his countenance. "He has a cruel sort of look. It's a great honour to win the V.C., but I always think that the courage required for that kind of deed denotes that the man is of that nature which crushes. You could see that in his set features, couldn't you, Doris?"

"I did not see anything of the kind!" declared Doris positively. "The face is stern and strong, but I fancy that he is kindly by nature. Something in the eye appeared to indicate that. Don't you think it is time we had a walk now?"

"I thought so several minutes since," retorted Walter.

But his cousin paid no heed to the retort; she was already on her feet and walking with her usual grace in the direction taken by Lord Marston. Lieutenant Manfield, walking by her side, endeavoured to guide her into a quiet place, but she feigned not to notice his evident intention. Marston, however, had now disappeared, and, as the spot was almost deserted, Walter placed a restraining hand on her arm and spoke.

"Doris, why are you so cruel to me? You know that I love you, that my one object in life is to have you for my wife, to cherish and watch over you! Will you not give me the answer for which I am waiting? It would crown my life with happiness, and it would, I am sure, be the consummation of your father's desires! Doris, Doris, tell me you love me!"

A shiver ran through the beautiful form, but Doris made no reply. The passionate speech of her companion did not strike her as out of place in the Park, but she felt an indefinable sentiment of aversion for the lieutenant at that moment; she had never felt any special affection for him, but now, with the figure of Lord Marston before her mind's eye, she actually disliked him.

"Doris, tell me you love me and will be mine!" whispered Walter. He had difficulty in restraining the exultation within him; he was conquering at last, for when a girl says nothing in response to a passionate declaration, it must be because she loves him in return and her maidenly timidity prevents her from acknowledging it.

"I cannot tell you that, because it is not true!" came the reply at length, cold and crushing. "I have told you before that I do not wish to be troubled by offers of marriage; I intend to devote myself to my father. Why should I trouble about marriage? I have all I want, and can enjoy life to the full!"

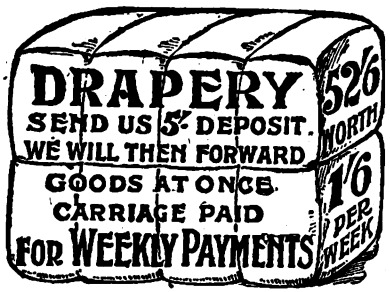
"I can wait!" urged Walter. "I will wait for years, if you will only set my heart at rest by saying that you will be mine!"

Digitized by Google

TO THOSE ABOUT TO MARRY!

THIS WILL INTEREST YOU.

52/6 worth of DRAPERY sent for 5/-



THE BUNDLE CONTAINS:

1 pair full-size Blankets, 1 pair best quality Twill Sheets, 1 large size Quilt (red and white or blue and white), 1 full-size coloured striped Bedtick, 1 Bolstertick, also 2 Pillows to match, 4 yards of Oxford or Grandrill Shirting, 3 yards good Flannel (white, scarlet or health), 6 yards good quality Flannelette, 2 Calico Pillow Cases, 1 Calico Bolster Case, 3 yards Towelling (with border), 1 large size White Tablecloth.

All you have to do is to send 5/- deposit, we then forward the goods, carriage paid, to nearest station. The price is only 52/6, and you but pay 3/- fortnightly until paid for. If, however, you wish to pay cash the price is 45/- Descriptive Catalogue of Furniture for Weekly Payments Post Free.

AGENTS WANTED.

MAXEY & CO., MEADOW ST., SHEFFIELD.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

For HEADACHE & NEURALGIA.

Cures in ten minutes—Kaputine is not a single dangerous crude drug, but is composed of several ingredients having the confidence and recommendation of many eminent medical men. The safe remedy. Ask for Kaputine and see that you get it.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

KAPUTINE. LTD.,
HUDDERSFIELD.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

"Worth a Guinea a Box."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Wind and Pains in Stomach,

Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver, and

Female Ailments.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

CONTAINING 56 AND 168 PILLS RESPECTIVELY.

BORAX Starch Glaze

The whole art

of successful ironing lies in the use of Borax Starch Glaze. There is no middle course. It is either Borax Starch Glaze in the starch—or flabby, dull, and dispiriting results. With it the finish of the best laundries can be obtained at home easily and every time.

Borax Starch Glaze compels good results even with inferior starch, but when best starch is used the finish will be immeasurably superior to any before obtained.

Facsimile Packet.

One penny packet from the nearest Grocer or Stores gives practical and convincing proof.

A postcard brings a Free Sample Packet.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

There are Several Talking Machines.
There is only ONE

GRAMOPHONE

Made in various styles, from £3 3s. to £15, by

THE GRAMOPHONE & TYPEWRITER LTD.,

21 CITY ROAD, E.C.

Do you like Grand Opera?

WE HAVE RECORDS SUNG BY

Madame CALVÉ.
„ SUZANNE ADAMS.
„ KIRKBY LUNN.
„ ROSA OLITZKA.
M. POL PLANÇON.

MM. RENAUD.
„ CARUSO.
„ SCOTTI.
„ VAN ROOY.
„ DAVID BISPHAM.

Do you go to Concerts?

WE HAVE RECORDS SUNG OR PLAYED BY

KUBELIK.
Miss MARIE TEMPEST.
„ ESTHER PALLISER.
„ PERCIVAL ALLEN.
„ ALICE GOMEZ.
Mr. BEN DAVIES.
„ WILLIAM GREEN.

Mr. JOSEPH O'MARA.
„ ANDREW BLACK.
„ MAURICE FARKOA.
Madame C. CHAMINADE (Piano Solo),
Mr. LANDON RONALD (Piano Solo).
„ W. H. SQUIRE ('Celio).
THE MEISTER GLEE SINGERS.

Do you admire Instrumental Music?

WE HAVE RECORDS MADE BY

H.M. GRENADIER GUARDS.
H.M. COLDSTREAM GUARDS.
ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND.
LONDON MUNICIPAL BAND.

LA GARDE RÉPUBLICAINE, Paris.
BANDA MUNICIPALE, Milan.
GARDE-KURASSIER REGIMENT, Berlin.

Does the Music Hall amuse you?

WE HAVE RECORDS SUNG BY DAN LENO.

GEORGE ROBEY.
HARRY LAUDER.
BURT SHEPARD.
BEN ALBERT.

JOHN W. MORTON.
CHAS. CAPPER (Whistling).
Miss ADA REEVE.
„ LIL HAWTHORNE.
„ BELLE DAVIES.

The World-renowned CAPELLA SISTINA have made special records for our Catalogues.

The GRAMOPHONE of to-day is a scientific Instrument which is not only an Entertainer but an Educator.

Digitized by Google

"I will say nothing!" declared Doris. "Now," she added lightly, "let us go homewards and talk of something else. I must leave you on the way, however, for I have a call to make."

"As you do not wish me to accompany you, I will bow acquiescence," said Walter deferentially, although inwardly boiling. "It is a pity that you are not going straight home, as I promised your father to call on him this afternoon. I will tell him where I left you."

Five minutes later they parted, and it was two hours later when Doris reached home, having made other calls. She stepped into the hall with her usual gaiety, her sweet face lighted up by a radiant smile, but a chill struck her heart as she saw the old housekeeper coming towards her with a sad, almost frightened expression on her good-natured face.

"What—what is it?" she faltered. "Oh, what has happened, Mrs. Norton? My father——?"

"Yes, Miss Doris! He has had another attack, but don't be so upset!" stammered the kindly woman, not knowing what to say in order to break the terrible news gently. "It was so unexpected, but Mr. Walter was here, fortunately. It——"

"Let me go to him," cried Doris, the tears welling to the soft blue eyes. "He is in his bedroom?"

"Yes, Miss Doris, but you mustn't go there! Oh, don't! Stop her somebody! Good gracious, it will kill her!"

But Doris had dragged her arm from Mrs. Norton's grasp and was at the door of her father's bedroom. She rushed in and reached the bedside, where she stopped abruptly as one struck by a heavy blow, pressed her hands to her forehead and fell senseless into the arms of her cousin.

Doris never knew how the next week passed; she had a hazy recollection of sorrowful preparations and it was not till the day after she had seen the last of her beloved and indulgent father that she awoke to the fact that she was alone in the world, save for her cousin, now Sir Walter Manfield. And she was awakened to the fact in the most unpleasant manner.

The only will left by the late Baronet was one made several years previously, whereby he left all his property to his brother, Walter's father. All the deceased man's private drawers were searched, but no later will could be discovered. The family solicitor could throw no light on the matter; the late Sir Arthur, they said, had his own views about will-making and would not let his solicitors draw it up or know anything about it, and they did not even know the contents of the one produced.

"Then what is my position?" asked Doris, looking at her cousin in perplexity. They were alone; she had come to the study at his request.

"It is precisely for the purpose of explaining matters quietly that I have asked you to come here, Doris," said the new Baronet coldly. "This will means that all the money comes to me, as the only child of my father. You are left absolutely penniless."

"Penniless!" gasped Doris. "It cannot be! My father loved me too well! There must be another will somewhere!"

"I fear not!" said Walter unmoved. He seemed rather to enjoy the girl's distress. "It has long been my opinion that your father was determined to combine title and fortune. That being so, he saw no necessity to alter the old will. The matter is simple enough; you must marry me! It was your father's dying wish! I was with him, you remember, and he told me, in gasps, to look in a certain place for the will—which proved to be this one—and then said something which I could not catch distinctly, but which I judged to signify that it was necessary to maintain the title worthily and that you must marry me or——"

"Or what?" queried Doris, more calmly.

"My dear Doris, you know that your father thought a great deal of the title, and men have been known to sacrifice their children rather than——"

"It's wrong!" burst forth Doris hotly. "I'll never believe that my dear father would leave me penniless or force me into a marriage against my wish! There must be something wrong somewhere, but I am only a girl and I don't understand these matters."

"Then you refuse to marry me?" asked Sir Walter, trying to curb his anger. "Very well!" he added, almost savagely as she indicated her reply by a movement of her graceful head and a flash from the eyes that were generally so soft and melting. "Then you must take the consequences! Of course, I can make you an allowance, but I consider that I shall be acting contrary to the spirit of your father's will and desires if I give you more than a pittance. When you change your mind about marrying me, I shall be pleased to welcome you here again."

Doris understood him. She drew herself up proudly, gave him a withering look of scorn, and went back to her own room—first to weep and then to make preparations for leaving the home from which she was being driven.

"He thinks that I shall be unable to earn my living, or that I shall tire of being a servant and shall be ready to marry him for the sake of the wealth and position, but he is mistaken. It will be hard, but the Manfields possess courage!"

Almost to the last, Doris hoped that another will would be found or that the solicitors would force Sir Walter to halve the money with her, but neither event happened. There was an idea that the will might be contested, but the statements of the dying man, as given by Sir Walter, formed such strong evidence in favour of the will that the idea of contesting it was abandoned. Doris went forth into a none-too-pitiful world to earn her living as a kind of companion-housekeeper to a widow with a mansion in Sussex.

TURN TO PAGE 815 AND READ A REMARKABLE LETTER.

Mrs. Blackstone had been a widow only six months, but there was a conviction among her friends that she would not remain a widow longer than she could help; she was already receiving and giving parties, ostensibly on the ground that her own feelings must be subordinate to the obligations that devolved on a lady of property and the widow of a county magnate, but that excuse was too thin for most people. She had engaged Doris Manfield on the death of her husband, and found her very useful. In order to hide her identity, Doris had assumed as a surname, half of her own name and was known as Miss Field.

It was not long after Mrs. Blackstone began her parties that she discovered that Miss Field received more attention than she did herself; she had been so engrossed in herself and her own attractions that she had failed to observe that Miss Field's simple loveliness outshone her own more pronounced attractiveness. At first she smiled disdainfully at the comments she overheard concerning Miss Field's beauty, but afterwards she realised that her companion house-keeper might become a dangerous rival and she skilfully contrived that Miss Field should not appear when there were guests.

It was rather a cut for Doris to find that she was debarred from appearing in the drawing-room, as she had been wont to do for nearly six months, but she consoled herself with the reflection that it left her more leisure. She had given Mrs. Blackstone every satisfaction, and that lady had gleaned some information concerning Society manners, which she imagined that Miss Field had picked up in her previous experience, but now she found fault in various ways and Doris' life became less endurable. Mrs. Blackstone only knew that her companion had "come down in the world" through the death of her father; she had not the faintest notion that she had been a Society belle.

"I don't mind!" said Doris to herself, drying her eyes, as she sat in the solitude of her own room, "it will prevent me from meeting someone—being recognised by someone who knew me in the old days!"

It was the afternoon of a glorious day in late summer and Doris was seated at the window of her room, enjoying a few minutes leisure from the duties of attending to the wants of a household of people. Her window overlooked a part of the grounds, but she was not surveying the scene through the window, she was deep in thought, and staring into space. Gradually there came over her the feeling that someone was looking at her; she turned her eyes slowly from one point to another, but could see no one. Her range extended farther back, and there, at some distance, a man was standing, his face in her direction. Rather vexed at his seeming rudeness, she was about to leave the window when the similarity of this incident with that in the Park occurred to her mind and she gave a scrutinising glance at the figure. It was familiar—it was the same, she was certain!

Digitized by Google

Her heart beat faster, and a strange, delicious feeling of mingled joy and sadness took possession of her—for the sentiments of pain and pleasure are closely allied. She dared not confess to herself that the stern, strong face and the kindly eyes had haunted her since, and—yes, she had seen them before her when she had refused her cousin's offer of marriage! She had mentally compared both men and it had strengthened her decision not to marry Walter!

With a start Doris awoke from her musing and hurriedly left the window to go below and resume her duties. Was that really Lord Marston? Was he coming here? She had been informed that another gentleman was expected and had been given to understand that he was a man of importance, but no name had been mentioned. She was almost trembling, but another thought took possession of her and she grew strong and defiant.

"Even if he did see me in the house, he would not think of me; I am no longer a lady of position! This world is cruel to us women; why should not my father's title have come to me?"

She soon found that Lord Marston was indeed the guest expected by Mrs. Blackstone, whose brother was now staying with her. On the morrow Doris had another surprise; still another guest was to arrive in the afternoon, and none other than Sir Walter Manfield!

"Thank goodness!" murmured the girl. "I shall have a chance of keeping out of the way! And I didn't accept his offer of an allowance!"

The working under-housekeeper did most of the actual work, but Doris had to do the planning necessary in a large house, so she had not much time for reflection. Her own constitutional had to be taken in the early morning, when scarcely anyone was astir, and she thoroughly enjoyed the solitary walk. It was the second morning after Lord Marston's arrival that she was startled during her stroll through the garden to hear a voice exclaim: "At last!" and to find herself face to face with the man who had watched her from afar on two occasions.

"I have been trying to find you for six months!" he declared, without pretence at introduction. "I discovered that you were the daughter of Sir Arthur Manfield, but that was not till you had disappeared. Then I saw you at the window two days ago, but I have not seen you among the guests, although your cousin is here, but I would not ask for you. At last I have found you, Miss Manfield!"

He took her two hands in his and gazed ardently with his kindly, true eyes into hers. Both were unconscious of the strangeness of this meeting; it appeared to be the natural outcome of circumstances. Doris felt his gaze sink straight to her heart and her eyes dropped before it. All the world was forgotten in that delightful moment.

"Miss Manfield," he said tenderly, "have you no word for me?"

Then it all came back to her.

"I am not Miss Manfield here," she cried, trying to free herself, "I am only Miss Field one of the members of the domestic staff and not a guest, and my cousin does not know that I am here!"

"I do not understand," he replied in surprise. "No, no. I will not let you go till I know more! Tell me!"

He tightened his grasp and she ceased to struggle. It was pleasant to be held captive thus by a strong hand! In a few words she told him what had happened.

"But you must let me go!" she declared, making another effort to get free. "What would they think if they saw you here and what would my position be worth? I have my living to earn and I am nothing to you!"

"That is not true!" he asserted boldly. "You are everything to me! I have sought you for months and I would have done so for years. I love you, and I wish to take you from this place and give you a position worthy of you. Doris—I may call you Doris, may I not? You became dear to me as soon as I saw you; it is not a fleeting love, for it has grown stronger and stronger. I love you and you will be mine? Say 'yes,' Doris?"

"Oh, let me go!" she pleaded, her beautiful face suffused with blushes. "I must go or someone will see——"

A slight sound near them caused him to relax his hold and glance round. She took advantage of the loosening of his grasp to slip away and run into the house.

Lord Marston saw nobody, but the concluding portion of the interview had been witnessed by Sir Walter Manfield, whose surprise may be imagined. He quickly jumped to the conclusion that his cousin was engaged in the service of Mrs. Blackstone.

"She shall not have Lord Marston!" he vowed, referring to his cousin. "She won't marry me, so I'll see if I can force her into it! Now, how can I get her away from here quickly? H'm! I know! It strikes me that our worthy hostess is rather gone on Marston. Exactly!"

The result of his further meditations were revealed in an interview between Mrs. Blackstone and Miss Field later in the day.

"Miss Field," cried the lady of the house, as Doris entered in obedience to a peremptory summons. "I am amazed at what has just come to my ears! I should never have supposed that you would be seen flirting with one of my guests at an early hour! I need ask for no explanation; I will give you a month's salary in lieu of notice and I will ask you to leave this house at once!"

"Then somebody did see us!" thought poor Doris. Aloud she replied: "I was not flirting! I met Lord Marston by accident. He——"

She interrupted herself. Had she any right to say that he had sought her out? Was not that for him to say? Mrs. Blackstone laughed at the break.

"I am glad that you have the grace to feel ashamed at hinting that he persecuted you with his attentions, Miss Field!" she sneered. "And the fact that you mentioned a name, which I did not, shows that my information is correct! Silly girl! Do you suppose that he cares for your face—he, a man of the world! He is amusing himself with you! I could tell you something that would dispel that illusion!"

There was a significance in the last remark that was not lost on Doris, who had suspected that widow's weeds were not to the liking of Mrs. Blackstone. Doris flushed at the thought that Marston had been playing with her, but her pride enabled her to hold herself upright and confront Mrs. Blackstone defiantly.

"If I am not wanted, I can go!" she said proudly. "But neither you nor anyone else shall say that I was flirting!"

"Hoity-toity!" sneered Mrs. Blackstone again. She felt that she was coming out of the encounter second best. "Go and pack, and I will have the dogcart ready to take you to the station and a cheque signed."

Doris left her tormentor with a heart like lead. Marston had been playing with her! It was too cruel! Who had seen them? There was some consolation, however; he would not be able to continue his amusement and she would escape a meeting with her cousin.

When Sir Walter Manfield learnt that Miss Field was gone,

(Concluded on page 831.)

TURN TO PAGE 815 AND READ A REMARKABLE LETTER.

Digitized by Google

HE'S GIVING AWAY A FORTUNE.

A BOOK FOR EVERY HOME.

A Masterpiece of Philanthropy by Hon. James R. Kenney, Ex-Mayor of Reading, Pennsylvania.

Hon. James R. Kenney, ex-Mayor, is giving away a fortune in books. He is putting them right into the homes of the people absolutely without cost or trouble to them, save the small trouble of writing. He has had prepared and printed the most remarkable work on personal magnetism and hypnotism and how to succeed in life that has ever been written. It is brimful of intensely interesting and practical information. It is just what the young man needs who is starting in life to give him vim, push and energy; to make him magnetic, to enable him to overcome obstacles and surmount every difficulty to success. It is just what the middle-aged man needs to enable him to win and hold friends, to become a leader in his community, to influence and sway the minds of his business associates and make his mark in life. It is just what every father and mother needs to eradicate bad tempers and evil inclinations in children, to strengthen their moral faculties, banish diseases and make them grow to be men and women such as God intended they should be.

Hon. James R. KENNEY.
The man who is giving away a fortune in books.

It is just what every minister of the Gospel needs to help him hold the wavering steadfast in their faith, to help him turn the minds of the wicked toward morality, honesty and right-doing. It is just what every lawyer needs to help him influence juries, control witnesses and to deliver his argument in that forceful, convincing manner which carries conviction with every word. It is just what you need, no matter who you are or what you do, to enable you to get out of life the success, pleasure and happiness which the Creator intended should be yours. If you are not successful, if you are not making money, it is because you do not know that secret power that rules the thoughts and minds of men. If you are already successful, you can become more successful if you will but master the hidden forces around you. Learn to use the secret magnetic power with which nature has endowed you.

Ex-Mayor Kenney's book proves every one is born with this mighty subtle power; that anyone can easily develop it at home without the knowledge of his intimate friends or associates, and influence people secretly to carry out his thoughts and ideas. It certainly is a wonderful force, capable of infinite good.

"Hypnotism truly reveals the secret of life and the mysteries of nature," writes J. H. Schneller, 1412 Avon Street, La Crosse, Wis., "My own father could not have convinced me of its wonderful power if I had not actually tested it for myself. I consider a knowledge of it invaluable to those who wish to get the most out of life; to those who wish to achieve success and live up to the full measure of their possibilities."

J. R. Gaskins, Newport News, Va., writes: "I must admit that I doubted very much that hypnotism could be practically taught. In four days after receiving your work, however, you demonstrated to my entire satisfaction that I was never further from the truth in my life. I have met with wonderful success. Your free book is the finest thing of the kind I have ever seen."

A. C. Hyers, of Ithaca, N.Y., writes: "If any fault could be found with your instruction it would be that you give too much, thereby giving too many people the opportunity to acquire great secrets that have been guarded and known only by a very few for centuries—secrets that confer upon the possessors a wonderful power over their less informed friends."

Rev. John Lewelling, of Brownville, Neb., writes: "You are engaged in a glorious work. Hypnotism sets us free from poisonous drugs. I have just cured a case of throat and lung trouble, which the doctors had pronounced incurable. I am applying your teachings every day. I congratulate you upon your work for suffering humanity."

Ex-Mayor Kenney ordered printed three months ago 10,000 copies of his new book for free distribution. The first copies are just now coming off the press. They are elegantly illustrated with the finest engravings, and will prove a valuable addition to any library. If you would know all about hypnotism, the wonder science of the age, personal magnetism, thought force, magnetic healing and kindred sciences, write for a free copy of this remarkable book at once. It will be sent to your address postage prepaid. You will be delighted, mystified and benefited more than words can tell. Nothing like it has ever before been printed. Ex-Mayor Kenney is giving them away for the benefit of the public. He believes by so doing he is accomplishing more good than by donating his money to hospitals, public libraries, or anything of this nature. He gives you a book worth more to a young man than a college education. He gives it to you for your own personal use, to keep in your library or to carry with you. On account of the great expense in preparing and printing this book only those are requested to write who are especially interested in bettering themselves in life and who actually wish to make practical use of the information given in the book.

If you want a free copy, write at once to C. C. Gilliland, secretary to Ex-Mayor Kenney, office WL7, 420 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

Mr Geo. R. Sims' "TATCHO"

GETS THE HAIR BACK. PUTS THE HAIR RIGHT. KEEPS THE HAIR RIGHT.

WHO SAY SO.

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.—
"Trobridge, Crediton.
"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair."

The Hon. Mrs. GORDON writes—
"3 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh.
"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit from 'Tatcho.'"

LADY SYKES—
"Mayfair, W.
"'Tatcho' has entirely renovated my hair."

Major-General KEATE—
"High Croft, Winchester.
"I find 'Tatcho' excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time."

PRINCESS EUGÉNIE CRISTOFOROS PALÆOLOGUE—
"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—
"Zetland House, Maidenhead.
"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is."

Colonel PERRY—
"Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin.
"'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have."

"TATCHO" is a delightful Preparation, the colour of whisky, free from all smell, neither greasy nor sticky.
"TATCHO" will entirely banish that dead and dingy look of the hair.
"TATCHO" will ward off the approach of greyness.
"TATCHO" is invaluable to those suffering from actual loss of hair and who need a powerful stimulant to force a fresh growth.
"TATCHO" is not a dye, and contains no harmful ingredient.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1s., 2s. 9d., and 5s.
Australian Depot, 76 Pitt Street, Sydney, N.S.W.

4/6 Full Size Trial Bottle 1/10 carriage paid.

Call or write, "Tatcho" Laboratories, 81 Great Queen Street, Holborn, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

he nearly uttered an impolite expression ; he had made up his mind to keep his eye on his cousin, but she had flown. He gave instructions to a firm of private detectives to seek her ; the cost of keeping her under supervision would be nothing to him out of a rent roll of £50,000 a year, and he was now bent on making her his wife.

Lord Marston was also surprised and felt unable to explain why she had disappeared without giving him notice. He had an uneasy suspicion that his indiscretion had been at the bottom of it, but to have asked his hostess would not have mended matters. He also resolved to seek her, and at the same time he entered upon another quest.

Doris contrived to elude the efforts of those who were looking for her ; with the aid of an old friend she secured an appointment in an office, and for nearly nine months, till summer was coming again, she went to and fro to work, lodging in a home provided by a friendly society for the help of young women in business. Here she learnt much about the life of the lower middle class, and she registered a vow that if she ever came into her own again, she would use the wealth for less selfish purposes than she would otherwise have done.

"But it will never come!" she sighed. "It is fifteen months since my dear father died and nothing has come to light. Still, I cannot believe that he meant it to be so!"

As she left the office one evening, a hand was placed on her shoulder ; she turned and saw Lord Marston. She shrank from him ; he had amused himself with her and she resented it.

"I do not wish to see you!" she cried, her breath coming in gasps.

He paled and his voice shook as he said ;

"Why? If I did you harm, it was my great love that led me unwittingly to do so! Come away with me and let us talk! We shall excite attention here!"

They walked away together, and he asked her what had happened.

"You were pretending love for me and yet you were going to marry Mrs. Blackstone—have married her, I suppose, by now!" she said vehemently. "I am a poor girl now, and may be trifled with!"

"Who said that? I have a right to know!" His voice was hoarse.

"She said—she hinted at it!" responded Doris slowly. She wondered if she had been deceived.

"It was a falsehood!" he maintained. "I perceived, after a day or two, that she was trying to lure me into marriage with her, and I left her mansion on a pretext. It was you, and only you, I wanted and still want! Doris, I have worked for you all these nine months. I have known of your whereabouts only a few days, for you have cleverly evaded us. But now I can bring you good news. The will has been found! I have it here!"

He had to place his arm round her quickly, for she swayed as if about to fall. She quickly recovered and asked him pleadingly not to jest.

"It is no jest!" he returned. "Let us go to the house which should be yours and I will explain. You can claim a right to it now."

He hailed a cab and they went to the old house. How dear it was to her!

"Where is Sir Walter?" she inquired.

"He is leaving the country!" said Lord Marston gravely. "Mrs. Norton, make your mistress comfortable and then stay here while I tell the story."

The old housekeeper was crying all the time with joy, as she took Doris' hat and gloves and seated her in a comfortable chair. Doris listened in amazement to Lord Marston's story.

"I set detectives to work to get at the truth of that will question, which you told me about that—er—that morning. I suspected some foul play on the part of your cousin. It took a long time to trap him, but it came at last. Mrs. Norton helped, and I am bound to admit that my men acted unlawfully in searching the house several times without a warrant and in the absence of the master. Well, we found the will, found it among a lot of old papers which Sir Walter had gathered together to destroy.

"When your father was dying, he told Walter where his lost will was, for he kept it in an old writing desk where it might have remained unseen for years, in a secret drawer. He was somewhat eccentric, was your father, I fear! Sir Walter found the will and saw it left everything to you. He was tempted ; he wanted the money and you, but especially the money. You would not marry him, so he conceived the idea of destroying the will, believing that under letters of administration the property would be divided between you. He took the will away and destroyed it, as he thought ; that is, he burnt the large envelope. But he forgot that he had taken the will out of the envelope. That was not wonderful, for the envelope was very stiff and the will was written on a single sheet of foolscap, and on one side of the paper only. He had taken some other papers out of the envelope containing the will, so, when the will was left out of the envelope, it got among those papers and your cousin didn't notice it.

"He crowded those papers into a drawer in the room usually reserved for him here, and that drawer was not searched, of course, in the hunt for the will—only your father's tables and belongings were searched. Afterwards, those papers and others were piled up ready to be burnt, and there the will was found. I took it upon myself to confront your cousin with the will, and I forced him to confess. He has left the country."

"How wicked of him!" cried Doris. "Yet I should not feel happy if I allowed him to remain without any means at all. I will see that he has an allowance."

"It is very good of you to be so generous to one who has done you a great wrong," said Lord Marston. "And those who have tried to help you?"

The tenderness of his manner induced Mrs. Norton to think that it was time she attended to her ordinary duties. Left alone with Doris, Lord Marston took her hand and knelt by her side, looking up into the eyes that had dropped before his glance.

"It was rather cruel to suspect me of playing with you and being in love with Mrs. Blackstone!" said he, with feigned reproachfulness. "Do you think I could be so deceitful?"

"No!" cried Doris penitently. "But I was so miserable!"

"Our marriage will be mentioned in the papers," said Lord Marston, half an hour later, "and, as Mrs. Blackstone will not know that Doris Manfield is an old acquaintance, we will send her a wedding card with your name like this : DORIS (MAN)FIELD. I should like to see her face when she reads that!"

G. L. Parkyn.

The NEW STANDARD book
On CONJURING is

The Modern Conjurer

By C. LANG NEIL.

With an introduction by . .

CHARLES BERTRAM.

Explaining and Illustrating Tricks by

J. N. Maskelyne — Frank Kennard
Trewey — Paul Valadon
Charles Bertram — H. de Manche
T. Nelson Downs — L. Graham Lewis
Mlle. Patrice — Ellis Stanyon

and others.

With over 500 Illustrations from Photographs of Actual Tricks.

Demy 8vo, cloth. Price 6s.

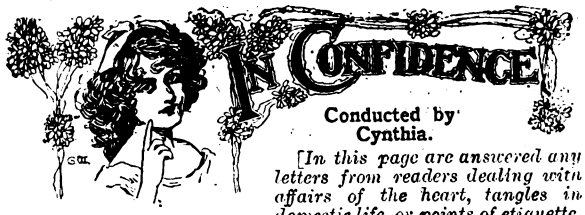
At all booksellers, and Hamley Bros. Limited, 231 High Holborn and 35 New Oxford Street, or of the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



Conducted by Cynthia.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must in future be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

Christmas—The Lover's Season.

Among other pleasant things, Christmas is largely the time of lovers. Those who have fallen out find the festive season the best of all peacemakers, and a little present or even cards may once more bring young people together. Then the faint-hearted lover, too timid to say the right thing at ordinary times, often takes courage at Christmas and pops the halting question, which the girl, amidst the prevailing air of happiness, will feel she can no longer delay to answer in the affirmative. Hard-hearted fathers may by led by Christmas into taking kinder views of their children's love affairs, and even the stern mother may unbend where she would otherwise remain firm.

The Time for a Proposal.

So this is the time for both myself and my readers, is it not? All the questions I have before me to-day seem as though I need only mention "Christmas," and they will solve themselves. For instance, "Faint Heart" has been paying attention to Jessie for six months, and has been simply longing to propose. But every time he has braced himself up for the ordeal, the occasion has not been fitting. Either the girl has been worried or pre-occupied, or not in serious mood, so poor "Faint Heart" has been compelled to stave off his advances. He asks me if I can suggest the best opportunity for his resuming his quest.

* * * *

I will answer "Christmas." Choose one evening during the holiday season, when you are alone in a room where the light is lowered, and the mistletoe suggestively hanging near your heads, and the holly and other decorations are all around you; start a romantic conversation, and when you have got her attention, say the right word. With so difficult a girl, certainly some such measures are necessary for you, "Faint Heart," to get a hearing to your question.

The Time to Try Again.

Then there is the man who is doubtful as to whether a certain girl likes him, or even takes an interest in him. This is "A. C. G." (Bristol). Some eighteen months ago he used to see a great deal of her at friends' houses, and they got interested in each other. He did not go to the extent of saying he loved her, because her attitude was that of a friend only. Yet he always felt that he could love her, if only she gave some little hint that it was likely to be returned. Now they are very likely to meet again, as "A. C. G." has been invited for the first time for a year to the house of a mutual friend. How do I advise him to proceed?

* * * *

"A. C. G." has a splendid opportunity. Their long parting must have caused her some thought over the matter. She has either decided that she does or does not like him in a deeper sense than that of mere acquaintanceship. When they meet, she will show it by her appearance on seeing him. If she looks very pleased, then let "A. C. G." go to work energetically, for there is something in it. If her reception is merely cold, then he should proceed warily There is no surer guide to another's feelings towards oneself than the first greeting after a long separation.

And for a Reconciliation.

Then there is "Sophie," who still loves George, but owing to an absurd misunderstanding about six weeks ago they have not seen each other. From rumours she has heard, he is terribly unhappy about the affair, but too proud to start trying to make it up. He will not call on her, and when he meets her in the street he only bows and passes on. "Sophie" has found out since this quarrel that he is the only man she could ever love, yet she, too, does not think she ought to start the reconciliation task.

* * * *

Again I reply "Christmas." If you have not already done so, "Sophie," send him a present, with a card containing some nice little text or motto. If that does not bring him back I shall be very much surprised. I have known many a time when a Christmas card has put such little quarrels right, and don't see why it should not in your case.

An Awkward Plight.

"R. E." tells me a perplexing tale. Some time ago he met a widow of forty, who took rather a fancy to him. Thinking the affair rather a good joke, he cultivated her society. One evening, after they had been to a theatre, and had had a very good supper, he proposed to her, not at the time quite knowing what he was saying. He thought she would take it all as a joke. But next time they met, while he had almost forgotten the affair, she reminded him of his proposal, and said she had already made certain plans in preparation. What can "R. E." do? He does not really love the woman at all, and though she has some money he could not live on her means, and thinks such a marriage would be bad for his career.

* * * *

You have put your foot into it, "R. E." I think you had better tell the lady that you did not know what you were saying when you made that proposal. Ask her to release you from an engagement, pointing out that you could not enter into it under the circumstances in which you are. Possibly she may be well-disposed, and will release you. If, however, she threatens to take any legal steps, I should consult a solicitor. I do not think the law is sufficiently favourable to widow ladies who have drawn young men into their clutches, to be very encouraging to her to proceed against you for breach of promise. She is not in quite the same position as the young girl who has been deceived.

We Cannot Give Introductions.

I sympathise with you, "Virginia Creeper," but I am afraid I must say what Madge Morris said. With every wish in the world, I cannot undertake to introduce clients to each other. This is, you see, only a little paper, and not a Love Agency, and if I were to start introducing people to each other, how should I know where to draw the line? If I agreed in in one case, I could scarcely refuse in another, so I fear all I can do is just to express the hope that one so evidently clever and accomplished as yourself may soon meet a man worthy of your affections without having to employ an agent.

* * * *

As to an English girl wanting to go to Africa, on the off chance of finding a desirable husband, I think the idea is foolish. If a girl cannot find the right man at home, I doubt if she will find him there. From what girl friends out there tell me in letters, the men to be met with in this colony are not at all the sort likely to appeal to a pure-minded English girl. The hard rough work of mines may make money for men, but it does not often make for much else. Besides, "Virginia Creeper" would do well to remember that the proportion of Britons born against those of foreign origin is by no means large.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

CADBURY'S Cocoa

"A Perfect Food."

It has stood the TEST OF TIME.

"FIRST and FOREMOST."

'Cadbury's'

Is COCOA and the BEST COCOA only.

Points from the Press.

"The perfect purity of CADBURY'S Cocoa—a strong point with the makers—constitutes its firm hold upon the public confidence, and the secret of its universal popularity."—Health.

Strength, Purity, Nourishment.

ZEBRA

GRATE POLISH

In Packets or Tins.

A DAILY LUXURY.

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Creamy, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a wholesome, delicious article of diet for daily use. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

APPLES

are pronounced by doctors to be the most wholesome and nutri ious of fruits. When stewed, the ONE THING NEEDED to make a delicious and an ideal food is a dish of

BIRD'S CUSTARD.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

Short Stories.

No. 730.] Week ending December 27, 1902. [Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

(A Pathetic Incident from our Complete Story, "For Her Sake." See inside.)

KSR · KSR · KSR · KSR · KSR · KSR · KSR · KSR · KSR · KSR ·

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

For HEADACHE & NEURALGIA.

The manufacture of Kaputine is under the personal supervision of a board of Certified Chemists, and is guaranteed to contain none but the finest ingredients obtainable. The safe remedy cures in ten minutes.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-.

Samples 1d. each.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Watches

A SOUND ... INVESTMENT.

APPROVAL BEFORE PURCHASE TERMS ....

Lady's Sterling Silver Watch and Albert in Case for ... 30/-

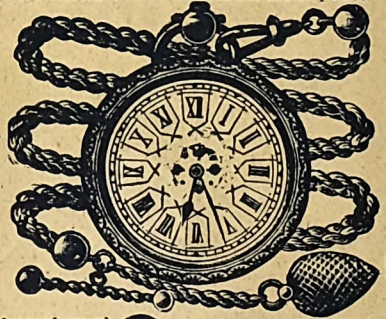
METHOD: Send only 5/- with order, the Watch and Albert will then be forwarded; if satisfied, send 5/- per month until the balance is paid. (Cash Purchasers receive HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT).

The Full Amount of the deposit will be refunded if you are not satisfied.

Description. Sterling Silver Watch with horizontal movement, fitted with all Modern Improvements, and Fully Jewelled; Handsomely Finished Opal Dial, Decorated and Embellished in High-class Style; Artistically Designed Sterling Silver Cases. Warranted 5 Years.

Very Neat Two-row Sterling Silver Albert, with Bar and Drop Piece.

Send for our No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, &c., &c. Post Free.



GOOD AGENTS WANTED.

Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division Street, Sheffield.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints, etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

HAND-ORGANS from 20s

Made in 3 sizes, ebony and gold case. With 6 metal tunes. Full organ tone. Plays songs, hymns, dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, can be paid 4s. monthly. Write for terms, price list and tunes. ATLAS CO., 184a High St., Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Rd.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn. PHONOGRAPHS, 10/6 MUSICAL ALBUMS, 10/6.

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

THE HYPNOTIC EYE

You have it, everyone has it, for everyone is born a hypnotist. Would you like to develop your hypnotic powers and wield an influence over others? Would you like to sway the minds of men, make friends and achieve success? You can develop this power in the privacy of your room.

COSTS YOU NOTHING

It will cost you nothing to send for our free book and learn how to do it. Anybody can learn. The acquisition of this power brings happiness and health; develops the will; gratifies ambition; gives one the key to personal and social success and suggests many opportunities to make money. By our new system you can learn THE PHILOSOPHY OF PERSONAL INFLUENCE in a few days at your home, and not only achieve success yourself, but you can influence the minds, health and actions of others. We guarantee it.

LEARN AT HOME FREE

If at all interested, send for our free book, "The Philosophy of Personal Influence." It will reveal to you the secrets of success and will point out the causes of failure. Through the generosity of X. La Motte Sage, A.M., LL.D., Ph.D., its author, we are permitted to distribute 10,000 copies absolutely free of all cost. A postal card will bring it. Address: The New York Institute of Science Dept. VA31, Rochester, N.Y., U.S.A.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

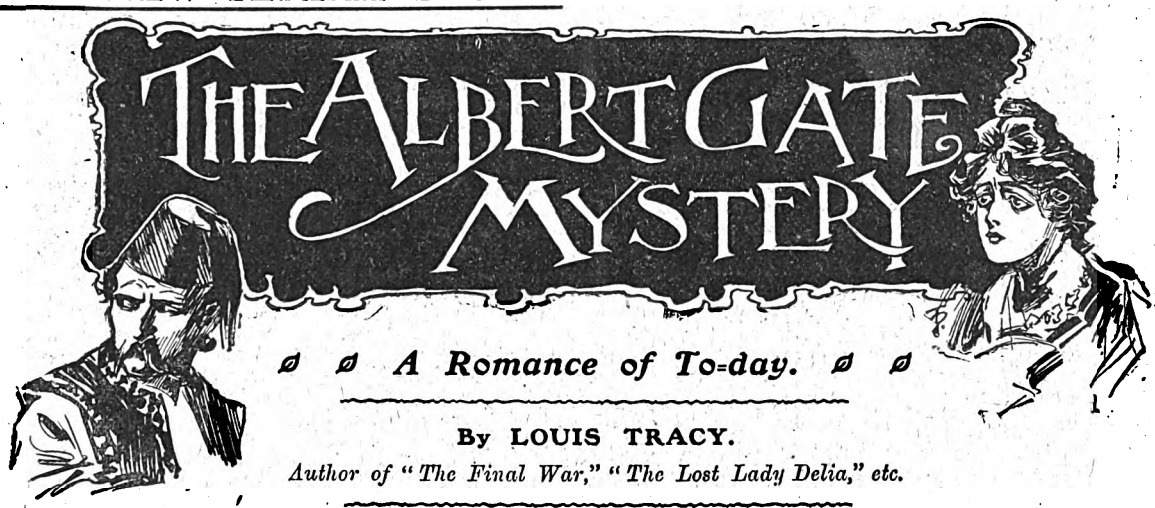
The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

No. 730. For the Week Ending December 27th, 1902. One Penny.

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.



By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

MYSTERIOUS OCCURRENCE IN THE WEST END.

An affair of some magnitude—perhaps a remarkable crime—has taken place in an Albert Gate Mansion.

Owing to the reticence of the authorities, it is at present impossible to arrive at a definite conclusion as to the nature or extent of the incident, but it is quite certain that public interest will be much excited when details are forthcoming. All sorts of rumours attain credence in the locality, the murder of several prominent persons being not the least persistent of these. Without, however, giving currency to idle speculation, several authentic statements may be grouped into a connected form.

Four weeks ago a party of Turkish gentlemen of high rank in Constantinople, arrived in London and took up their abode in the house in question, after some structural alterations pointing at great security within and without, had been planned and executed.

Attending these Turkish gentlemen, or officials, was a numerous suite of Moslem guards and servants, whilst, immediately following their arrival, came from Amsterdam, some dozen noted experts in the diamond-cutting industry. These were lodged in a neighbouring private hotel, where they were extremely uncommunicative as to their business in London. They were employed during the day at the Albert Gate house. The presence in the mansion, both day and night, of a strong force of Metropolitan police, tended to excite local curiosity to an intense degree, but no clear conception of the business of the occupants was allowed to reach the public.

Whatever it was that took place, the full particulars were not only well-known to the authorities—the presence of the police hints even at Governmental sanction—but matters proceeded on normal lines until yesterday morning.

Then it became clear that a remarkable development must have occurred during the preceding night, as the whole of the Dutch workmen and the Turkish attendants were taken off in cabs by the police, not to Morton Street Police Station, but to Scotland Yard, this in itself being a most unusual course to adopt. They are unquestionably detained in custody, but they have not yet been charged before a magistrate.

The police, later in the day, carried off some of these men's personal belongings, from both hotel and mansion.

A sinister aspect was given to the foregoing mysterious proceedings by the presence at Albert Gate, early in the day, of two police surgeons, who were followed, about twelve o'clock, by Dr. Tennyson Coke, the greatest living authority on toxicology.

Dr. Coke and the other medical gentlemen subsequently refused to impart the slightest information as to the reasons that led the police to seek their services, and the Scotland Yard authorities are adamant in the matter.

The representative of a news agency was threatened with arrest for trespass when he endeavoured to gain admission to the Albert Gate house, and it is quite evident that the police are determined to prevent the facts from leaking out at present—if they can by any means accomplish their wishes.

Such is the statement which Mr. Brett, barrister and detective, reads in the morning paper.

He has hardly finished its perusal when the Earl of Fairholme is announced.

He states that he has called regarding the Albert Gate crime. He is engaged, as he explains, to Miss Talbot, the niece of the late Admiral Talbot, at present living with her uncle, General Sir Hubert Fitz-James.

The Sultan, he continues, recently sent over to England some priceless diamonds in the charge of a special envoy. The diamonds being of political importance, the British Foreign Office places the envoy under the care of Mr. Jack Talbot, Miss Talbot's brother. The envoy is lodged in the Albert Gate Mansion, under police surveillance.

Digitized by Google

One morning the chief of the Turkish mission, his two secretaries, and a confidential servant are found murdered, the diamonds stolen and Mr. Jack Talbot vanished, though the police are on the premises at the time.

The Earl wants Brett to find Jack Talbot.

In conjunction with the Scotland Yard officials Brett commences operations. A search is first made of the Albert Gate Mansion, Mr. Winter the detective, and two inspectors assisting.

Brett discovers that the stones were conveyed out of the house by means of a hole made in the wire screen of one of the windows.

After making further inquiries he departs with Mr. Winter. They separate at the Carlton Hotel, where the supposed assassins resided, Mr. Winter promising to call at Brett's chambers after the inquest on the murdered men has been concluded.

A Startling Clue.

Once left to himself, Brett did not enter the hotel. Indeed, he hardly glanced at that palatial structure, having evidently dismissed it from his mind as being in no way connected with the tragedy he was investigating. He made it an invariable rule, in conducting inquiries of this nature, to adopt the French method of "reconstituting" the incidents of a crime, so far as such a course was possible, without the presence of the persons concerned. He reasoned that a very plausible explanation of the unexpected appearance of the three strangers in the Albert Gate mansion on Monday night had been given to Jack Talbot. This young gentleman, it might be taken for granted, had not been selected by the Foreign Office to carry to a successful issue such a delicate matter as that intrusted to him, without some good grounds for the faith in his qualities exhibited by his superiors.

Brett thought he could understand the brother's character from the favourable analysis of his sister, and it was quite reasonable, therefore, to believe that Talbot was a man not likely to be easily duped. The principals in this crime were evidently well aware of the trust reposed in the Assistant Under-Secretary, and they again would not underrate his intelligence. Hence, there was a good cause for Talbot to accept the explanations, whatever they were, given to him during the conclave in the dining-room; the effect of which, in Inspector Sharpe's words, had been to "puzzle" the young Englishman. Further, there must have been a very potent inducement held out, before Talbot would consent to drive off with a stranger at such a late hour, and when the cab was dismissed at the Carlton, the excuse given would certainly be quite feasible.

"It must surely be this," communed Brett. "The man explained that he was a stranger in London; that he lived quite close to the Carlton Hotel; and that he found it convenient not only for the purpose of giving directions that would be understood, but also for paying fares, to direct the drivers of hired vehicles to go there and not to his own exact address, which he had found, by experience, many of them did not recognise, whilst his knowledge of the language was not ample enough to enable him to describe the locality more precisely. It follows, then, in unerring sequence, that Talbot was conveyed to some place within a very short distance of the spot where I now stand."

He looked along Pall Mall, up the Haymarket, and through Cockspur Street, and he noted with some degree of curiosity that there were very few residential buildings in the neighbourhood. Clubs, theatres, big commercial establishments and insurance offices occupied the bulk of all the available space. It was a part of his theory that none of the other great hotels in this district could harbour the criminals, otherwise there would have been no excuse to stop the hansom outside the Carlton.

Brett did not take long to make up his mind once he had decided upon a definite course. He stood at the corner barely three minutes, and then walked off through Pall Mall and down the steps near the Duke of York's Column into the Horse Guards' Parade, intending to walk quietly to his Victoria Street flat. A call at the Foreign Office procured him an official authorisation from the Under-Secretary to inquire into the circumstances of Talbot's disappearance and a promise that the Home Office should be communicated with. He desired quietly to review the whole of the circumstances attending this strange mystery of modern life, and the result of his reflections quickly became apparent when he reached his residence, for, in the first instance, he dispatched a telegram, and then made several notes in his private diary.

The telegram, in due course, produced an elderly, pensioned police-inspector, a quiet, reserved man, whom the barrister had often employed on inquiries like that which he now confided to him. He explained, briefly, the circumstances attending Mr. Talbot's disappearance, and added:

"I want you to find out the names, and, if possible, the business—together with any other information that you may happen to come across—of every person who lives within a distance, roughly speaking, of two hundred yards from the Carlton Hotel. The Post Office Directory and your own observation will narrow down the inquiry considerably. It is the unrecorded balance of inhabitants with whom I am particularly anxious to become more definitely acquainted." The man saluted and withdrew.

Brett imagined that he would now be left in undisputed enjoyment of a few hours' rest before the Earl of Fairholme kept the appointment fixed for seven o'clock. But in this he was mistaken.

Smith brought in some tea, which was refreshing after his walk, for the engrossing nature of the morning's occupation had caused him to forget his lunch. A cigar and evening paper next claimed his attention, but he had barely settled down to the perusal of a garbled account, given in the news sheet, of events at Albert Gate, when his man again entered, announcing in mysterious tones the presence of Mr. Winter. Smith's attitude towards the myrmidons of Scotland Yard, who occasionally visited the barrister on business, was peculiar. He regarded them with suspicion, tempered by wholesome awe, and he now made known the arrival of the detective in such a manner as caused his master to laugh at him.

"Show him in, Smith," he said cheerily, "he has not come to arrest me this time."

Winter entered, and a glance at that gentleman's face quickly brought Brett to his feet.

"What is the matter?" he cried, when the door had closed behind the servant. "You have evidently received important news."

"I should think I have," replied the detective, dropping into a seat. "I was just writing a report in the Yard when I was sent for by the Chief, and you could have knocked me down with a feather when I heard the reason. I suppose I am acting rightly in coming at once to tell you, although in my flurry at the time I quite forgot to ask the Chief's permission, but as you are mixed up in the case at the request of the Foreign Office, I thought you ought to learn what had happened."

"Well, what is it?" cried Brett, impatient at the other's careful provisos.

"Simply this," said the detective. "Mr. Jack Talbot bolted from London on Tuesday in company with a lady. They crossed over from Dover to Calais by the midday boat and went direct to Paris. Mr. Talbot calmly booked rooms for himself and the girl in the Grand Hotel, had the nerve to write 'Mr. and Mrs. Talbot, 118 Ulster Gardens, London, W.' in the register, and both of them forthwith disappeared. But we will soon lay hands upon the gentleman, no fear. I have somehow suspected, Mr. Brett, that your notion of a political crime was all poppy-cock. It is a good, big, brazen-faced steal."

Digitized by Google

The Letter.

"Is it?" said Brett, while his face glistened with excitement at the intelligence so suddenly conveyed to him. "Would you mind explaining to me how this precious information has reached you?"

"There is no use, sir, in fighting against facts," said the detective, with dogged insistence. "This time you have been dead wrong. Mr. Talbot was recognised at Calais by a Foreign Office messenger who was returning from France. Seeing him with a lady, and knowing that he was not married, the messenger, Captain Gaultier is his name, did not speak to him, especially as Mr. Talbot seemed rather to avoid recognition. Captain Gaultier thought nothing of the matter until this morning when he visited the Foreign Office on duty and heard something of what had happened. He then saw the Under-Secretary, the gentleman who sent the Earl to you, and told him what had happened.

"The Under-Secretary could hardly refuse to believe such a credible witness, so telegrams were dispatched to the Embassy in Paris and to the police at Dover. From Dover came back the information that exactly such a couple as had been described by Captain Gaultier had crossed over to France on Tuesday morning; and a few hours later a wire from Paris announced the discovery of the registered names at the Grand Hotel. The Paris telegram went on to say that the gentleman had told the manager his luggage was following from the Gare du Nord, and that his wife and himself were going out for half-an-hour, but would return in time to dress for dinner. When his traps arrived they were to be taken to his room. No luggage ever came, nor was either of the pair seen again, but we will lay hands upon them, never fear."

Brett took a hasty stride or two up and down his apartment.

"So you think," he burst forth at last, "that Mr. Talbot has not only taken part in some vulgar intrigue with a woman, but that he has also bolted with the Sultan's diamonds, sacrificing his whole career for a momentary impulse and imperilling his neck for the sake of a few gems which he cannot even convert into money?"

"Why not? It is not the first time in the history of the world that a man has made a fool of himself over a woman, or even committed murder in order to steal diamonds."

"Why, my dear Winter," said Brett more calmly, "do be reasonable. Where is the market for diamonds such as these are supposed to be? You know, even better than I do, that the slightest attempt to dispose of them at any figure remotely approaching their value will lead to the immediate detection and arrest of the person rash enough to make the attempt. "Don't you see, man," he continued, more vehemently, "that the Foreign Office and its messenger, its Under-Secretary, your Commissioner and the Embassy Officials in Paris have been completely and abjectly fooled—fooled too, in a particularly silly fashion by the needless registration of names at the hotel?"

"No, I do not see it. One cannot go against facts, but this time the evidence looks so strong that I shall be mightily mistaken if Mr. Talbot does not swing for his share in the matter. Anyhow, I have done my duty in letting you know what has happened, so I must be off."

"To arrest somebody, of course?" cried Brett, with an unpleasant laugh; but Mr. Winter was already hurrying down the stairs.

The momentary feeling of annoyance soon passed, to be succeeded by profound pity for the household at 118 Ulster Gardens. He well knew that once the police became convinced that a particular individual was responsible for the commission of a crime it required the eloquence of several counsel and the combined intelligence of a judge and jury at the Old Bailey to force them to change their opinion. Brett had never, to his knowledge, seen Talbot, yet he felt intuitively that this bright, alert and trustworthy young official was innocent of the slightest voluntary complicity in a crime which must shock London when its extent became known.

The testimony of the Foreign Office messenger was, of course, staggering at first sight, especially when it was backed up by the hurried investigations made at Dover and Paris. But there must be an explanation of Talbot's supposed journey, and, even assuming the most unfavourable view of his actions, why on earth should he so ostentatiously parade himself and his companion at the bureau of the Grand Hotel? There could be but one answer to this question. He acted in this manner in order to make certain that his presence in Paris should be known to the police the very hour they set about the task of tracing him. Then, who could the woman be? The last thing that a clever criminal, flying from outraged law, would dream of doing would be to encumber himself with a young and probably good-looking companion of the opposite sex.

The more Brett thought out the complexities of the affair, the more excited he became, and the longer and more rapid were his strides up and down the length of his spacious sitting-room. This was his only outward sign of agitation. When thinking deeply and fixedly upon any all-absorbing topic, he could not remain still. He felt obliged to cast away physical as well as mental restriction upon the play of his imagination, and he would at times pace backwards and forwards for unrecorded hours in the solitude of his apartments, finally awakening to a sense of his surroundings by reason of sheer exhaustion.

He was not destined to reach this ultimate stage on the present occasion. With a preliminary cough, for the discreet Smith was well versed in his master's peculiarities, that faithful servant announced the appearance of the Earl of Fairholme.

Brett looked at his watch, and was caught in the act by his visitor. "Yes, I know we fixed on seven o'clock," cried the impetuous young peer, "but I was simply dying to hear the result of your inquiries thus far, and I ventured to call an hour earlier."

The barrister explained that he sought to learn the time as a matter of mere curiosity. "Indeed," he added, "your appearance at this juncture is particularly welcome. I want to ask you many things concerning Mr. Talbot."

"Fire away," said Fairholme. "I'm no good at spinning a yarn, but I can answer questions like a prize boy in a Sunday school."

"Well, in the first instance, have you known him many years?"

"We were at school together at Harrow. Then I went into the Army whilst he had a University career. My trustees made me give up the Service when I succeeded to the estates, and about the same time Jack entered the Foreign Office. That is three years ago. We have seen each other constantly since, and, of course, when I became engaged to his sister our friendship became, if anything, stronger."

"Nothing could be more admirably expressed. Do you know anything about his private affairs?"

"Financially, do you mean?"

"Well, yes, to start with."

"He got a salary, I suppose, from Government, but he has a private income of some thousands a year."

"Then he is not likely to be embarrassed for money?"

"Most unlikely. He is a particularly steady chap—full of eagerness to follow a diplomatic career and that sort of thing. Why, he would sooner read a blue-book than the Pink 'Un!"

"If you were told that he had bolted with a nondescript young woman, what would you say?"

"Say!" vociferated Fairholme, springing up from the seat into which he had subsided, "I would tell the man who said so that he was a liar!"

"Exactly. Of course you would! Yet here are all kinds of people—Foreign Office officials, policemen, and hangers-on at the British Embassy

Don't Miss a Remarkable Competition on Page 853.

Digitized by Google

in Paris ready to swear, perhaps to prove, if necessary, that Talbot and some smartly-dressed female went to Paris quite openly by the day service yesterday and even took steps to ostentatiously announce their arrival in the French capital."

For a few moments the two men faced each other in silent wonder, the one at the strangeness of the news he was imparting, the other at its seeming absurdity. Then Fairholme flung himself back into his chair.

"Look here, Mr. Brett," he said, after a moment's thought, "if Jack himself stood there and told me that what you have said is true I would hardly believe it." A note of agony came into his voice, as he added: "Do you know what this will mean to his sister? Why, man, it will kill her!"

"It will do nothing of the sort," cried Brett. "Surely you understand Miss Talbot better than to hold any such view? She will be the first to proclaim to the world what you and I believe, namely, that her brother is innocent, no matter how black appearances may be. I have no knowledge of him save what I have learnt within the last few hours, yet I stake my reputation on the certainty that he is in no way connected save by compulsion, with this terrible occurrence."

"It gives one renewed courage to hear you speak so confidently," said the Earl, his face lighting with enthusiasm as he looked eagerly at the other, whose earnestness had, for an instant, lifted the veil from his usually calm and impassive features, betraying the strength of character and masterful purpose that lay beneath the outward mask.

"Is there anything else I can tell you?" he added.

Brett reflected deeply before he replied:

"You are quite sure that his was a nature that could not stoop to a vulgar intrigue?" he said. "Remember that in this relation the finest natures are prone to err. From long experience, I have learnt to place such slips in quite another category than mere lapses of criminality."

"Of course any man who knows the world must appreciate your reasons fully," said the other, "but from what I know of Jack I am persuaded the thing is quite impossible. Even if it were otherwise he would never be so mad as to go off when he knew that something very unusual and important was about to occur with reference to a special mission for the successful conclusion of which he had been specially selected by the Foreign Office."

"Ah! there you touch on the strange happenings of coincidence. Circumstantial evidence convicts many offenders, but it has hanged many an innocent man before to-day. I could tell you a very remarkable case in point. Once——"

But Smith appeared to announce dinner, and Brett not only insisted that his new acquaintance should dine heartily, but also contrived to divert him from present anxieties by drawing upon the rich storehouse of his varied experiences.

The meal, therefore, passed pleasantly enough. Both men arranged to visit Sir Hubert Fitz-James that evening and settle upon a definite course of action which would receive the approval of the authorities. Armed with a mandate from the Foreign Office, Brett could enter upon his task without fear of interference from officialdom. Nothing further could be done that night, as the private inquiry agent could not possibly complete any portion of his house-to-house scrutiny in the vicinity of the Carlton until the following morning at the earliest.

They smoked and chatted quietly until 7.30 p.m., when Inspector Winter again put in an appearance, to announce that the coroner's jury had brought in a verdict of "Wilful murder by some two or more persons unknown."

The detective was somewhat quieter in manner now that the sensational turn of events in Paris had assimilated with the other remarkable features of the crime which engaged his professional attention. Moreover, the presence of a peer of the realm had a subduing influence upon him, and he had the good taste not to insist too strenuously that Lord Fairholme's prospective brother-in-law was not only an accessory to a foul murder, but also a fugitive thief.

One new fact had been established by the post-mortem examination of the victims. Considerable violence had been used to overcome the struggles of the servant, Hussein. His neck was almost dislocated, and there was a large bruise on his back which might have been caused by the knee of an assailant who had endeavoured to garrotte him.

They were discussing this discovery and its possible significance when Smith entered, bearing a lady's visiting-card, which he silently handed to his master.

Brett read the name inscribed thereon. He merely said: "Show the lady in," and then he turned to the Earl of Fairholme, electrifying the latter by the words: "Miss Edith Talbot is here."

An instant later Miss Talbot came into the room, and the three men knew that she brought momentous, perchance direful, intelligence. She was deathly pale. Her eyes were unnaturally brilliant, and her mouth was set with tense resolution.

"Mr. Brett," she said, after a single glance at her lover, "we have received a letter from my brother."

"A letter from Jack!" cried Fairholme.

"Well, I never did!" ejaculated Mr. Winter.

But Brett only said:

"Have you brought it with you, Miss Talbot?"

"Yes; it is here. My uncle, who was too ill to accompany me, thought you ought to see it at once," and she handed a torn envelope to him.

He glanced at the post-mark.

"It was posted in Paris last evening," he said, his cool utterance sending a thrill through the listeners. "Is the address written by him?" he added.

"Oh, yes. It is undoubtedly from Jack."

Here was a woman moulded on the same inscrutable lines as the man whom she faced. Seldom, indeed, would either of these betray the feelings which agitated them. Then he took out the folded letter. It contained but three lines, and was undated.

"My dear Uncle and Sister," it ran. "I am in a position of some difficulty, but am quite safe personally.—Ever yours, JACK."

Mr. Winter was the first to recover his equanimity. He could not control the accent of triumph in his voice as he cried:

"What do you think of it now, Mr. Brett?"

But the barrister ignored him, save for a glance which seemed to express philosophical doubt as to whether Mr. Winter's head contained brains or sawdust.

"You are quite positive that both letter and envelope are in your brother's handwriting?" he said.

"Absolutely positive."

"There can be no doubt about it," chimed in Fairholme, to whom, in response to a gesture, Brett had passed the documents.

"Then this letter simplifies matters considerably," said Brett.

Miss Talbot looked at him unflinchingly as she uttered the next question:

"Do you mean that it serves to clear my brother from any suspicion?"

"Most certainly."

"I thank you for your words from the bottom of my heart. Somehow, I knew you would say that. Will you please come and help to explain matters to my uncle? Harry, you will come too, will you not?"

The sweet, gentle voice, with its sad mingling of hope and despair, sounded so pathetic that the impetuous peer had some difficulty in restraining a wild impulse to then and there clasp her to his heart.

Even Mr. Winter was moved not to proclaim his disbelief.

Digitized by Google

"I will see you in the morning, sir," he muttered.

Brett nodded, and the detective went out, saying to himself as he reached the street:

"Nerve! Of course he has nerve. It's in the family. Just look at that girl! Still, it did require some grit to sign his name in the hotel register and then calmly sit down to send off a letter telling his people not to worry about him. I've known a few rum cases in my time, but this one——"

The remainder of Mr. Winter's soliloquy was lost in the spasmodic excitement of boarding a passing omnibus, for this latest item of news must be conveyed to the Yard with all speed.

A Journey to Paris.

The sight of Talbot's letter seemed to fire Brett's imagination. He radiated electric energy. Both Lord Fairholme and Miss Talbot felt that in his presence all doubts vanished. They realised, without knowing why, that this man of power, this human dynamo, would quickly dispell the clouds which now rendered the outlook so forbidding. For the moment, oblivious of their presence, he began to pace the room in the unconscious concentration of his thoughts. Once he halted in front of the small bust of Edgar Allan Poe, whose pedestal still imprisoned the two cuttings of a newspaper which formed the barrister's first links with the tragedy. His ideas suddenly reverted to the paragraph describing the efforts of the Porte to obtain from the French Government the extradition of a fugitive relative of the Sultan. At that instant, too, a tiny clock on the mantelpiece chimed forth the hour of eight.

"That settles it," said Brett, aloud. "Smith," he vociferated.

And Smith appeared.

"Pack up sufficient belongings for a short trip on the Continent. Don't forget a rug and a great coat. Have the portmanteau on a cab at the door within three minutes.

"I am sorry, Miss Talbot," he continued, with his charming smile and a manner as free from perplexity as if he were announcing a formal visit to his grandmother, "I have just decided to go to Paris at once. The train leaves Victoria at 8.15. Lord Fairholme will take you home, and you will both, I am sure, be able to convince Sir Hubert that to yield too greatly to anxiety just now is to suffer needless pain.

"You are going to Paris, Mr. Brett!" cried Edith. "Why?"

"In obedience to an impulse. I always yield to impulses. They impress me as constituting Nature's telegraphs. I have a favourite theory that we all of us contain a neatly devised adaptation of Marconi's wireless system, and the time may come when the secret will be scientifically laid bare. Then, don't you see, it will be possible for a man in London to ring up a sympathetic soul in San Francisco. At present the code is not understood. It is not even properly named, so people are apt to distrust impulses."

He rattled on so pleasantly that Edith, bound up in the agony of her brother's disappearance and possible disgrace, could not help the expression of blank amazement at his levity which flitted across her mobile features.

Brett instantly became apologetic.

"Do forgive my apparent flippancy, Miss Talbot," he said. "I am really in earnest. I believe that a flying visit to Paris just now must unquestionably advance us an important stage in this inquiry. Let me explain exactly what I mean. Here is a letter from your brother, in handwriting which you and others best qualified to judge declare to be undeniably his. It also bears post-marks which would demonstrate to a court of law that it was posted in Paris last night and received here to-day. But it does not follow that it was written in Paris; it might have been written anywhere. Now, according to the police, there is an entry in the visitors' book at the Grand Hotel which appears to prove that your brother wrote his name therein on Tuesday night. If the handwriting in the Grand Hotel register corresponds beyond all doubt with that in this letter and envelope, then your brother must be in Paris. If it does not, he is not there. I am convinced that the latter hypothesis is correct, but to make doubly sure I will go and see with my own eyes. There now—I owed you an explanation and I have barely time to catch my train. Good-bye. I will wire you in the morning."

He placed the mysterious letter in his notebook, gave them a parting smile, and was gone.

He just managed to catch the 8.15, which started punctually, the sole remnant of railway virtue possessed by the South Eastern and Chatham line. A restful porter, quickened into active life by a half-crown tip, found him an empty seat in a first-class smoking carriage, and Brett's hasty glance round the compartment revealed that his travelling companions, to Dover, at any rate, were severely respectable Britons bound for the Riviera.

The harbour station at Dover wore its usual aspect of dejected misery. The hurrying passengers pushed and jostled each other in their frenzied efforts to board the steamer, as the average British tourist has a rooted belief that such pushing and jostling and banging of apoplectic portmanteaux against the legs of others are absolutely necessary if he would not be left behind.

With an experience born of many voyages, Brett quickly noted the direction of the wind and the vessel's bearings. A stiff breeze had brought up a moderate sea, and the barrister dumped down his bag, and flung himself into a chair on what a novice would regard as the weatherside of the chart house. He bore his discomfort for a few minutes, and was rewarded for his foresight by possessing the most sequestered nook on deck when the vessel turned her head seawards and began one of the shortest, but perhaps the most disagreeable, voyages in the world.

Having retained his seat long enough to establish a proprietary right therein, Brett rose and took a short tour round the ship. To distinguish anyone on deck was almost out of the question. The passengers were huddled up in indefinable shapes, and there was hardly light sufficient to effect a stumbling progress over the multitude of hand-baggage that seems to be indispensable to most travellers. So the barrister dived down the companion-way and cannoned against a burly individual who had propped himself against a bulkhead on the main deck saloon.

Something hard in the man's pocket gave Brett a sharp rap, and when they separated with mutual apologies, he laughed silently.

"Handcuffs!" he said. "Scotland Yard is always prepared for emergencies. I will wager a considerable sum that as soon as Winter reached headquarters his story about the letter caused a telegram to be dispatched to Dover. Here's a detective bound for Paris and prepared to manacle Talbot the moment he sees him. What a fearful and wonderful thing is the British police system. A crime, obviously clever in its conception and treatment, can be handled by a sharp policeman wearing regulation boots and armed with handcuffs. Really, I must have a drink."

(A further long instalment of this story appears next Tuesday.)

Result of the "Wedding" Post-card Competition.

The ten Gramophones offered in the above competition have been awarded to the following:

F. Nicholls, 219 Monton Road, Monton Green, nr. Manchester; Thos. Rose, 14 Alfred Road, Sutton, Surrey; Mrs. H. Lay, "Cader Idris," Dynevor Road, Grosvenor Wood, Tunbridge Wells; W. Taylor, 5 High Street, Falkirk; R. A. Slipper, Tivetshall Rectory, Norwich; J. Small, 5 Maple Street, Sheerness; G. F. Macro, 17 Summer Hill, St. Luke's Cork; Miss Jean Lawson, 2 Mentone Gardens, Edinburgh; Geo. Bailey, 281 Cann Hall Road, Leytonstone; W. J. Church, 41 Princes Street, Swansea.

Digitized by Google

Love Problem No. 2.

A POINT OF VIEW.

Should a Girl Expect to Begin Married Life as Well as she has been Accustomed to in her own Home?

Mabel Travers stood at the gate and watched her lover's retreating figure until it disappeared round a bend in the road.

There was a discontented expression on her handsome face as she walked slowly back to the house and entered her mother's drawing-room.

Mrs. Travers looked up from her work as Mabel, with a little impatient sigh, threw herself into a chair.

"Well, dear?" she said brightly.

"Well?" returned Mabel in a tone that implied the contrary.

"Is anything the matter?" asked her mother. "You haven't quarrelled with Leslie, I suppose," she added, playfully.

"No—yes—at least, really I'm not quite sure," was the unexpected reply.

"Tell me," said Mrs. Travers.

"Mother, it's horrible to marry a poor man!"

Mrs. Travers looked at her daughter in pained surprise.

"My darling!" she said, reproachfully.

"Oh, I know I'm a wretch to say it, and—and perhaps I don't mean it—and yet—and yet——"

"Don't be afraid to tell me dear."

"Mother, Leslie and I have been having a business talk. That's what he called it. It was hateful!"

"But very necessary. Leslie was wise, darling."

"Yes—I suppose so. He said that, as we were to be married so soon now, it was only right that I should know exactly what he could offer me. Oh, mother, I had no idea that Leslie was so miserably poor!"

Mrs. Travers eyed her daughter with a troubled look.

"He has never made any secret of his income," she said.

"I know; but I didn't realise how little it was till he went into all the wretched details about rent, and servants, and house-keeping money, and all the rest of it. Oh, it all seemed so mean and sordid!"

And Mabel flung out her hands with a little gesture of impatience.

"I am very sorry to hear you say that, Mabel," said Mrs. Travers gravely. "It—it almost makes me afraid," she went on hesitatingly, "you ought never to have promised to marry Leslie. Perhaps you are not the right kind of wife for him, dear."

"Mother!"

Mrs. Travers rose from her chair and laid her hand lightly on the girl's dark head.

"Tell me, child," she said, "do you really and truly care for him?"

At this Mabel hid her face in her hands and burst into a flood of tears.

"I—I do love him," she sobbed, "but—but—oh, I don't know what is the matter with me!"

And the girl spoke truly. She knew that she loved Leslie, yet she was miserably conscious of disappointment and disillusionment. That day she had realised, for the first time, the prosaic meaning of a limited income. She had been accustomed to think vaguely of poverty as a rather romantic kind of thing that made love all the more delightful. Leslie's statement of hard facts had scattered all her pretty, sentimental notions to the winds. Her heart had sunk within her as she listened to her lover's description of their future home—a modest villa in the suburbs, with one maid to assist her in her household duties. She dreaded the prospect of all the petty economies they would be obliged to practise, and for a moment, though she hated herself for it the next, she had felt almost angry with Leslie because he was not a richer man. She loved Leslie, she told herself again and again, and yet—

Something of all this the girl contrived to sob out into her mother's sympathetic ear, and as Mrs. Travers listened, the look of perplexity on her face gradually changed to one of relief.

"I think I understand," she said.

"Oh, I'm a horrid, mercenary wretch!" cried Mabel.

"No, I don't think you're that," replied her mother, quietly, "only—well, want of money is never a pleasant thing. We all love wealth and prosperity, and it's perfectly natural that a woman should want her husband to be rich rather than poor. I don't blame you, dear, for regretting Leslie's poverty; only I thought you cared for him less because of it——"

"Oh, no, no!" cried Mabel eagerly. "Mother, you didn't think I meant that!"

"I was afraid, at first, when you spoke so bitterly," replied Mrs. Travers gently. "But I know now I was mistaken."

"Mother, I'm beginning to see things more clearly," said the girl, with a sudden brightening of her face. "I I hate poverty, but I love Leslie. If Leslie were a pauper I should groan horribly, but I shouldn't give him up!"

Mrs. Travers began to laugh.

"Well, it isn't as bad as that, is it?" she returned. "After all, Leslie has quite a respectable income. I admit it might be larger, but then, there's every prospect of its increasing as time goes on. Do you know, Mabel," Mrs. Travers continued, "you're just a little bit inclined to exaggerate your future husband's straightened circumstances?"

"Perhaps I am," admitted Mabel, "But then——"

"Oh, I know what is in your mind," interrupted her mother, "Poverty is always comparative, and so, because you have been accustomed to a big house with plenty of servants, a little house with only one servant must seem poor and mean to you."

Mabel looked puzzled.

"You see," said Mrs. Travers, "when you compare the big house with the little one, you're comparing your father's position with Leslie's, and the one, you know, is nearly thirty years older than the other."

"Oh!" exclaimed Mabel, with startling emphasis. "What a silly child I am!"

And Mrs. Travers smiled in a satisfied way. She knew that her daughter was cultivating the proper frame of mind.

"And I never thought of that! I actually expected Leslie to start where father left off! Why, of course, it's unreasonable. Mother, I remember now what you told me once—things have come to you gradually. You and father began just as Leslie and I are going to begin!"

"Well—no, not quite," returned Mrs. Travers.

"But you were almost as poor, weren't you?"

Mrs. Travers laughed gaily.

"If you must know, my dear," she said, "your father's salary when I married him was exactly half the income Leslie is making now."

"Mother," said Mabel, "you make me more and more ashamed of myself."

"Oh, but ours was a dangerous experiment. You see, our income was below the minimum of discretion."

"Anyhow, the experiment ended happily."

"As it happened."

Mrs. Travers blushed charmingly.

"It was a risk, though, which I shouldn't like you and Leslie to run."

"You think I don't love Leslie as much as you loved father, and no wonder, after the way I've behaved," said Mabel humbly. "Mother, I wish—I wish Leslie were as poor as father was, so that I might show you——"

The sentence was elliptical, but Mabel's mother understood.

Grete Hahn.

Digitized by Google

ONE KISS IN THE DARK.

A Little Story of a Christmas Party.

"WHAT creatures they are—those women! A glance of an eye, a chance touch of a soft little hand, a little ear peering out beneath shining bands of brown hair, a twinkling mouse of a foot in its satin slipper, and it's all over with a man. But, if he just chance to get a kiss in the dark, he's lost for ever—carried off by enchantment!"

"Hush, Paul!" Here spoke the pretty little lady sitting opposite Mr. Dupré, at his own table, Mrs. Dupré by name; and a blush that made her prettier and more piquante than ever crimsoned her somewhat pale cheeks, and even the pearly tips of her ears that just showed themselves beneath "shining bands of brown hair."

"It is true, is it not?" persisted Mr. Dupré, laughing at the pretty threat of that upraised finger. "Here's Benson, almost bursting with curiosity to know how I, Paul Dupré, who six months ago, went to Paris a sworn bachelor and man about town, should have been entrapped, bewitched, inveigled by the arts of an enchantress, and transformed into a sober husband and master of a household. I must tell him, little one, and if you would not listen, you must run away."

With a defiant shake of the little hand, and a pout of the red lips that only made them more tempting, Mrs. Dupré rose from the table. As her husband held the door for her to pass, he said: "It will be told when thou hast prepared for the opera. Adorn thyself, ma belle, and in one little half hour return to us magnificent and ravishing."

A wealthy bachelor, of quiet habits, and, unlike the majority of his countrymen, shrinking from society, Paul was quite the last man I had expected to find, on my return from a half-year's sojourn in France, married and settled in a handsome but unostentatious household. Where had he found this beautiful, piquante, dark-haired girl of twenty, who presided so gracefully at his table, and was evidently very much in love with her shy, stately, middle-aged husband?

This was just what he was about to tell me. Paul, having been resident in England since his boyhood, spoke good idiomatic English, with only a slight accent, interspersing his conversation usually, however, with a good many French words. As these are far from being essential to the narrative, we will not record them.

"Tom Dalton—you know Tom?" he began, "spent a month with me a year ago last autumn, at my little place at the North, where I go always for the shooting, and in return he exacted from me a promise that I would go down with him to his father-in-law's house in the country for the Christmas holidays.

"'Only a family party,' said Tom, and I was foolish enough to take him in a literal sense. I knew Tom's wife, and had been introduced to that wonderful boy of his who transcends all other children, and I fancied I was to meet just them and the papa and mamma. I thought I might endure that for a few days, especially as Mrs. Tom Dalton is only a pretty statue, and never annoys one with small talk.

"Fancy my astonishment, then, when I found there was a large party—Mrs. Tom's married sister and husband, and her married brothers and their wives, and a host of babies and nurses, and—ah, what was worst of all!—a half score of girls. Think, my friend, of that! Paul Dupré, bachelor and woman-hater, trapped and imprisoned in a country house with at least ten girls with bewildering eyes, and curls, and voices, and hats and dresses, all levelled at me because I was the only single man of the party, excepting always a lad of sixteen who was brother or cousin to every one of them.

"We arrived on Christmas Eve, and as I took Mrs. Rutherford, Mrs. Tom's mamma, in to dinner, and talked politics with the Judge all the evening, I managed to survive the hours pretty well. Next day we all went to church, I still in attendance on Mrs. Rutherford, who was a little old lady, very grand and stately, like the picture of a marquise of the old school. Afterwards came a long walk with Tom, then dinner, and I had been twenty-four hours in the house without speaking to a girl. Of course, there had been a general introduction the previous evening, but, to have saved my life, I could not have told the name of one of them.

"But in the evening we must needs have games for the children, so they said, and blind man's buff among other things. I soon found that I was not able to escape my share of it.

"I give you my word I could not see a particle, except a glimpse straight downward of my chin and the side of my nose. I had been blindfolded carefully by the aid of two or three pairs of hands, and twirled three times round, and set off on my journey by a push.

"Here was a dreadful embarrassment—blind! yes, blinded with a handkerchief—and set to catch somebody—one of those girls, or a married sister or aunt, who could tell? And, oh! fearful task! to tell the name or kiss the one I should catch!

"That was the penalty of being introduced as Tom's friend. 'We are quite a family party,' they said; 'we will not make a stranger of Mr. Dupré.' And so I must be blindfolded and set to catch somebody; and if I could not guess who I had caught—and how could I where all were strangers?—I was to pay the forfeit of a kiss.

"I knew most of the names, but it was quite impossible that I should identify the individuals to whom they belonged, even with the help of my eyes. How then was I to do it by the touch alone? The kiss was already a foregone conclusion.

Digitized by Google

"I groped about with little alacrity, and of course caught nobody—just what I had intended. Garments rustled near, and even brushed me as their wearers leisurely moved out of my way. I had only to reach out my hands to catch some of these languid beauties, but I knew very well what must follow, and had not the courage for the feat. If only the children had not been sent to bed, I would have brought that fact to an end very soon! I did not see then how right it was that I had not been drawn into the game while they stayed.

"Presently they seemed to read my thoughts, or perhaps Tom gave them a hint, for they—those girls, I mean—began to inflict intolerable abuse upon me. They pinched my arms, they pulled my hair and my coat, and then—hoydens that they were—ran away tittering and jeering.

"'It was quite time to end this,' I said, for I was aroused to retaliation. The catching, and—and what was to follow, should soon be over. Suddenly I began to dart about, and fluttering and musical little screams increased. There was frantic haste, and sundry crashes and collisions that convinced me that the 'play' had become extremely earnest.

"Looking straight downward I could sometimes catch a glance of a stooping figure gliding past me; but presently I lost the power of seeing even so little. I was groping in a narrow passage, for my hands touched the wall on either side, and probably a dark one. Before me I could hear a soft rustle of garments, and a low, hurried breathing. Probably one of my tormentors was hidden there and could not make her escape. If so, the game was nearly ended.

"Pressing forward, as I expected, my hands soon came in contact with the head of a crouching figure drawn closely into a corner.

"I felt smooth strands of hair, a little wreath or bunch of ribbons, a warm, satin-like cheek. The hair might have belonged to any of the younger ladies, with the exception of two or three who wore ringlets, and their cheeks were all round and smooth with health. Of course I could not guess who this was.

"If she would only speak! I knew the voice of Tom's wife, and it might be she. But not a sound issued from her lips; the figure trembled violently and breathed hurriedly, but gave no other sign of life.

"'Rise up, mademoiselle,' I said at last. 'Tell me your name, and then I shall announce it and go away at once.' I thought I had hit on a brilliant expedient, and the lady, rising, seemed about to give me the required information, when, with a great shout, three or four persons entered the other end of the passage.

"'Mr. Dupré has caught someone!' I heard them say. 'Who is it? Tell us whom you have caught!'

"'Yes, Paul,' shouted Tom; 'give us the name, or honestly pay the forfeit.'

"'Speak,' I whispered to the lady whose arm I held; but, trembling, she remained silent.

"'Indeed, I cannot tell,' I said, and then another great shout rose from rosy lips. I was angry and desperate. I drew the slight figure towards me, I tore the handkerchief from my face, and, bending down, I pressed a resounding kiss upon a pair of lips that pouted with annoyance as their owner struggled to release herself.

"There was another shout, but I was scarcely conscious of it. In my own country I have dark, rare wines which seem to send an electric thrill, as of new and abundant life, through my veins. In effect like this, but a thousand times more intoxicating, was the draught I had just tasted. Elate, triumphant, yet half giddy under the new exhilaration I experienced, I advanced towards the group that thronged the entrance to the drawing-room. I had drawn within my arm the hand of the lady I had caught, and—but no matter. I was recalled to myself by the sound of angry voices, and by feeling the little figure trembling and swaying by my side.

"'Go to your room at once, Miss Charter!' old Mrs. Rutherford was saying, while angry exclamations burst from the lips of the younger ladies—'Astonishing assurance!' 'Such impertinence!' 'Prowling in the passage on purpose!' all directed apparently to the little creature I was supporting.

"Before I could find words to express my surprise at a scene I was far from comprehending, Miss Charter had quietly withdrawn from my arm. Facing the group that frowned upon her, she spoke with spirit, though with a piteous tremor in her sweet, clear voice.

"'Indeed, Mrs. Rutherford, I assure you I had no intention of committing an impertinence. I came down to speak to Mrs. Charles Rutherford about Bella, who is very restless and feverish. While I was endeavouring to attract Mrs. Rutherford's attention this gentleman came out. I moved back, but he followed me up the passage and I could not escape. For what has passed further I am not responsible.'

"'Indeed, madam, she is not,' I found voice to say. 'I caught her fairly, and was, of course, unable to name a lady I had never seen. If, however, in my ignorance of your customs I have done wrong, I trust to be pardoned by all present, especially by this lady, who, it seems to me, has been the greatest sufferer.'

"'No pardon is required by you, Mr. Dupré,' replied Mrs. Rutherford coldly; and she added, 'Return to your room, Miss Charter; and if you want anything in future, please ring or send Miss Bella's nurse.'

"Miss Charter bent her head and turned away in silence. I gave her my hand to lead her to the stairs, but she declined it with thanks, and I heard a low sob as she went wearily up the long flight.

"'I beg you will forget the impertinence of that girl!' said Mrs. Dalton, as we all returned to the drawing-room. 'She is my sister's nursery governess, and though generally well-behaved, has probably enough of the curiosity of her class to lead her to intrude here. I hope Sarah will dismiss her at once. Nothing is more destructive to household quiet than the slightest insubordination of dependents. Miss Charter must be taught her place.'

"'But what, then, is her place, madam?' I asked, I fear not very politely, for, with the intoxication of that kiss lingering about me, these remarks jarred painfully upon my feelings. 'She surely has the manners and refinement of a lady?'

"'No one could expect a lady to make a companion of her nursery-governess, or introduce her as an equal to her friends,' said Mrs. Dalton; and her mother, who had been listening, explained further:

"'Miss Charter has been well and carefully educated. Her father once held a high position, and her mother was a well-bred and pleasing woman. Their daughter—an orphan and poor, sinks to a lower sphere. It is an undoubted impertinence in her to venture beyond its confines.'

"I listened with deference to the ladies, but I was not satisfied. How could I be when all my memories of Miss Charter were so fresh; her gentle young beauty, her spirited, yet ladylike manners, her quiet dignity, and, above all, the kiss that yet thrilled like fire along my veins? I felt the spirit of a champion aroused within me. I had brought this trouble upon the unoffending girl—was I not bound to protect her? Yet I had the tact to see that it were better for me not to plead her cause at present.

"There were no more games after this, the excitement of this scene had destroyed all desire for them. Mrs. Charles Rutherford withdrew to look after her sick child—possibly to scold Miss Charter; the ladies drew into groups, whispering of what had occurred; and the gentlemen went away to slippers and cigars.

"All but myself. I could not pollute the lips that had touched Miss Charter's with the Turn at once to page 853 and read a remarkable letter.

Digitized by Google

vile weed. I went to my bed in a delirium, half induced by the ecstasy of my new sensation, half by impotent anger against those I named my persecutors.

"These thoughts pursued me through my dreams, and were with me when I awoke. From my window, in the early morning, I saw Miss Charter with the children in the grounds, and I hastened to join her that I might seek forgiveness for the unintentional wrong I had done her. The presence of the children removed all impropriety from the act, and I thought I should feel more in charity with myself if I assured this young lady that, let her position here be what it would, I felt for her as much as for the highest in the land.

"When I returned to the house half an hour later, I had made a discovery, and that was that I should never be quite happy until I had the right to repeat the kiss I had stolen as often as I chose, and, further, that that was likely to be very often indeed. If Miss Charter had looked very pretty, delicate and refined under the advantageous circumstances attending our first meeting, all these attractions were enhanced by the clear morning air, her own modest self-respect, and the charming embarrassment which the sight of me caused her. I had come down to The Elms priding myself on my confirmed bachelorhood, and contrasting my free, 'unhoused condition' most favourably with that of my friend Tom, who was the slave of the multitudinous fancies of a capricious wife. But all was changed! That kiss had wrought the miracle of revitalising the heart which I thought was dead to all tender emotions. I was as desperately in love—I at thirty-five—as any boy of twenty with his earliest flame.

"I did not see Miss Charter many times at The Elms. My respect for her, her own sense of propriety, alike forbade clandestine meetings. Sometimes she came into the drawing-room to play for the children's dances, when I always showed her marked deference. Once or twice I encountered her abroad. I learnt she had been discharged and was about to go to London. I obtained her address there and pleased myself with the thought of meeting her.

"I was disappointed in this. Only one night she spent with the relative to whose house I had been directed, and then went away to a distant situation which Mrs. Rutherford had procured for her. For a whole year (do you not recall the restlessness that used to excite your mirth?) I wandered about, my soul disquieted with an intense longing to see her once more, to snatch her from a life of toil, to claim her as mine, to make the kiss which was such a delicious memory, a sweet, ever-renewed reality.

"At last, when I had come almost to despair of the realisation of this intense desire, I suddenly and all unexpectedly encountered her one day in a public street. She had returned and was staying with the relation of whom I knew. She met me with a blush and a smile, and a timid pressure of the hand that I interpreted as favourable to my hopes. And she did not deny me the pleasure of meeting her at her house.

"There is not much more to tell. I have told you about the kiss, and its consequences were for me the dearest, sweetest, brightest of pretty little wives; for her a home where she is cherished and beloved, and where I believe my efforts to make her happy have been entirely successful.

"Her only fault consists in the bit of sly malice with which she sometimes insinuates how different the consequences must have been had I chanced to catch and kiss somebody else on that memorable occasion—for instance, one of those black-eyed or flaxen-haired girls, who are now the very dear friends of Mrs. Dupré, once the poor Miss Charter."

L. Parkyn.

LOOK OUT FOR NEXT WEEK'S COVER.

IT IS THE ERSKINE TARTAN.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

December 23.—Those whose birthdays fall here, will have a good year for business and general affairs. Avoid speculations and guard against fires; insure against accident.

Girls will need some care in love matters.

The day is good for doing business with electricians, cloth merchants, and professional people.

A child born to-day will be cheerful, generous, but unsettled and fond of travel.

December 24.—The health will need care during the next year; more than usual opposition in business. Guard against fire, cuts, and falls.

Girls will receive attentions, but little will come of them, chiefly flirtations.

The day is not good, and important matters should be laid aside. Beware of mishap in the evening.

A child born here will be rash and headstrong; will have an unsettled life; should keep in the employ of others. An unhappy marriage if a girl.

December 25.—A Merry Christmas to all, is the wish of "Asturel."

Those celebrating their birthdays to-day will find the next year one of anxiety and worry. Business will require much attention and home affairs will not go smoothly.

Girls born near 3 p.m. and 9 p.m. will experience trouble and disappointment in their love affairs.

A child born this day will be improvident and will do best in the employ of others.

December 26.—A quiet year; have a care with letters and agreements. Better for elderly people, farmers, and landlords.

Young girls will have crosses and obstacles, and must not place much confidence in the opposite sex.

A child born to-day will be thoughtful, ambitious, and persevering. Not fortunate in business.

December 27.—The health will need some attention over the next twelve months; business and general affairs are favoured and some progress will be made.

Girls will find love matters interesting, if engaged they marry.

The day is good for most things; do business with hardware dealers, drapers, literary people, and visit doctors.

A child born here will be active, cheerful, and painstaking. Will have a fortunate life and should succeed.

December 28.—A year of activity and travel; favourable changes can be made. Business and general affairs go well.

Girls should be cautions and prudent in their love affairs; some attentions from married men.

A child born to-day will be unsettled and travel much, but the journeys will generally be fortunate.

December 29.—An unfavourable birthday. Great care will be needed in business, or it will go wrong. Avoid law and quarrels.

Girls will find friction and discord in their love affairs.

The day is one on which to keep quiet; beware of mishap and quarrels. Guard against loss.

A child born here will be best in the employ of others. The mind will be rash, and stubborn.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

LORD REGINALD DAVENANT. Another of Belinda's suitors.

LADY HONORIA. The Duke's sister.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister, who visits Cairo.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

HOW LADY PEGGY FINDS BELINDA.

WHILE staying at the Continental Hotel at Cairo, I lose my fortune by the failure of Hammond's Bank. I undertake, therefore, for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, to chaperon Belinda, the daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire, and to bring about her marriage with the son of some old and titled family. Staying at the same hotel in Cairo are the Duke of Eastacres, and his mother the Duchess.

The Duchess and I agree that nothing could be better than a union of the Duke's title and Belinda's millions; we do everything, therefore, to bring this about.

One evening, under the guidance of a fine-looking Bedouin, we all go to witness a religious festival. Some dervishes are dancing, when suddenly Belinda, excited beyond all self-restraint, throws herself into the midst of the fanatics and tries to imitate their weird dance. Instantly all is confusion. The guide snatches Belinda and hurries us away. Belinda is profuse in her thanks, and suddenly, with a cry of "Lady Peggy, he's not a dragoman at all, he's David Carr!" throws herself into his arms.

The dragoman is dismissed, and on our return to the Hotel the Duchess of Eastacres takes me to task for the occurrence. I retort that not long ago I saw the Duchess' own daughter, Honoria, in the arms of a real Egpytian!

The Duchess is furious, calls Honoria, and, after storming at her, slaps her face. Belinda rushes in, rescues Honoria and takes her to her room.

Shortly afterwards a fearful shriek is heard, followed by an impassioned appeal for "Help!" The voice is Belinda's!

Rushing upstairs, I discover that Belinda has only just prevented Honoria poisoning herself to escape marriage with her cousin, Mark Striven. Later in the day we go to the Pyramids.

Lord Reginald Davenant, a new arrival at Cairo, accompanying the party, at one time in love with Mrs. Murchison-Lee, now transfers his affections to Belinda. The slighted Mrs. Lee, or "Midge," as she is called, is furious, and threatens violence to Belinda.

I checkmate Midge, however, by abstracting the morphia (to which she is a slave), with the hypodermic syringe, from her dressing-case.

That same evening I suddenly discover the Duke of Eastacres and a new-comer, Stanley Forbes, in the midst of a violent altercation. Fearing that a duel may ensue, I rush between the two men.

Sending Eastacres off on some errand, I tax Stanley Forbes with quarrelling with the Duke in regard to a girl named Sheila Kenwyn. She had disappeared some time back; it is thought the Duke is responsible for her disappearance. An open scandal about Eastacres would interfere with my matrimonial projects.

"Forego a quarrel with the Duke," I implore Stanley, "and I will extract Sheila's address from him."

Stanley consents. With some diplomacy I entrap the Duke into telling me where the girl is.

Next morning I start Belinda and the Duke off to Cairo, and tackle Stanley Forbes successfully in their absence. Later, I return to the Continental and find my labours rewarded. I behold Belinda clasped in the Duke's arms!

On offering my congratulations, however, Belinda repudiates all notion of an engagement with the Duke. She explains that her attitude is one merely of liking for him, and that when in token of friendship she gave her hand to her lover, she found herself embraced.

"I made Miss North a proposal of marriage," says the Duke. "She did not answer me in words, but put her hand in mine. Am I to be blamed if I misread her meaning?"

I assure the Duke that his conduct has been quite natural, entirely blameless, and represent to Belinda that, after her behaviour, marriage with the Duke is inevitable, as I was not the only one who saw the Duke's embrace, and that unless her engagement to Eastacres is announced she will be looked upon as an immodest girl.

Belinda still refuses to regard herself as engaged, however, and as a last resource I threaten to send her back to her father. She consents under great pressure to an engagement in name only for a month. At the end of that time, when we shall be leaving Cairo, I promise to announce that the engagement has been broken off.

Close on her consent the door opens, David Carr enters, just sixty seconds late.

My influence had obtained an appointment for him at St. Petersburg, and he had come to say good-bye. The Duke lays his hand upon Belinda's arm, and remarks calmly, "We are just engaged."

"It is a lie!" cries David, and appeals to Belinda.

Digitized by Google

Then, for the first and only time while she is with me, Belinda faints. I turn the two men out of the room and get Belinda to bed. She asks for Honoria. That ungrateful girl takes a base advantage of my kindness and brings David Carr a message from my protegée.

"Belinda says she won't be married for a year, at least," announces Honoria. "Will you please come to her wedding?"

David, greatly comforted at the words, departs.

Our stay in Cairo now draws to a close, the Khedive's ball ending the season. I determine on that occasion to make a public announcement of Belinda's engagement to the Duke.

One night I discover that Belinda's pearls are missing. I go to the Duchess to consult her as to the best means of recovering them. Looking through the door of her room, I discover her Grace in the middle of the room, one hand raised in a threatening attitude towards her daughter, in the other lay Belinda's pearls! The Duchess explains to Honoria that Belinda gave her the pearls to take care of. Honoria retires to her own room and the Duchess proceeds to empty the contents of a trunk upon the floor. It contains all sorts of knick-knacks; amongst them I recognise a valuable fan of mine. The truth suddenly dawns on me. The Duchess is a kleptomaniac! I obtain the pearls from her Grace, on the plea that Belinda told me she was keeping them for her, but she will not give up my fan.

On the night of the Khedive's ball, Belinda publicly declares she is not engaged to Eastacres. The latter follows her to a side room to remonstrate. I am about to join them, when the Khedive enters into conversation with me.

From where I stand I see that Eastacres and Belinda are quarrelling. Suddenly through a door on the Duke's right a veiled woman appears. At sight of Eastacres she screams.

It is Honoria, who is about to elope with El Hamed, her Egyptian lover.

The Duke darts forward to stop her, but, with Belinda's help, she evades him, and makes for the river, by which means El Hamed had arranged for her to get away from Cairo, he meeting her some few miles lower down.

Late though it is, the Duke insists that I shall accompany him to search for his sister. We arrive at the quay, and suddenly see Honoria on board a small launch which is just steaming away.

Our cries to the captain to stop, and Honoria's frantic appeals to him to go forward, convince the captain that something is wrong, and he returns, and finally hands his charge over to Eastacres.

I now leave Cairo with Belinda for Paris, on a visit to my old friend the Marquise D'Arteuil and her nephew the Comte de Sonnaz. Determining to drop Eastacres, I decide that the Comte shall be the next on the list of Belinda's suitors. Arrived at Paris, however, I am dismayed to find that Eastacres is already there to welcome me.

This Week's Instalment.

BELINDA BECOMES THE RAGE IN PARIS.

To find that Eastacres was a guest of the Marquise caused me almost as much annoyance as Belinda. His presence, I thought, was likely to interfere with my plans in regard to Belinda and the Comte; rejected himself, he would not tolerate a more favoured suitor.

Belinda showed her displeasure more plainly than she should have done. She accorded the Duke the chilliest of greetings, and made a marked difference in her treatment of him and the Comte.

The Marquise d'Auteuil explained that Eastacres had called on her an hour or two before we arrived.

"He found himself desolated to leave me," she said, with an expressive gesture, "What could I do but ask him to remain?"

"What, indeed?" I murmured, marvelling that at her age, and with her experience she should be so inordinately vain as to swallow the Duke's outrageous flattery.

The Hotel D'Auteuil stands in the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne, and is one of the most splendid of the many mansions of fashionable Paris. It is one of those grand foreign houses at which all great people meet. A sort of neutral ground in which political differences are obliterated, and, all that is well-born or well-dowered with money or brains received.

The house is grand, gorgeous, brilliant, adorned in the taste of the second Empire, to which it belonged; glittering and overladen, superb, yet at times too showy. The vestibule of marble, lit by gilded gasaliers, is filled with masses of camelias and azaleas, beautiful and scentless; the wide staircase is bright with scarlet carpetting, into which the feet sink as though treading upon velvet, mirrors line the walls, and heavy odours of burnt pastilles fill the heated air.

Belinda achieved as great a success in critical Paris as she had done in cosmopolitan Cairo. Her beauty, her girlishness, her curious disregard and contempt for the remarks of Society, charmed the Parisians, always on the qui vive for something new and startling.

The Comte, as I had foreseen, fell desperately in love, while Belinda showed a decided liking for the young Frenchman.

I sounded her on the question of marriage with him, but, as usual, she was disappointing.

"I like him," she said frankly, "but as a friend, no more. I told him so the first evening that we came here. You see," she added, noting my look of dismay and astonishment, "I did not want him to make a mistake like the Duke. I said I should be pleased to have him for a friend, but I explained that David Carr was the only man I wished to marry. The Comte seemed a little surprised at first, but after he understood why I had told him, and was very nice. So you see," Belinda flashed a smile, "there's no reason why I shouldn't talk and laugh, and ride, and drive with him. He won't misunderstand now."

Belinda had decidedly used her experience with Eastacres to some purpose! I felt she had outwitted me, and when that evening I spoke to the Comte himself, he gave me little consolation.

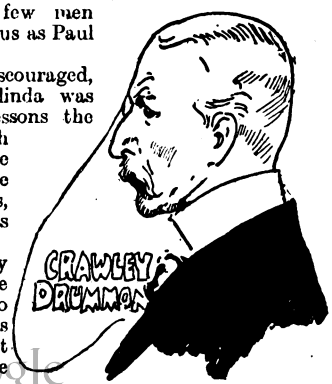
"She is beautiful!" he exclaimed, "she is chic, ravissante, adorable. But she is not for me. She has said so herself. We are bon camarades, Lady Peggy, no more."

"You are easily discouraged," I said, smiling, "since when were you faint-hearted? A rival should fire your enthusiasm, not damp it."

De Sonnaz paused; then, with a half laugh, and a faint flush, bent towards me.

"She has told me of her lover," he said softly, "and, as she spoke, her eyes—those beautiful blue eyes—looked me through and through. They appealed to me, asking me to help her, to act with honour to her, and that most fortunate of men, M. Carr. Had she delayed, had she waited but another day, it would have been too late. I could not have given her my friendship, I could only have offered her my heart. But, as it is"—he looked me straight in the eyes—"I am her friend," he added softly, "and—M. Carr's."

What he said gave me cause for great uneasiness. Belinda, by a clever trick, had disarmed the Comte as a lover, and transformed him from a suitor to a friend. She might pursue the same tactics in regard to other men with similar results! Only, thank goodness, few men were as foolishly chivalrous as Paul de Sonnaz.



Still, the incident discouraged, almost alarmed me. Belinda was learning some of the lessons the world has to teach with remarkable aptitude. She was fighting me with one at least of my own weapons, finesse masquerading as candour.

My eyes involuntarily sought the Duke's. He was, as usual, close to Belinda. All her efforts and manœuvres could not dislodge him from the place that he had chosen — at her right hand. At every function, dance, "At Home," water or theatre party, he was there. And against his persistency, well-bred but determined, even Belinda's will was powerless. As a consequence, the story of their engagement and its rupture was recounted, discussed, and commented upon, in every salon in Paris, the general verdict being that a "misunderstanding had arisen, which would eventually be put right."

Digitized by Google

Hardy North shared this opinion, and wrote to that effect with great earnestness and some severity to Belinda for the steps she had taken.

The Duke's eyes met mine over the girl's fair head. He seemed to read what was passing in my mind. He strolled over to where I sat, dropping into the vacant chair beside me.

"Tired?" he said softly, "or worried, which is it, Lady Peggy? The Comte is not playing the part assigned him to your satisfaction, perhaps? It is your own fault. I told you the rôle was mine. Sooner or later Belinda will accept me as her fate, and of her own free will."

I shook my head.

"She will never willingly marry except for love," I answered.

"Or hate," he returned, "either is sufficient. She does not care for me, truly, but neither does she for any other man—the engineer fellow is not worth considering."

"She may care, though," I returned maliciously, "she is very young and very beautiful, and half Paris is at her feet. She would be more or less than woman to withstand such homage." I motioned to where Belinda stood, a tall, girlish figure in white cachemire, an old silver girdle of German work about her waist, and in the coils of her bright hair a single silver arrow.

The Marquise was holding a reception; her rooms, as usual, were thronged, and Belinda was surrounded by admirers.

The girl was looking her best. Strikingly unlike the charming mondaines that graced the hotel, she had a style and distinction all her own. Her fair face was guiltless of paint and powder, her hair took its gold from Nature, and her figure, straight and slim as a sapling, owed nothing to artificial compression.

In the midst of the brilliance, the luxury, the glittering lustre, the va et vient of the Hotel D'Auteuil she stood calm and serene, like a white statue against a bank of flaming crimson flowers.

At the moment that I called the Duke's attention to the girl, Alphonse Hervé, the French painter, was bowing over her hand. Young, rich, famous, with the genius of a Raphael, and the face of Saint Sebastian, Paris went mad over him.

Great ladies competed for his notice, he was the lover of the rulers of Society, the hero for a hundred intrigues and romances—and he had fallen a victim to the grave blue eyes of a girl in her teens. He was bewitched by Belinda!

Her face coloured under his ardent gaze, but his manner, almost reverential, reassured her. Gradually the group of men surrounding her melted away. She had ears for none but the famous Hervé.

A certain Grand Duchess, an imperious woman who fancied that she reigned over Hervé's life, because he dominated hers like a fatality, watched Belinda with an anger hardly to be restrained. A lovely creature, exquisitely painted, she wore a gown cut en cœur, fashionably indecent, and sparkling with gems. She was a triumph of art, the highest product of our world. Belinda was crude beside her, and yet, so blind are men, that Hervé never cast a look in her direction.

Belinda appeared equally impressed, as I noted with alarm. Hervé was a genius truly, but a commoner, and, therefore, no match for Hardy North's millions. The Duke, to my relief, interrupted the tête-à-tête.

Belinda received him coldly, and pointedly ignored his effort to draw her into conversation.

"I wish to speak to Lady Carstairs," she said calmly, "Will you take me to her, M. Hervé?"

The Frenchman bowed, offered his arm, and piloted her safely towards me.

"M. Hervé is painting a wonderful picture, Lady Peggy," she said in her fresh young voice, "but he is not pleased with his model. He wants me to sit to him instead. I hope you will not object, because M. Hervé has promised that if I will sit for this picture he will sketch my head and face for father. You know how that would please him."

"If that is your only reason for acting as model, Miss North, "said the Duke, who had quickly followed her across the room, "the matter can easily be arranged otherwise. I will commission Hervé to paint your portrait at his own price, and, with your permission I will send it to your father." The Duke gazed at the painter with the cool insolence of which he was master. Hervé flashed and bit his lip. For a moment I feared he would answer in terms as provocative, but with an effort he controlled himself.

"I cannot accept your commission," he said coldly.

"Nor my father your gift," flashed Belinda, danger in her eyes. Then, turning to Hervé she said sweetly, "It will give me great pleasure to sit for you, monsieur. Lady Peggy, do you object?"

This painfully direct method of attack discomposed me. It was difficult to return an ambiguous answer to such a horribly open question.

"My dear Belinda, I am delighted that M. Hervé should pay you so great a compliment," I said, smiling. "You are to be envied."

"When may I sit to him?" said the terrible girl.

"That is for me to decide with M. Hervé," I said quietly. "The Marquise is looking for you, Belinda," I added. "Eastacres," I turned to the Duke, "will you take Miss North to Madame D'Arteuil?"

With a very bad grace my charge accepted the Duke's arm. Our hostess, a fairylike little person with a wonderful wig, and a marvellous complexion, both Piver's latest, received her with a smile. She had an admiration for the girl's beauty, and a liking for her courage.

"When may I hope to see you at my studio, Lady Peggy?" said Hervé softly. "It is an eternity since you came. I remember you brought your daughter, Lady Millicent—how long is it—five years ago? She was lovely, your daughter, fair and slight, with eyes dark as night, and soft as your own."

"Belinda's are blue," I said, smiling.

"Oh, yes, the day follows the night! Both are beautiful."

He gazed at me meaningly. Somehow I did not care to meet his look. Millicent had nourished an infatuation for him at a time when he was but beginning his career. I had nipped the attachment in the bud, but it would seem he still remembered her.

"You will let me paint this beautiful young girl?" He bent over my hand, his eyes flashed into mine. I reflected that to be painted by the great Hervé would immensely enhance Belinda's reputation as a beauty. I would accord the artist no opportunity for making love to his model. Besides, Belinda——

"I will bring her to the Rue Royal to-morrow," I said, and Hervé thanked me with a brilliant smile.

The Comte de Sonnaz drew me aside as I passed down the room.

"Why don't you give the Duke his congé, Lady Peggy?" he asked moodily. "Belinda has an acute distaste for him, he troubles, indeed, almost frightens her, with his attentions. Can't you make him understand they are unwelcome?"

"Paul de Sonnaz, are you mad?" I cried indignantly. "Do you ask me to insult a guest in your aunt's house?"

"Belinda also is a guest," he returned shortly. "The Duke is annoying her. If you won't stop him, why," he laughed, "I must. It is the duty of one friend to help another."

Digitized by Google

"Paul," I laid my hand on his arm, "for Heaven's sake, think of the Marquise! You are so hot, so hasty, you will insult the Duke, he will retaliate, and then——" I paused and glanced at him significantly.

"Have no fear for me or your dear Duke. We shall not fight, I promise you that. I shall remonstrate with my tongue only. Now for Alphonse," he glanced after the painter, "there is cause to be alarmed. Alphonse is already the rival of Eastacres. And"—he glanced at me shrewdly—"it is possible he may prove more fortunate than even his Grace or I."

"Impossible! Belinda would not reject Eastacres for a painter!"

"My dear lady, but what a painter! And what a man! And how superb a lover! Where else is to be found genius and beauty, and fascination such as Alphonse Hervé's? Have a care, Lady Peggy, or, you may plunge Paris into mourning. The Duke is a dead shot, and Hervé——"

"My dear Paul, do not be melodramatic. English Dukes do not fight duels with artists."

"Unless they are challenged," he interrupted. "Eastacres will provoke a challenge unless you are careful."

I laughed at his earnestness, and asked what he wished me to do.

"Tell the Duke you no longer permit his addresses to Miss North. You do not wish him to marry her?"

"He is an excellent match," I answered.

For answer Paul de Sonnaz sneered—sneered in my face.

"An excellent match!" he repeated. "For how many sins do a title and a settlement atone to you women? I'm not a feeling fellow, Lady Peggy, not a particularly moral one, but there are some things I can't stand. To speak of marriage between Belinda and the Duke is desecration."

"What do you know of Eastacres?" I asked hurriedly, my mind reverting to l'affaire Sheila.

"Only what all Paris and all London knows, that is quite enough."

I felt relieved, and smiled at him serenely.

"Paris knows much about us all, mon cher," I whispered, "so long as it doesn't tell, what does it matter? The Duke is no better and no worse than other men. Come, you are jealous, that is all."

He made no answer, but left me with a formal bow. His hints anent the painter's possible fascination for Belinda disturbed me much more than his diatribes against the Duke. Hervé, as I had cause to know, was a dangerously charming man. Belinda, with that obstinacy peculiar to herself, was quite likely to fall a victim to that charm, if for no other reason than to oppose me.

I regretted my promise to call at the Rue Royale the next day, and decided it should be our first and only visit. One sitting, I reflected, could do no harm. I would not leave Belinda for an instant.

The next day was a memorable one. Paris was keeping holiday, a fête des fleurs drew everybody to the Bois. There was to be at half-past three that afternoon a procession of carriages—equipments of all kinds—decked with the favourite flowers of their fair owners. There was considerable rivalry among the great Parisian ladies in the matter of this procession. Thousands of francs were lavished on the purchase of violets, lilies, orchids—the blooms of a day—in which to smother their carriages and coachmen.

Belinda was excited at the prospect of seeing the procession. We were to drive with the Marquise in a landau decorated with carnations, pink, and red, and white.

Our gowns were designed in harmony with the colours—Belinda in a rose-coloured cloth, with finely chased silver and turquoise buttons, looked most distinguished.

We arrived at Hervé's studio a little after two. It was a magnificent apartment, the floor of stained oak was covered with leopard and tiger skins, seductive looking divans were stretched against the walls, masses of hot-house flowers filled the air with sweetness, works of art of priceless value ranged themselves before you. Statues, gorgeous tapestries silver and gold flagons that had graced the hall of some mediæval baron, sketches signed by names of European repute, Venetian mirrors in curiously wrought metal frames. Everywhere luxury, elegance, ease.

Hervé at work in his studio was a silent, almost stern man. Quite different from the Prince Charming of the Paris salons. His face was tense as he stood before his easel, his eyes large, brown, limpid, grew luminous as with swift, masterly strokes, he reproduced Belinda's face on canvas. As for soft speeches or tender looks, they did not exist for him that afternoon. He was possessed by the demon of work, and save for a few short sharp directions to his model, hardly spoke.

Belinda made no demur, but submitted to his orders obedient and willing as a child.

Just after three Paul de Sonnaz made his appearance.

He declared Hervé must throw down his brushes on the instant, and insisting on our all adjourning to the front of the house, as there was something "outside" likely to surprise us. Immediately before the house, the centre of an admiring crowd, was Paul's dogcart, drawn by a mare, by name Kitty, a beautiful, high-spirited creature, capricious and wilful as Belinda herself. The dogcart was a mass of roses, rich red, damask, delicate pale pink, soft, velvety white. I have never seen anything more tasteful or more lavish. The cart was a moving bouquet. Kitty, with a bunch of roses coquettishly stuck in her mane, looked wicked but handsome.

"I'm glad you like it," said Paul, delighted at Belinda's enthusiasm. "It was Hervé's idea, he and I discussed it this morning. You've no objection to my driving Miss North, Lady Peggy? I'll take good care of her."

A few minutes later they had driven off. Hervé following on his bay, while I returned to the Hotel D'Auteuil to join the Marquise.

It was a perfect day, a day of brilliant sunshine in which Paris looked her best. In the best of spirits we drove to the Bois and joined the procession. The dogcart was immediately in front of our landau. Belinda caused a sensation from the moment she joined the long line of carriages which moved slowly up and down the Avenue, two on each side of the row of gendarmes, going in contrary directions.

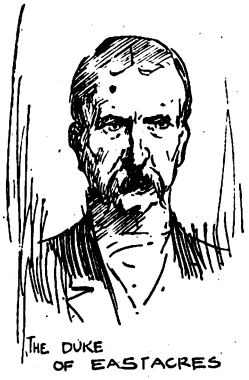
The beauty of the girl, her exquisite rose costume, the handsome cart, more artistically decked than any of the others, exhaling the costly odour of hundreds of drooping roses, aroused the utmost enthusiasm from the carriages nearest to theirs, and from the thousands of spectators who lined the footpaths. Some of the people climbed on chairs, and commented audibly upon her beauty, others crowded forward, and a perfect fusilade of flowers, lilies and violets, carnations and almond blossoms fell upon her.

Leaving the Bois we turned in the direction of the Hotel D'Auteuil, the dogcart preceding the landau. Crossing the Rue de la Concorde, Belinda dropped a rose, instantly Paul de Sonnaz was on his feet, he jumped to the ground, and, stooping, picked up the blossom. Belinda had taken the reins as they fell from Paul, and the mare, immediately realising that a slighter hand controlled her, grew restive, not to say skittish, threw up her head and fairly bolted.

Paul rushed after the cart, the landau of the Marquise followed suit. We strained our eyes to follow Belinda's slender, girlish figure seated erect, grasping the reins steadily, firmly.

"If she keeps cool she'll master the mare yet," gasped Paul, as he swung on to the landau. "She knows how to drive, and Kitty hasn't a bit of vice in her."

All the same we shouted to our coachman to urge his horses to the utmost speed. We rushed along at a frantic rate, but still the cart forged well ahead, the rose-coloured figure of Belinda



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

Digitized by Google

swaying with the motion. As she neared the Pont de la Concorde the mare lowered her head, and, swerving to one side, dashed down the Quai D'Orsay.

Gradually Belinda was getting the mastery of her, when, as they turned the corner, a steam-tram gave vent to an unearthly screech. The mare reared, plunged and reared again, nearly falling backwards. Belinda cut her smartly with the whip, but, with a movement of the head, she got the bit between her teeth, and bolted for all she was worth.

At that moment there flashed past us a man on a tall grey horse.

"Thank God!" cried Paul, "it's Hervé. She'll be saved! Alphonse will overtake her."

Suddenly, his white face working with emotion, Paul pointed to where, at the end of the street down which the dogcart was flying, a monster steam-roller was crushing the stones used to pave the road. The gendarme regulating the traffic obliged all vehicles to pass in single file. Another two or three seconds and the dogcart would near the stream of waiting traffic—would crash into the nearest carriage, and then!

It seemed as if nothing could arrest the catastrophe. Already in imagination I saw the cart dashed to pieces, Belinda's form outstretched upon the ground. And then, just as all hope was over, Hervé by a frantic effort brought the grey level with the dogcart. Rising in his stirrups he clutched the mare as she dashed past and hung with all his strength and the risk of his life, on to her bridle. The mare thus checked paused in her headlong career—the bystanders rushed to give assistance. The crisis was over. Belinda was saved.

"I owe my life to you, Monsieur," she said, giving her hand to Hervé, as they stood upon the footpath. "You risked yours for me. So great so wonderful a life for mine."

Her eyes glistened, her face was flushed, she trembled.

He was a great artist, a perfect lover, and the handsomest man in Paris—and he had lost his heart to this young girl! I wondered, would she give him hers, or would she still keep faith with David, the far distant engineer.

Belinda's narrow escape was but the first of a chain of startling incidents in which Hervé played a prominent part. From that day he was Belinda's shadow, as persistent as patient a shadow as the Duke himself.

On one occasion he invited us to luncheon in his grounds. It was to be an al fresco entertainment, and the Barrone de Choiseul insisted that the woman should go dressed in peasant costume, with bare feet, short skirts and high white caps à la Normandie. It was a picturesque scene. In one part of the grounds there were wooden booths such as are erected in Paris during Carnival time, fitted with dainty trifles in the way of sweetmeats, bric-a-brac and jewellery.

Belinda sold gold-tipped cigarettes for roses. She was smothered with blossoms, and her stall was cleared in twenty minutes. Such a fête could only take place in Paris. To attempt a similar entertainment in London would be to court failure, not to say ridicule.

Events had moved very quickly since we came to Paris, Of Hervé's infatuation there could be no doubt, what puzzled me was whether or no Belinda returned it. Until I was sure of that I judged it better not to interfere.

Hervé was idolised by most women—no one yet had resisted his charm. It remained to be seen whether or no Belinda would prove an exception to her sex.

The proof came unexpectedly. One evening after we had returned from a dull play at the Théâtre Français, Belind arushed into the salon. The Marquise turned, a slightly vexed expression on her face.

"My dear, what is the matter?" she inquired.

Belinda, without pausing to reply, came up to me.

"Quick, quick, Lady Peggy," she cried. "There's no time to lose. You must come at once. The Duke and Hervé are about to fight—to fight, I tell you, in the studio. Alphonse can't shoot a bit. And, and"—she paused—"what shall I do?" she gasped. "What can I do? The Duke will kill him, and—I cannot bear it!"

(A further splendid instalment appears next Tuesday.)

YOUR EDITOR CHATS.

Last week I promised that I would tell you the true story of the way in which one of the tales in the Christmas Number came to be written, and of the manner in which payment for it kept a home together.

The tale was entitled "The Story of Esther," and the nom de plume of the writer was "Orme Lewis." The circumstances are as follows:

Among the manuscripts which I was reading one night a few weeks ago I came across one on very soiled paper and written with obviously watered ink. It was a pathetic story, altogether too melancholy for use in a bright little paper like Short Stories, but I was struck with the depth of emotion expressed in the story, which, in simple language, told of the struggles of a wife to keep a home together while her husband was stricken down with a lingering illness. It seemed as though the writer of the story had actually experienced those feelings of absolute despair that were expressed by the chief character in the narrative, and I put the story aside. The next day I wrote a letter to the author expressing my regret that I was unable to make use of that particular story, but saying that I should not only like to see another story of a more cheerful description, but that I should be willing to give some advice if the writer cared to call. The writer did not call, but promised to send another story within a few days. The manuscript arrived, and was entitled "The Story of Esther." After reading it I at once accepted it and sent a cheque in payment. A few days later I received the following letter:

Dear Sir,

I enclose a formal receipt for the cheque which you sent me in payment for my manuscript, "The Story of Esther." I don't mind telling you now something that I would not tell you before, lest you should be influenced in my favour in your decision regarding the story.

Three months ago my husband was taken seriously ill, and remained in bed for nearly four weeks. After that the doctor said that it was absolutely necessary that he should go away for a change of air to the south coast or he would be certain to have a relapse. He had to go, but as we had only a few pounds in the bank, our funds were soon exhausted. The firm at which my husband was employed refused to pay him any money while he was ill, and, of course, there was nothing coming into the house. At the end of a mont my husband came home, and the shock of finding that I had been obliged to sell a lot of our household effects in order to help to pay for his change of air so unnerved him that he again became prostrate. I got some needlework to do, and with the few shillings I received I managed to keep the little home together, but I had to run into debt.

Last Christmas we had a happy time, for my husband was then earning £4 a week, and my little boy was in the best of health. The outlook for this Christmas was indeed desolate—my husband was earning no money, my little boy had grown thin and pale owing to want of nourishing food, and we were in debt.

One day I received a letter from our landlord which said that unless his rent were paid up-to-date he would have to put in the brokers. That night, while my husband and little boy had fallen asleep, I sat at a table and wrote down on paper the whole story of our struggles. It did me good to open my heart, and when I had finished I crept into bed and cried myself to sleep. The next morning I found the manuscript, and a thought flashed through my mind that I might be able to sell it, and I sent it on to you. Well, you know the result.

Although it was not accepted, you asked me to write another, which I did with a light heart; and the cheque which I received not only paid the landlord what was owing to him, but enabled me to get good food for my husband. I am now going to write more stories, which I hope you will accept. But I am too proud to live on charity, and I am sure that your decision with regard to my stories will not be in any way influenced by what I have told you.

Yours very gratefully,
Orme Lewis.

You will perhaps wonder why I think fit to tell you a story of this sort. My reason for doing so is to let you know that all the stories you read, however bright they may be, are not written under such comfortable circumstances as you would imagine.

After reading this, I am sure that you will feel additional interest in the tales which appear in Short Stories, especially those to which the name "Orme Lewis" is appended.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

FOR HER SAKE.

The Story of the Week. See our Coloured Cover.

Midnight was booming slowly out from the clock over the stables at Hamdon Hall, when a figure stole out of the side gate of the park and turned into the lane skirting its western side. The figure was that of a woman wrapped from head to foot in a long cloak, which effectively concealed her form, but did not hide a stoop which might have been caused by age. Keeping close under the hedge she glided swiftly in the direction of the churchyard that lay a quarter of a mile or so along the lane. A pale moon shone fitfully through the clouds, and wavering shadows fell across the low-lying meadows beyond the churchyard and made strange shapes of the gravestones within its borders. Round the lych-gate the shadows lay deepest, and here the hurrying figure paused to look right and left with anxious glances, peering oftenest of all into the darkness made by the lych-gate itself.

"Are you there?" The words were breathed at last in trembling accents. "Are you there, Hal? Come out, dear, it's safe, and I—I've got what you wanted."

The voice sank to a whisper, but that whisper had been heard. From the place of deepest shadow, a man's form stepped quickly, and crossed the road to where that other figure waited under the hedge.

"How much?" he asked roughly, in a hoarse undertone.

"I—I'm not sure; I think it's fifty," said the trembling woman's voice, and a hand was outstretched from the enveloping cloak, holding out to the man a packet, which he eagerly seized.

"Fifty?" There was a note of dissatisfaction in his tone. "Well—it can't be helped. Wouldn't he give more?"

"He—he—Oh, Hal, I could not ask him," the woman's voice faltered and broke. "I—he does not know—I mean—I have got it for you, and indeed it is all I can get. I——"

Her words ended in a choking sob; she drew nearer to the man, laying a trembling hand upon his arm.

"Oh, all right, it must do—there, there, don't cry, that's a dear soul. I can't stand tears. Kiss me, and let me be off; I must be some way from here by daybreak. I've expected you since ten o'clock."

"I know, dear, I know, but I could not get away; and O, Hal, promise me, promise that now you will begin afresh—will turn over a——"

"For Heaven's sake don't preach, and don't cry either," he added hastily, as she uttered another choking sob. "Good-bye, and cheer up. Perhaps I'm not so black as they paint me?" Stooping, he kissed the white face uplifted to his in the moonlight, and before she could utter another syllable, he had turned away and plunged once more into the shadows of the churchyard.

The woman walked slowly back by the way she had come, re-entering the park by the side gate into the lane, and as she went, she murmured brokenly over and over again:

"May God forgive me! May God forgive me! He alone knows my temptation; it is only He who can understand—can understand."

And with a pitiful moan she disappeared amongst the trees of the park and was lost to sight, but not before a sharp pair of eyes had noted that strange coming and going.

* * * * *

Mildred Henley, the pretty young nursery governess of Hamdon Hall, went slowly down the great drive on a misty October afternoon, singing softly to herself as she went. She was very happy; life seemed just then a pleasant pathway! Nothing, it seemed to her, could be more ideal than the arrangement which had been made possible by Squire Hamdon's kindness, an arrangement by which she lived with her parents in the small white house within the boundaries of the park, and went daily to teach and amuse the children at the Hall.

The loss of much of her father's money two years before had made work for Mildred imperative, and at first she had come to and fro to the Hall from Middlewich, the nearest town. But when the White House—as it was called—fell vacant, Squire Hamdon offered it to Mr. Henley at an absurdly low rent, and Mildred's joy over the arrangement had amply repaid the kindly Squire for his act of thoughtfulness.

Mildred's happy little song was brought to an abrupt conclusion on that October afternoon by the apparition in her path of a tall, stalwart young man, who looked down on her with laughing, love-lit eyes, saying "Well met, sweetheart; I walked up to escort you home."

"O, Jack, how lovely of you—there is heaps to tell you, and, no, you mustn't be silly any more!" And she drew herself out of his arms, lifting a rosy, laughing face, which he promptly kissed again before they resumed their way talking the happy, foolish lover's talk, which only lovers understand.

Presently, as they drew near to the place where the White House became visible through the trees, Jack said abruptly: "Mildred, darling, I hate to bring up worrying subjects, but is he keeping away just now?"

The girl's face turned white, her grip on her lover's arm tightened.

"Oh!" she cried, "don't let's talk of him to-night. He—he——" The eyes that met Frank's were wide and frightened. "I—I don't want to think of him to-night," and she shivered a little.

"Very well," was the grave answer, "but—look here, Mildred, you and I are to be husband and wife, so soon to be husband and wife, dear, with no secrets between us" (did she shiver again?) "promise that you will tell me if he comes to worry you again."

"I"—she hesitated perceptibly, and looked half-nervously about her—"I promise to tell you when he comes again," she said mechanically, and as if the words were dragged from her, and once more a shiver ran through her slight frame.

"That's right, sweetheart," Jack Denison's hearty voice had a cheering ring in it, "we must share all our troubles now, and never hide anything from each other."

"No—never hide anything from each other," she repeated, and there was still that mechanical note in her voice. "Ah! come in Jack, dear, out of the shadows, and let us—let us forget everything but that we belong to each other, and that we are to be married in a month!"

The change in her tone was so sudden, such a curious forced cheerfulness sounded in it, that Jack drew her once more into his arms.

"What is the matter?" he said, looking long and earnestly into her pretty white face. "You are not in trouble, dear? You have nothing on your mind?"

A vivid flush sprang over her face. "On my mind? What nonsense!" She drew herself out of his embrace. "How could I have anything on my mind? The Hamdons are good to me. I love the children, and I am to marry you in a month." And, with a laugh, she broke from him, and ran into the house, whither he followed her.

Digitized by Google

The room they entered was cosy and home-like in a marked degree. A small fire burnt in the grate, and in an arm-chair beside it sat a venerable old man—Mildred's father, whose face lighted up at his daughter's entrance. By the table on which a lamp burnt brightly, sat a harassed-looking elderly woman, intent on some needlework. There was a careworn expression about her eyes and mouth, and the smile which greeted Mildred was a sad one, and at sight of the man's form behind the girl Mrs. Henley started violently, and her hands twitched nervously.

"Why!" she began shakily—then as her future son-in-law emerged into the light, she said with evident relief, "Oh! it is you, Jack! I might have guessed that."

"Yes, you might have guessed it," he answered gaily; but there was pity in the glance he threw at her careworn face. "Who but I would be likely to turn up in this promiscuous fashion?"

Though he spoke carelessly, his eyes scanned the face before him closely, and he noted that Mrs. Henley winced and grew pale.

"Nobody, my dear boy, nobody but you," Mr. Henley's hearty voice chimed in; "and now you are here, sit down and tell us the news from Middlewich."

Jack was the son and partner of a rising doctor of that town, and he always stored up little tit-bits of gossip for his prospective father-in-law, with whom also he was wont to discuss topics of the day, whilst sitting by the fire in such a position as to watch the sweet face of his betrothed, and to hear her soft voice when she either joined in the talk or spoke in undertones to her mother regarding some of the pile of needlework that of late had occupied both women's busy fingers.

"I am not very rich," Mildred said to him once, half-wistfully, half-playfully, "but I mean to come to you well endowed with clothes, and mother and I are as busy as bees making them all. You shall not have an ill-dressed wife, dear!"

It was a happy picture of family life in the White House that evening, and to a man who stood outside, shivering in the October mists, but peeping into the room through a chink in the shutters, it brought a great wave of bitter regret.

He could not have told anyone how long he stood there, his face pressed against the panes, watching how the lamplight played upon the white head of the old man by the fire, gleamed golden on Mildred's soft curls, threw into relief the anxious face of Mildred's mother, whilst it lighted up the strong features of Jack Denison.

"All happy," the man outside muttered as he turned away. "God knows why I came back to-night. I am a fool for my pains, of course. I could have got clear away with that fifty she gave me, but——" he shrugged his shoulders, and laughed a trifle hardly, "men like me are always fools. I had to come and look at them again. They in the light—I in the shadow. Ah well!" He shrugged his shoulders and slouched away, neither seeing nor hearing a man who crouched against the wall of the house behind a bush—watching his every movement; a man who never stirred until he had long vanished from the scene and who then rose slowly and stiffly from his hiding place and walked quickly away, murmuring to himself with a contented chuckle: "If I don't pull off the trick, my name's not Henry Simmonds! The thing's as plain as a pikestaff and if I can finish the job as neatly as I've begun it, I ought to get something for my pains. The chap gave the show away when he talked out loud about that fifty!"

At the Hall on that same afternoon a strange conversation took place between Squire Hamdon and his wife; he, pacing up and down her boudoir in a dumb fury of indignation, she remonstrating, pleading, urging him—in vain.

"Maurice," she said at last, "I cannot bear it; there must be some explanation. Let me ask her! Let me talk to her about it—before——"

"No, I refuse absolutely," the Squire replied. "I have been more than good to these people and this is my reward. I refuse to do anything but let the law take its course. The thing is proved up to the hilt."

"But are you sure, dear? Are you certain?"

"Of course I am sure. There is no manner of doubt. I tell you the proofs are overwhelming. Once for all—my mind is made up—the law must take its course."

* * * * * *

Jack had returned to Middlewich directly after the six o'clock tea which at the White House formed the chief evening meal, and the little house party settled down to their usual pursuits, Mildred amusing her father and mother with gay little stories of the quaint sayings and doings of her small pupils.

Mrs. Henley and she were sewing busily the while, and who can say how many tender dreams and loving thoughts were woven into the dainty garments the girl's hands fashioned. Through everything ran the golden thread of joy,

"Jack loves me; in a month I shall be his wife!"

Just as the grandfather clock in the hall struck eight a loud ring at the bell startled the inmates of the White House, and when a moment later the servant appeared at the sitting-room door, with scared face, and the words:

"Please, sir, please, ma'am, the policeman—he——" Mr. Henley sprang to his feet saying:

"What on earth does the man want at this time of night? I'll go and speak to him."

"I'll step in, sir, if I may," came a gruff voice from the doorway, "and I'm sorry to trouble you, but a warrant's a warrant, and bound to be carried out early or late, and——"

"A warrant!" The old man gazed blankly into the policeman's impassive countenance.

"Yes, sir; you'll excuse me for interrupting you, but"—the man crossed the room and suddenly laid a hand on Mildred's shoulder—"I arrest you, miss, on a charge of stealing fifty pounds' worth of banknotes from your employer, Mr. Hamdon."

Mildred's face grew positively deathlike; her eyes looked up at the policeman with an expression of mute amazement that staggered the man of the law. Mrs. Henley uttered a low scream of horror, and sank back in her chair, seeming to grow all at once pathetically small and shrunken.

"My God!" she ejaculated under her breath, "my God!"

Mr. Henley stood behind her, his face rigid with horror.

"This is monstrous!" he said at last, with shaking voice. "My daughter accused of crime? Are you mad?"

"No, sir," the man said respectfully; "but 'tis only fair you should know the facts. There was a bundle of notes on Mrs. Hamdon's writing-table in the morning-room a week ago, and nobody went into that room except Mrs. Hamdon herself and this young lady"—the hand on Mildred's shoulder pressed more heavily. "After Miss Henley left, the notes were missed, and I don't suppose she can deny as she paid the butcher's bill in Middlewich two days ago with a five-pound note—one of the missing ones," he added significantly.

"Ah—h!" The cry came from Mrs. Henley, who half rose from her chair, then dropped into it again in a half-fainting condition, moaning softly.

Mildred wrenched herself away from the detaining hand that gripped her, turning towards the policeman, her eyes flaming angrily.

Digitized by Google

"How——" she began; then all at once her voice faltered, broke, stopped entirely. Her eyes left the man's face, and travelled first to her father's—bewildered and outraged; next to her mother's—white, drawn, anguish-stricken, with eyes that met hers in agonised appeal, and then dropped to the ground, whilst the colour swept over her face, and ebbing quickly, left it ashen white.

"I—I," the girl's voice seemed choked; she put her hand to her throat with a convulsive gesture. "You need—not—be afraid—I—shall not resist you." There was a pause between each word. "I—will—go—with you—quietly—I—confess—my—guilt."

* * * * *

"Does the prisoner at the bar plead guilty or not guilty?"

"Guilty, my lord."

Every face in the crowded Court-house at Middlewich flashed round towards the dock, where Mildred Henley stood, her face drawn and white, her eyes fixed upon the blank wall above the judge's head.

A murmur ran round the Court, quickly suppressed by a frown from the judge, and a strange and ominous silence followed those three words—"Guilty, my lord."

A man seated a few paces away from the place where the prisoner stood dropped his head on his hands with a groan. It was Jack Denison, and to him, as to many others in the packed building, those words had come as a fresh and terrible blow. And yet even now, as his own sober reflection told him, he ought to have expected nothing else!

Mildred had never for an instant wavered in her declaration of guilt, nor had she allowed her agonised father or her distracted lover to provide counsel for her defence, or try to improve matters by pleading extenuating circumstances.

"I cannot say either more or less," she had repeated over and over again with sad firmness when these two who loved her visited her in the county gaol, "I plead guilty, I accept the consequences, I will bear the punishment." And though her lips had quivered pitifully over the last words, though the agony in Jack's eyes had made her stretch out her hands to him with a yearning, appealing gesture, she had not yielded to his supplications.

"I will not allow father and you to have the expense of a useless defence," she said. "I plead guilty; let me be spared the misery of a long trial. I plead guilty."

It had been her cry throughout, and now the day had come when before the crowded court, in sight of all her little world, she once more declared herself guilty of the crime of theft.

"Best thing she could 'a' done," one constable whispered to another. "She'll maybe get a lighter sentence than if she'd brazened it out, and the proofs against her were overwhelming."

If the silence that followed the prisoner's avowal of guilt seemed long to those who sat and watched her, what did it seem to the girl herself, who stood, the silent recipient of all those curious, unfriendly glances.

The torture of the moments that dragged by like centuries was well-nigh unbearable—a great longing to cover her face, to shrink back into some dark hiding-place, never to see another human being again overwhelmed her. She caught her breath, and her hands groped out to the rail in front of her, and gripped it fiercely.

All the faces before her seemed to run together into a dazzling flash of whiteness, and then to waver up and down sickeningly. A great blackness began to wrap her round, a thick mist came before her eyes, and very far away out of the mist she was suddenly aware of a grave judicial voice pronouncing her sentence. She swayed a little where she stood, trying to collect her forces sufficiently to take in what the judge was saying, when, all at once, a shrill woman's voice broke in upon those grave tones—a thin, high voice, that went wailing through the Court, and penetrated the thick darkness with which Mildred felt herself surrounded.

"I cannot do it!" the voice wailed out. "I cannot let her be punished for my sake. I am guilty—not my daughter. I am guilty—I stole the notes!"

The hurried attempt to restore order failed completely as these last words were uttered. A storm of sound broke over the crowd, and the flash of faces turned towards the place where the mother of the prisoner stood, her arms outstretched towards the judge, the tears raining down her careworn face.

"I stole the notes," she repeated, in a firm voice, and then her strength seemed to fail her, and with a cry she sank down in a crumpled heap at her husband's feet.

The sequel is soon told. Mrs. Henley's tardy confession, prompted by horror at hearing sentence pronounced upon her daughter, was proved to be a true one.

It transpired that a ne'er-do-well son—Hal by name—had for years preyed upon his poor parents and upon his sister, draining upon their resources, and rendering their lives a burden by his constant escapades, and worse than escapades.

A sudden demand from him for money had driven his mother to the verge of distraction. No longer daring to ask his father to help him, hiding the matter even from Mildred, Mrs. Henley had determined to try and raise the money herself and had planned a visit to the Squire to negotiate a loan. Passing the morning-room window, which opened upon the terrace at the Hall, she had glanced into the empty room, and seeing the bundle of notes on the writing-table had been seized by a terrible temptation, and, for the sake of her idolised son, had stolen the whole packet.

And then, as often so strangely happens, she had attracted suspicion to Mildred by unwittingly substituting a note she had in the house for one of those out of the bundle, whilst giving the latter to her daughter to pay the household books.

In the dead of night she had given the stolen notes to her son, and had crept home again, unaware that her movements were watched by the shrewd constable, Henry Simmonds, who mistook her for Mildred.

The poor lady never paid the penalty of her misdeeds; the anxiety, the shock, and the final effort of confession, proved too much for an already weakened frame, and she sank to rest two days after that terrible scene in the Court-house.

"And did you guess who had really taken the money?" Jack Denison asked his wife long months afterwards, when she had partially recovered from the strain she had undergone.

"Yes," she said simply. "It all flashed upon me as the policeman laid his hand on my arm, and said—'I arrest you.' I seemed to understand it then, and my mind was made up at once. Just for one mad moment I almost flamed out at him in the hot indignation of innocence, then I knew what I must do, and I did it. I pleaded guilty, dear, because I knew it was the only thing I could do to draw away all suspicion from my poor mother. I did it—For Her Sake."

L. G. Moberly.

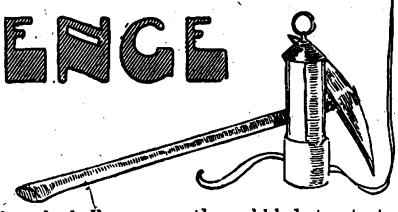
Rather Overdid It.

SHE: "You remember what you promised before we were married? You said you would make every effort to make yourself worthy of me." HE: "Yes; and the result was that I overdid it, and made myself better than you deserve."

Digitized by Google

A FATAL REVENGE

THE TALE OF A FIGHT.



It was Sunday afternoon. The sound of church bells ringing was wafted across the still air and fell as if in gentle reproach upon the ears of four men. They were sentinels, and each stood upon the summit of a little promontory, and eagerly scanned the surrounding country, as if fearful of the approach of some dreaded invaders.

Meanwhile, down in a little valley below them, was raging a dreadful fight. First one side was getting the better of the fray, and then the other. The ever varying issues of the struggle were made known to the four sentries by the low, suppressed cries from the adherents of the different parties which continually rent the air.

Ever and anon a messenger would leave the struggling, shouting mass below, and run swiftly to the sentries, going from one to the other with anxious inquiries, and admonishing them afresh to keep a vigorous outlook.

Yet this was no historic battlefield. The scene of all this anxiety and commotion was a retired bit of rugged waste land in the suburbs of Durham. The sentries were four ragged lads; the dreaded invaders, the police; the terrible battle was between two men.

There they stood, bruised and bleeding, their seconds at their sides, and a crowd of unassorted roughs cheering them on to further blows.

Both men seemed played out. Yet one had evidently the mastery. This was Jim Mulligan. The other, half blinded with the blood that poured from his eyes and nose, his face terribly swollen, and already half dead, was Bill Ganger.

Hanging about the outskirts of the crowd, as if longing to learn how the struggle was going, yet daring not to look upon the mutilated countenance of his son, was Bob Ganger, the father of the worsted combatant. Groaning to himself he wandered up and down, his hands before his face, for he loved his blackguard son more dearly than his life. He would willingly have rushed in and thrust himself between his offspring and the sledge-hammer blows of the powerful Jim. Yet he knew the attempt would be in vain.

The rabble crowd, revelling in the sight of blood and the heavy thud of the blows as they fell thick and furious, would permit no interruption.

Three minutes more and "Cad" Ganger, as he was called among his fellow roughs, fell heavily to the ground. But even as he staggered and received the last cruel blow which felled him he showed no signs of the agonies he must have been suffering. His whole mind was overflowing with one thought, an intense, unquenchable hatred for the man who now stood over him—his victor.

At the moment when Bill Ganger fell there was a suppressed yet distinct shout from one of the sentries, "Coppers!" The word was passed with amazing celerity from mouth to mouth, and in three minutes' time the evil mass of dilapidated human beings had melted away.

Upon the deserted piece of common land Bill Ganger was still stretched at full length. He was groaning piteously—but not from pain. It was his rage and disappointment that overmastered him. He lay there biting the dust with his teeth, and tearing up the grass by handfuls. He rolled from side to side reviling his antagonist, and blaspheming in a way which made his poor old father tremble as he stooped over his prostrate form.

Evidently the alarm of "police" had been a false one, for no one appeared to interrupt the ravings of the conquered man.

Presently he staggered to his feet. Without a word he leant upon his father's arm, and turned away from the scene of the fray towards the little barrow in which their faithful Jenny was patiently standing. For many miles they rattled over the cobbled streets towards their living place amongst the gloomy slums.

Little had old Bob imagined when he had set out that morning, with his son at his side and Jim Mulligan laughing and cracking jokes as his long legs dangled out from behind the little coster cart, what the two desperate men took the trip for, and why they had growled at him when he had declared his intention of going on the "spree" with them.

Now he saw it all. Presently he turned sententiously to Bill. "What did ye want to fight 'im for? Yers bin fooling around his gal agin. Didn't I toll yer to chuck that? She don't care for you and she do for Jim, so what's the good of busting yerself?"

"'E's done me this time," growled Bill, "but we ain't through yet. Not by a long chalk. S'elp me, I'll have his life yet, yer see if I don't." And the battered, bleeding giant relapsed once more into stolid silence.

The threat was an evil one, but Bill meant what he said.

The next morning broke dull and cheerless. Bill Ganger's state of mind had not improved. All the night he had tossed about, for the throbbing of his bandaged head had driven all sleep far from him. When he roused himself to tramp with his father to the neighbouring mines, he was still turning over in his mind the easiest method of avenging himself for his double defeat both in love and with the fists.

Jim was working at the same pit as themselves, which fact made the old father Ganger tremble for the man's safety. How would the two work side by side? he vaguely wondered, as he and Bill trudged slowly along with their pickaxes thrown over their shoulders.

Presently they arrived at the mouth of the shaft. They stepped into the bucket, and were lowered at a terrific rate into the darkness of the subterranean world.

A dreadful fight was raging in the valley, the ever varying issues being made known by the cries of the spectators.

Digitized by Google

Much to Bob Ganger's relief the day passed by quietly enough. The two rivals scowled at one another, but neither uttered a word.

Yet old Ganger saw enough in his son's face to show that his threat had not been forgotten. The fiery hatred was still burning within his heart.

Many years before Bill Ganger had loved a lass that lived in the same street as they did. Then Mulligan had come into those parts, and got before him in the race. He had stepped quietly in and asked the girl to become his wife, and poor Bill Ganger had been left out in the cold.

Ever since that time the two men had hated one another with a loathing which had culminated in the pre-arranged fight on that Sunday afternoon.

The time for knocking off work had now come round, and all the men engaged in that stage of the mine had already been hoisted up.

Around the foot of the shaft there stood in a group father and son Ganger, and Jim Mulligan. The lamps fixed on to their miner's hats threw a weird and flickering light upon the three men.

Suddenly they heard the bucket rapidly descending. With a jerk it came to a standstill within two feet of the ground. Bill Ganger sprang inside. "Come, Jim," he called out, "get in sharp."

There was a wild look in Bill's eyes that scared old Ganger.

"Go up by yourself, boy," he called out. "I want Jim here for a moment." With an angry scowl Bill Ganger gave the signal to the man far away up top, and after fifty seconds of rapid ascent found himself once more in the fresh air.

As if moved by some sudden and wholly irresistible impulse, he turned round as he was on the point of leaving the office.

The man at the engine was waiting for the signal to lower. Another moment, and the bell rang sharply twice. Then the great iron bucket was dropped at a bewildering speed once more into the bowels of the earth for its last load that night.

With practised steady eye the old engineer was busy watching the huge cable unreel from the big conical drum before him. On either side of him were the two huge engines panting and puffing as if chafing at being used for such frivolous work.

With a fixed determined look in his eyes, he seized his father and leapt into the darkness.

Bill waited for a moment when the old man was stooping down over the machines. Then he stole swiftly past, and with his pickaxe hung on to his shoulder climbed down the slippery ladder which ran down the whole length of the shaft. When he had gone down some one hundred feet, he left the ladder and clambered on to a tiny ledge formed in the dripping sides of the shaft.

Was he in time for his purpose? He glanced at the cable. It was still now.

Evidently they were loading up below. So far so good.

Five minutes passed—ten minutes passed, and still there were no signs of the bucket being hauled up. Bold and desperate man that he was, he did not half like the delay.

It is one thing to commit a crime on the spur of the moment, and quite another to sit in a dark hole with drops of water dripping at slow intervals down the neck—waiting.

The natural rumblings of the pit seemed suddenly to have attained fresh meaning. At every noise the man started.

He felt a cold sweat breaking out over him. Would the cable never begin to go up again? The miserable man waited for what seemed to his strained nerves an eternity. Then he became too nervous to bear the suspense and solitude any longer. He made for the slimy ladder once again.

At that instant he caught the sound of the bell far away above. It rang sharply three times.

At the sound all his courage returned to him. Calling himself a coward, he stepped back, and took up his position once again.

Another second, and he saw, far below, the bucket coming up. Even looking such a long way down beneath him his eyes, accustomed to the flickering of the lamps, distinguished the burly form of his father, and by his side the slimmer figure of his enemy. He sighed a sigh of genuine relief as he noticed that his father was on the side of the bucket furthest removed from him. This was exactly what he had hoped for.

His black eyes gleamed with pleasure and hatred. Kneeling on both knees, his pickaxe tightly clasped in both hands, Bill Ganger leant over the shaft. The engines were running unusually slowly.

Had the two men who were being hauled up the shaft happened to glance upwards, they would both have been startled by the apparition.

The man, his face blackened by the dust, his hair streaming over his forehead, looked more like some fiend of darkness than a human being.

The cable was running faster now. He raised his weapon above him, fearing he should after all miss his prey.

As the two heads appeared just beneath him, Bill brought down the pickaxe with all his might. The blow was beautifully aimed.

Bill Ganger had his revenge!

As the bucket rushed upwards the victim was dragged by the axe on to the ledge, and Ganger, who had hauled with all his might to prevent himself being dragged forwards into the abyss, dropped to the ground, and the body fell with a sounding thud across him.

He glanced at the face as he scrambled to his feet. Then suddenly an awful cry broke the stillness of that black pit.

It was a scream of fearful and intense agony which no words could ever describe. The scream echoed strangely round and round the pit. A moment went by, and then, with another irrepressible burst of intense terror and affliction, the cry went up once more.

The body was not that of Jim Mulligan!

"Father! Father! Oh, speak to me," he cried in agony.

His cry was echoed and re-echoed again and again. Above him and far below he heard his words taken up and repeated as if by some mocking fiends. Yet no answer came.

At that moment he heard the cable running out again. He could not be found as he was. With a fixed determined glare in his fierce eyes he seized the mutilated body of his father. Then with another heart-rending scream he leapt with his terrible burden into the darkness.

P. L. Jones.

Digitized by Google

WON BY LOYALTY.

Telling of Some Stolen Jewels and a Lover's Test.

At that time I was engaged (and very pleased to be) to a most enigmatical young person. She spoke rarely and in a way always a little mysteriously, making voluntary secrets of a hundred little actions of life, and loving solitude in an alarming manner.

All this was off-set by eyes so beautiful, by a colouring so marvellous, by an expression so divine, that I had not the courage to reflect on the singularity of her character. I loved her, and I often passed hours of the night sitting before her door-step, simply dreaming "that she lived here," and meditating on her presence as does the believer on the transubstantiation.

I did not know, in the first place, whether she loved me or not; she always refused to answer that question, referring to the wishes of her parents and her confidence in their wisdom. If I insisted, she generally ended by saying "that she knew nothing about it, but that she felt no antipathy towards me, and that, according to her ideas, was enough to decide a young girl on marriage!" In vain I supplicated, in vain I tried to animate this enigmatical being; she remained as distant as the manner in which she loved, as unknown as she was dominating.

One evening as I was dreaming a little sadly of these things, a commotion was heard in the house. I returned to the salon, where everything was in disorder, my hosts were distressed, their friends embarrassed and troubled, and old Mme. Laroche horribly pale and trembling.

"What in the world has happened?" I asked. They explained incoherently that Mme. Laroche's diamonds were stolen—old family diamonds of great value. All the servants had been summoned into an adjoining room—in short, a formal search was to be instituted. An old gentleman, M. Coppé, had been unanimously selected to direct this investigation, just as I was entering, and his first proposition was that everyone should submit, or, rather, offer himself to be searched. Although the thing was rather offensive, no one protested, and it was decided that, after the servants, each person present should be examined.

To tell the truth, all this seemed of small importance beside my personal cares; and, with several others, I awaited the end of the adventure, while M. Coppé, his two witnesses and our host, began the inspection of the domestics.

Very soon I fell again into my meditation, my eyes fixed on the fireplace as though there were a fire, when suddenly I felt a light touch on my elbow. I raised my head with a start, to see my fiancée looking at me most beseechingly. We were alone near the fireside, and could talk in low tones without being overheard. She murmured very low:

"If you love me, arrange that they search you first; then try to be near me and, without being seen, try to conceal the object that I shall pass you from behind."

My blood ran cold. This annoying incident became terrible, filling me with the most passionate trouble. I looked at the girl in agony, but forced myself to smile, and whispered:

"It shall be as you wish!"

My knees trembled, my mouth was hot and dry. The feeling that overwhelmed me was inexpressible. It was a strange mingling of bitterness and pleasure, that my loved one should be weak to such a degree. I forced myself to have a sort of disdainful pity, and in reality love beat ardent, strong, stern in my breast. I understood, in a flash, how beauty could become divine above baseness of soul, and how one could respect it even in dishonour—and a hundred other things in which were confused fervent love, devotion without limit, a desire noble and perverse.

Jeanne had thanked me with hardly perceptible movement of the lips; she stood by the wall with an air of indifference and pride!

"They are very long about it," she said sternly. "M. Coppé is a man of method," someone replied. And a silence followed which told more and more on one's nerves, for even the waiting in a peaceful frame of mind finished by disturbing and emptying the brain, like a pump. However, the moment arrived when the searching of the servants ended, the door opened, disclosing our host, the two witnesses, and the old gentleman.

My heart beat furiously. I felt myself become terribly pale, but, concealing my agitation and steadying my voice, I asked to be searched first.

M. Coppé smiled at what he considered the whim of a young man, and proceeded methodically to my examination. I blushed, I became pale, without anyone finding that peculiar under the circumstances. When it was over, I made two or three steps backward and I found myself near Jeanne. She lowered her fan and handed me something with a coolness that was only equalled by my calmness in seizing the object and placing it in a pocket of my coat. After which I leant against the fireplace, being now merely a witness and above all suspicion.

M. Coppé's search was unproductive of results. There remained nothing to do but to visit all the rooms and then inform the police.

Still my trouble of mind increased as I remained standing by the fireplace. My brain was in a whirl, and I felt the crime weigh on me as though I were indeed the thief!

Jeanne at last came towards me, with that undulating step of hers, and gave me a look of such passionate gratitude that it almost seemed to scorch me. Then in an imperative low tone she said:

"Do you still love me?"

I did not hesitate. I replied firmly:

"Yes."

"In spite of all that I have done?"

"In spite of everything!"

"Will you marry me?"

"I will marry you."

She enveloped me with the same look, still warmer and more lingering. I fully comprehended the power of woman, above all law, human or natural, drawn from the fountain-head and against which nothing ought to prevail.

I felt strangely happy in this equivocal adventure, and I could not throw off this happiness for which I reproached myself and of which I was terribly ashamed.

As I was struggling with those contending emotions, exclamations were heard and I saw M. Coppé reappear holding a little box.

"We have the jewels and the guilty one!" he said very calmly.

I had only time to hear this much and to see the livid face of the valet—the guilty one—when I found that Jeanne was gently urging me out on to the terrace where the shadows lay thickly. There I felt my head seized with two hands, while two pure lips were pressed to mine, as Jeanne murmured:

"The thief adores you! She has tricked you! To test your love she gave you her own box!"

H. Smythe.

Digitized by Google

A REMARKABLE LETTER.

GIFT OF £50 FROM ONE READER TO THE REST.

Last week we received the following communication from an anonymous correspondent living in America:

DAYTON, OHIO, U.S.A.
NOVEMBER 25th, 1902.

DEAR EDITOR AND FRIEND,

IN February, 1894, I received from you a cheque for £10 as a prize in connection with a competition that ran in SHORT STORIES.

That £10 was the foundation of a fortune which I have now, thank God, accumulated. I was a single young man at the time, and could find no employment in England. So, with the help of the £10, I emigrated to America, and, after knocking about New York for a few months, found my way to Dayton. Here I started in the cycle business and, when the boom came in 1897 and 1898, I made a lot of money. This money I speculated with and have now turned into a fortune.

My reason for writing you is to express my gratitude to you for having offered the £10, and to say that I have now decided to give to the readers of SHORT STORIES, through the medium of your paper, five times this amount every year I am spared.

I therefore inclose you bills for two hundred and fifty dollars, and ask you to distribute these in five sums of £10 each amongst the readers of SHORT STORIES in a competition the nature of which I leave to yourself. All I ask is that the announcement may be made and the competition closed in time for the prize money to reach the winners during February, which is the month in which I received my first £10.

You are, of course, at liberty to publish this letter, but I do not append my name as I have no desire for notoriety, and simply make this offer out of pure gratitude in the hope that those who receive the £10 prizes will turn them to as good account as I was able to turn my £10.

Your Obedient Servant,

DAYTON.

This letter is certainly the most gratifying and remarkable one that I have received since SHORT STORIES started, and it gives me great pleasure to publish it. I have given the matter very careful consideration, and have arrived at the conclusion that, as my anonymous correspondent was in great want when he won his prize, the most satisfactory manner of distributing his gift of £50 would be to offer it to those who can give me the best reason for receiving it.

You may be wanting to emigrate to one of our Colonies. You may want £10 to buy something you have needed for a long time. You may want to clear off some small debts that have been worrying you. Or you may want to trade with the £10 and, like "Dayton," turn it into a fortune.

Whatever your reason for wanting it may be, write it down in the space below, and send it to "The Competition Editor of SHORT STORIES," Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "Dayton."

Readers may send as many reasons as they like, provided each is written on a separate coupon. Another coupon will appear next week.

CUT OUT THE COUPON HERE.

My reason for wanting £10 is.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

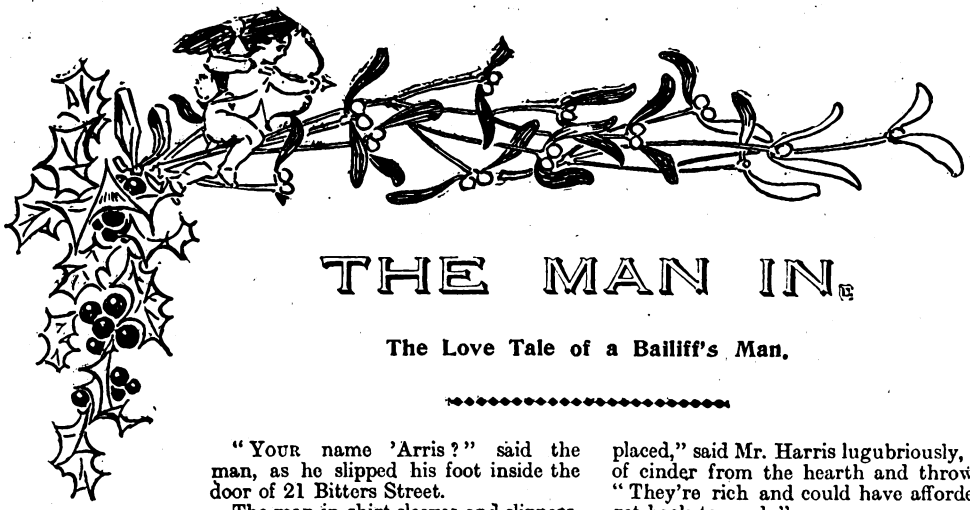
.....

.....

.....

Name..... Address.....

Digitized by Google



THE MAN IN.

The Love Tale of a Bailiff's Man.

"Your name 'Arris?" said the man, as he slipped his foot inside the door of 21 Bitters Street.

The man in shirt-sleeves and slippers, one of which had been unsparingly carved to accommodate a gouty foot, looked half-puzzled, half-alarmed, and nodded.

"Got a bit of trouble for you," said the first man, stepping on to the door-mat and drawing a long folded paper from his pocket.

Mr. Harris shut the door incontinently, and turned a trifle paler than he had been looking for the last few months, although that was manifest enough for his neighbours to have remarked it.

"Summons?" he interrogated laconically, as he nervously watched the visitor unfold the paper.

"Worse—worse. Distraint upon your goods and chattels for arrears of payment—seven—eighteen—six. Can you pay it?"

"Seven—eighteen! Distraint? And after I went and saw Mr. Street—er, the manager, and told him I was sorry I'd got backward with the payments, and would start again as soon as I was able to return to work, which I hoped to be able to do after Christmas; and he said it would no doubt be all right, and he'd see the boss for me and arrange to give me the time and the missus out too, and 'ill come home——"

"Can you pay?" repeated Mr. Harris, leaning against the wall for support. "How do they bring it up to that? The original debt was only seven pound, and I paid two-ten of that."

"Can't help it; there it is—seven—eighteen—six. The only question's—can you pay?"

"I've been out of work four months and more."

"Can you pay?"

"No," said Mr. Harris, resting on his sound foot, and looking wretchedly at the visitor.

The latter went to the door, opened it, put his head out and whistled to his man waiting outside.

"Come in," said the first visitor to the second, who closed the door behind him and looked at his victim indifferently.

The newcomer was a man about fifty, with a large ruddy nose, watery blue eyes, and a long, shaven upper-lip. He wore a frock coat and a hard felt hat, and linen wrist-bands which slipped down to his big knuckles whenever he dropped his arms to his sides. His black trousers were too long for his legs, and his boots creaked distressingly.

Twenty minutes after his entry he bade farewell to his bailiff from the front door-step, and, closing the door, returned to the front room, before the fire in which Mr. Harris was sitting nursing his suffering foot.

The man drew up a chair to the fire, with all the assurance of one in possession, and sat down.

For a long time there was silence.

"It ain't your fault you're here," said Mr. Harris at length, stirring the fire with an old stair-rod, which had been pressed into service as a poker. "So there ain't any reason why we shouldn't make you as easy as we can."

"That's a very sensible way of looking at it; it ain't no use raving and tearing my hair. Here I am and here I've got to stop until the money's paid or the goods cleared," responded the man stoically.

"But they must be stoney-hearted people to put in a bailiff two days before Christmas, seeing as how I told 'em just as how I was placed," said Mr. Harris lugubriously, picking up small pieces of cinder from the hearth and throwing them on the fire. "They're rich and could have afforded to wait until I could get back to work."

"They're rich, because they're wise," said the man sententiously. "And being wise they agree that people gen'ly have money about Christmas time and object to bailiffs joining the fam'ly circle. Consequently it's a good time to press for payment."

"But they know I haven't got the money," protested Mr. Harris angrily. "Eight pound! Where am I to get eight pound, and Christmas rent and rates coming along. Haven't earnt a penny since the end of July, and here I am with you in the house demanding eight pound by menace, as the saying is."

"And it looks to me," said the man, glancing round the room with the eye of a valuer, "that there'll be precious little left in the house when I'm gone. Things fetch very little by forced auction, for the auctioneer knows to a penny how much he's got to raise, and it don't matter if he has to sell the whole lot so long as he covers the debt and expenses. There's that sideboard there. Now I daresay you gave as much as three pound——"

"Three-fifteen not a couple of year ago," Mr. Harris interjected.

"Did you re'lly. Why, I've seen boards lot better than that knocked down for fifteen shillings scores of times. This table suits your purpose all right, I don't doubt; but it wouldn't fetch more than a crown."

Mr. Harris groaned inwardly.

"Any children?"

"Girl, eighteen, out at service," replied Mr. Harris absently, examining his pouch in a vain effort to find a few shreds of tobacco.

The act suggested to the man that his own pipe had long been cold. He drew it from his pocket, filled, lighted, and puffed at it with gusto.

"Couldn't your daughter lend you the money out of her savings?" he suggested, not appreciating the envious glances his victim turned on the smoking pipe.

"She's sent us all her savings already," Harris returned gruffly.

"Well," said the man, with an air of finality, as he stretched out his short legs and tilted his chair back, "the longer I'm here, the bigger the bill."

"What's that matter!" shouted Harris, banging the table with his clenched fist. "You can't sell us up twice!"

There was a footstep in the passage, and the door opened before Harris could rise from his chair.

He looked at the little woman who entered imploringly, and, hobbling round the table, whispered a few words in her ear.

Her face, which in her youth must have been very pretty grew pale as death; and she sank upon a chair near the door and burst into tears.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile the man, still with his chair tilted on its back legs, was smoking and gazing into the fire, a picture of apathy.

"It ain't any good your taking on like that, marm," he said, with mild conviction, glancing over the articles on the mantelshelf. "What is to be, is; the inevitable must be so, Christmas time or doomsday. I'm always sorry for people when they make me as comfortable as they can, and don't object to doing a few odd jobs by way of exercise. But I can't put up my hand and say, "Stand back, law, and let this party alone. Law is law, same for me as for you."

"He's right, Martha," said Harris soothingly. "It ain't any use crying. Come, now, come. Things are never so bad but what they might be worse."

"Very sensibly said," exclaimed the man, rising and shooting back his refractory wrist-bands. He might have added that when things are at their worst they're sure to turn round.

He did not intend to cast any personal reflection on himself, but it was not inappropriate that he wheeled about at that instant. He looked at Mrs. Harris and blinked. He looked again, watched her staunching her tears, and an expression of half-wonder, half-amazement, crossed his face. He wheeled round again quickly and poked the fire to hide his embarrassment the moment she looked at him.

It was a queer situation, good gracious! He'd been in some queer situations since he first took to the work, and had grown hardened to them. But this—this beat everything! There was no error in his mind; there couldn't be; Harris had called her Martha, and his own eyes had seen in her face the ghost of what had been, twenty—twenty years ago, the pretty face of Martha Hall! And here he was in their house—going to sell 'em up! He'd forgotten all about this old thirst for revenge, how he had hated her, who had "chosen a better man." Here he was in the "better man's" house, sitting on the "better man's" furniture by order of the Court, costing him money and food every day he remained? And Christmas coming! A fine old spectre at the feast he'd be, especially for her if she had really recognised him! Harris, of course, didn't know. Perhaps she'd tell him though—tell him that the man in—the man going to sell 'em up, was the man who had courted her only to be thrown away like a broken band-box the moment Harris had come along. He had never thought of such a situation, even when his hatred was most imaginative.

But it was uncomfortable. She had been a pretty girl! He remembered how she looked the day—aye, and there was still something of that in her face. It was an uncomfortable situation, when all was said and done. The people might have waited till after Christmas, hang it! To sell up a woman's home when her husband's been ill for four months and just about to be able to return to work, it might be business, but—— Still, there might be friends in the background who'd come up to the scratch. He didn't want anybody to say that he'd taken to the job on the mere chance of getting his own back after twenty years. He didn't like to see anybody's home broken up—wasn't natural he should. It was a horrible way of earning money—brokering. He wondered it had never struck him so before.

Suddenly he became aware that, by persistent poking, he had raked all the fire out of the grate. He looked round, expecting to find himself alone; but Mrs. Harris was still sitting by the door. Her hands were folded on her lap, and her eyes were blindly fixed on him. Seeing she did not appear to remember him, he permitted himself to examine her face more attentively, wondering whether it were not possible he was mistaken. And for some seconds they stared at each other in this manner.

"It is hard, isn't it, now?" she said, collecting her thoughts by a supreme mental effort, and looking at him sorrowfully. "I shall never survive it, if it comes to the worst. After twenty years' married life, and never a dark day until John fell ill, to be sold up a day or two off Christmas."

"It ain't my doing," he said, shamefacedly, "I'm only an instrument of torture. This is the last job of the kind I'll touch."

"Somehow I seem to know your face—you don't look a hard-hearted sort, either."

He stretched out his hands to reach the back of a chair. Somehow his hands, though nothing out of the common, always seemed to accentuate any awkwardness that happened to be perceptible to him. But, remembering the trick of his wristbands, he folded his arms behind his back, and, tilting himself on his heels, attentively regarded a grease-spot on the carpet.

"Don't say your name—your name's Walker?" said Mrs. Harris faintly.

"It's the hand of Fate, Mar—marm, the hand of Fate," he said, sighing profoundly, and, again forgetting his wristbands, nervously fingering a corner of the table-cloth.

"It's an ill-omen," she returned, as she rose weakly, and left the room.

He remained balanced on his heels and the corner of the mantel-shelf for some seconds. He'd have given something to have known what Mrs. Harris was saying to her husband in the back-room. He was not above listening, perhaps, but he wore creaking boots and the width of the room separated him from the door.

Harris brought him a cup of tea, and three wedges of bread and butter, and put them on the table.

"Hope I ain't keeping you from the fire," said Mr. Walker, forgetting it was out.

"No," replied Harris, more truthfully than he thought. It was a weary-dreary tone he used; there was no suggestion of malice in it. From which fact Mr. Walker drew the deduction that Harris had not been told.

"I say," Walker exclaimed, as Harris was leaving, "haven't you got any friends who'll help you out of this?"

"No," in the same weary-dreary tone. The flesh of the spectre had worn off, leaving the mere skeleton; the cruelty of it, the sharpness, relentlessness of the creditors had faded from Harris' mind, leaving the bare fact that his home was to be sold up.

"That's bad," muttered Walker, stirring his tea. "That's bad!"

He continued stirring his tea long after Harris had left the room. He broke a slice of bread-and-butter, and, resting an arm on the table, turned a pair of melancholy blue eyes at the heap of cinders on the hearth. Somehow he didn't feel hungry, nor very thirsty, for that matter, though he had a sort of fancy that a drop of something warm would have done him good. He felt low, not exactly unwell, but low, dispirited. It might have been that a change had occurred in the weather. But if he left the bread and butter the Harrises would probably think he was dissatisfied with it, and it would put them out.

He wrapped up the bread and butter in a piece of newspaper and put it in his pocket, then emptied the contents of the tea-cup into the pot of a "parlour-fern" in the window.

Going into the passage he coughed twice to attract attention. As nobody came, he went to the kitchen door and knocked gently.

"I'm just going home to fetch a brush and comb, and such like," he said, pleasantly. "Shan't be long. If my bailiff should happen to look in, you might say I've gone round to see him. I'm not supposed to go, you know."

Digitized by Google

"All right," said Harris' weary-dreary voice.

Mr. Walker went out, closing the door quietly after him. Half-way down the street he met a scraggy little boy, to whom he disposed of his bread and butter.

He went home and made straight for the upstair parlour. The room was in darkness, but he groped his way to a cupboard beside the fireplace, and drew from the corner a box. He opened the box and took something from it, replaced it, re-locked the cupboard, and went out again. He went straight to his bailiff.

"What's this mean?" was the gruff query that met him.

"I know it ain't in order," said Walker, scratching his head with the brim of his hat, "but they found the money, and wanted to get me out, but I wasn't keen on staying, and, as he could not come, and she didn't like to, I said—knowing it would be safe, as I had the money—I said I'd bring it along."

"Oh, there ain't no 'arm in that," said the bailiff. "Where's your paper? Ten-pound note, eh? I thought as much. As soon as I saw 'im I knew he could get 'old of money when pressed. And one pound's right."

Mr. Walker counted out the change tendered him carefully, and, having put it in his pocket, watched his bailiff fold up the bank-note and thrust it in a small cash-box. He had never before seen so little change out of a ten-pound note.

"Well, that's all square," said the bailiff. "You're going back with the change, I s'pose?"

Walker nodded.

"What are you—— Oh, you want your fee, don't you? There you are."

Walker took the half-crown the other pushed towards him eagerly. It was a little more change out of his ten-pound note.

"I suppose I can consider myself out?" he asked as he went to the door.

"Yes, oh, yes! But look in in the morning, I've got another job for you."

"Not me," said Walker, without waiting to be heard, "I've chucked it."

On his way back to the Harrises' he passed a furniture shop, in one window of which was displayed a second-hand dining-room suite. He had promised himself—worse, he had promised the missus, as a Christmas present that suite for the shop-parlour (Mrs. Walker kept a second-hand clothes establishment). It was an elegant suite, and he had only missed it through his tendency to keep his money as long as possible, and now it was gone, and the suite——

He didn't mind so much for himself, though since he'd be more at home in future than heretofore, he should have liked the suite. But it was for the missus he regretted; yet not perhaps so much for her as because of her. Mrs. Walker's temperament was not all Mr. Walker would have wished.

Harris opened the door to him, for he knocked and waited, just to show them that he knew they might have locked him out if they had willed.

Mrs. Harris was making up a bed for him on the parlour sofa when he entered the room.

"I'll make you as comfortable as I can," she said sadly.

"You're very kind," he said, looking at her and hunting in her face for all that was still there to remind him of Martha Hall. "But I shan't be sleeping here, in fact, I'm paid out!"

"Paid out!" cried she, gasping.

"Yes, I went round to see my bailiff, and he said he was just coming to take me out, as a gentleman had been in very mysteriously, saying he was a very old friend of yours, and, hearing you were distrained upon, and having a bit of money, he didn't quite know what to do with, would pay out the execution."

"A gentleman—old friend? John, John!" She rushed out of the room.

Mr. Walker put his hand in his pocket, and produced the last complete pound of his ten-pound note.

"It won't buy the suite," he said ruefully. So he pushed it under a leg of the American clock on the mantelshelf.

"Is this right—square, eh?" exclaimed Harris, limping into the room, his face alight with excitement, and followed by his wife.

"I'm pleased to say it is; it must be since I've orders to clear out," replied Walker, shooting back his wrist-bands violently.

"And he didn't say who he was?" asked Harris.

"No; he was an old friend of your wife's."

"Well ——!" gasped Harris.

"God bless him, whoever he is," said Mrs. Harris, with a strange glance at Walker. "You'll stop and have a bit of supper with us, won't you?"

"I must get home," said he, smiling wisely. He did not wish to be questioned ere he could anticipate the questions. But, if I may, I'll look in for a minute on Christmas Day and drink your health!"

He did.

* * * * *

He was sitting in the shop-parlour an hour later, his mind divided between a paper and his thoughts, when a pair of piercing eyes glanced at him from either side of a hatched nose.

"James, w'en's that furniture comin'?"

"The suite?" murmured Walker, to gain time.

"The suite! What else d'yer think I meant?"

"I don't know," tingling from head to foot.

"I should think not! When's it comin'?"

"'Fraid it ain't coming, my dear."

"Sold? I told you what it would be! That comes of leavin' it—— "

"It ain't sold; I ain't got the money." He braced himself up for the effort. "I met Bobbin to-day, and he asked me for the ten pound I owed him."

"An' you paid it? You silly, fat man, why didn't you tell 'im you 'adn't got it?"

"Why—well—I couldn't go and tell a downright lie. He said he wanted it."

He drew a deep breath and muttered to himself, "I hope he don't" before Mrs. Walker began.

C. Randolph-Lichfield.

A Dutch paper publishes the following significant advertisement from a disconsolate wife—"Adolphus. Return to your Matilda. The piano has been sold."

Fond Parent: "Bobby, Bobby, you ought not to laugh because that old lady fell down." Bobby: "I didn't, pa. I was laughing because she couldn't get up."

Mother: "Tom, you mustn't go fishing with Freddy Slowcum. He is just getting over the measles." Tom: "There won't be any danger, ma. I never catch anything when I'm fishing."

Angry Customer: "Hullo, you waiter, where is that ox-tail soup?" Waiter: "Coming, sir—half a minute." Customer: "Confound you, how slow you are!" Waiter: "Fault of the soup, sir. Ox-tail is always behind!"

Visitor: "Are you going to be a great man when you grow up, Willie?" Willie: "Yes! I'm going to be an Arctic explorer." "An Arctic explorer's life is full of hardship, Willie." "Yes. But I can stand 'em, I reckon." "I like your spirit, my boy. There is a great deal of glory to be gained in a career of that kind." "Yes. And you don't never have to wash your face."

Stubbs: "Well, sir, I gave it to that man straight, I can tell you. He is twice as big as I am, too, but I told him exactly what I thought of his rascally conduct right to his face, and I called him all the names in the dictionary, and a lot of others as well." Spudds: "And didn't he try to hit you, Jenkins?" Stubbs: "No, sir, he didn't. And when he tried to answer back, I just hung up the telephone receiver and walked away."

Digitized by Google

He Once Held a Nicer Hand.

She (half suspiciously): "Did you ever hold a hand that you would like to hold better than mine?" He: "Only once, darling. Then I had eleven trumps."

Nothing Left.

Wife: "Wake up! There are thieves in the house!" Husband: "Go down and show them your new winter bonnet, and they won't waste any time looking for money here."

Fear Lent Strength.

Policeman: "I don't see how a little woman like you succeeded in capturing and holding a big burglar like that." Little Woman (weakly): "It was dark, and I—I thought it was my husband trying to—to elope with the servant girl."

The Cow Knew.

Fair Maiden (a summer boarder): "How savagely that cow looks at me!" Farmer Haysced: "It's your red parasol, mum." Fair Maiden: "Dear me! I knew it was a little bit out of fashion, but I didn't suppose a country cow would notice it."

He Went without the Cellar.

"Will you keep a wine-cellar when you have a home of your own?" "Well, well," stammered the young man, "in the event of illness I think it well to be provided." "All right," the old man replied; "you can marry my daughter, but don't be surprised if I call on you twice a week and get taken ill."

What it all Means.

Each eve she meets me at the gate—her brow has roses on it; and for one kiss she gives me eight (that means a winter bonnet). Each dish that most delights my eyes the table has upon it; and, "Dear, try this, and this," she cries (that means a winter bonnet). My slippers always are in sight; my smoking cap, I don it; she strokes my hair: "You're tired to-night" (that means a winter bonnet).

Scratched or Pinched?

Here is a story of a ping-pong tournament. One young lady not being up to time, the secretary sent a verbal message to her house to inform her that if she did not come at once he should "scratch her." The maid, horrified at the want of courtesy in the use of the term she did not understand, endeavoured to soften the message by delivering it thus: "Please, miss, Mr. Jones says if you do not came at once he will pinch you."

Heard at the Post Office.

A young woman called at the post-office in a provincial town and bashfully inquired if there was a letter for her. "Business or love letter?" jokingly inquired the clerk. "Business!" was the reply, accompanied by a blush of the deepest crimson. As no such letter was to be found the young lady took her departure, but came back after a little while, and said in faltering accents: "Please, would you mind looking among the love letters?"

Why She Wanted Time.

She (after the proposal): "You must give me time." He: "To consider?" She: "No, to break off my last engagement."

In Case of Emergency.

A young lady who is partly deaf, is in the habit of answering "Yes" to everything when a gentleman is talking to her, for fear he might propose to her and she not hear it.

Making a Name for Herself.

Friend: "Your daughter seems determined to win a name for herself by writing." Papa: "Yes, she has answered over a hundred matrimonial advertisements, and isn't discouraged yet."

A Wasted Life.

He: "Life with me has been a failure." She: "You must have had and wasted some opportunity." He: "No; I have spent half my life raising whiskers to conceal my youth, and the other half dyeing them to conceal my age."

Easily Collected.

"Ah, Professor, what a charming collection of stuffed birds you have here! Where did you get them from?" "Oh, that is quite simple. I have been collecting them for years from the worn-out hats of my seven daughters."

Johnnie was Careful.

"Now, Johnnie, go and kiss your little sweetheart and make it up," said Johnnie's mother. "No, I won't." "Go and tell her how much you love her, and how sorry you are." "No, I won't. Pa says he got into a breach of promise case by tellin' a girl that, and had to marry the old thing. I won't run any risks, I won't."

Wanted an Extra Flounce.

Younger Sister: "Mother, I think it is too bad; I am sixteen, and you make me wear such short dresses that it mortifies me terribly." Mother: "My dear, you cannot wear long dresses till your eldest sister is married." Younger Sister: "Well, she is as good as engaged to Mr. Doolittle, and I think I am entitled to an extra flounce."

How She Managed It.

"Madam," said the judge sternly, "you must answer the question. What is your age?" "I was born in the same year your lordship was. That would make it about——" "It isn't necessary to go into particulars," interposed the judge stiffly. "Gentlemen, have you any further need for the witness? You may stand aside, madam."

Helping Papa.

A minister's wife was starting out for a walk, and invited her little daughter to go with her. "No, mamma, I can't," was the very positive reply. "Why not?" "I have to help papa." "Help papa! In what way?" "Why, he told me to sit here in the corner and keep quiet while he wrote his sermon, and I don't believe he is half done yet."

Home Decoration.

Mrs. Fatpurse: "You paint pictures to order, don't you?" Great Artist: "Yes, madam." Mrs. Fatpurse: "Well, I want a landscape, with lots of deer, and ducks, and quail, and pheasants, and cattle, and sheep, and pigs, and so on, you know; and put a lake and an ocean in—fresh and salt water, you know; and be sure to have plenty of fish swimming about, because it's for the dining-room."

My Two Loves.

I love two women; both are good and kind; and one is tenderer than the infant dawn, full of wise counsels, loving as a fawn, and lover-like, to all my follies blind. The other, like a tender, blooming rose, shaking its sweets upon the air, shakes in my heart love's odours and doth bear life's sweetest pleasures as she goes. I love them fondly—unto both I'm true—Nay, blame them not! nor deem me free of speech, for I am loyal still and just to each! One is my mother, and one, sweet, is you.

Digitized by Google

A Madman's Bequest.

A STORY OF LOVE AND FORTUNE.

"And that is all the message that I am to give him from you—'Kind regards.' Poor Alf! His whole letter to me is about nothing else but you alone! His mother is nobody—nothing to him; and yet you won't give or send him even one kind word!"

"Dear Mrs. Willoughby," replied the girl, earnestly. "I am very, very sorry; but, believe me, it is better for your son—for you, that I should remain just the boarder, and, if you will, the good friend of you both."

"I'm afraid Alf will not be satisfied with that! See what he says: 'This wretched fever, ague-smitten place is only tolerable to me when I think of her as a possible reward for my patience. Just tell her, mother, that even in Sierra Leone (the one spot on this earth that must have been created for human torture and punishment) I can endure if only I may hope. She knows how I love her; I believe, if she would but confess it, that she loves me. Ask her to write and tell me so, or if she will not do that, ask her to send me a message in your next letter. I suppose that she is still grinding away at that miserable typewriting. See that she doesn't overdo herself, for whether she will or whether she will not, her interests, her welfare will always be my one great heart concern!'"

During the reading by Mrs. Willoughby of this extract Ella Staunton stood by the sitting-room window, drawing on her gloves.

"I am afraid I shall be late in the City," was all she said at last. Then, as if she thought that the mother's wistful pleading demanded some little word of recognition, she added, as she reached the door, "Say, please, that he knows why I am apparently unkind; but, that should anything ever arise which would enable me to act differently, I will not hesitate so to act; and of that he may be assured."

"Well," said Mrs. Willoughby, with a sigh, "I suppose he must be content with that crumb of comfort, small as it is; and I only hope that the time you speak of will come before my poor boy is quite finished up by that dreadful West Coast."

Ella Staunton had, for the past four years or more, been a boarder in Mrs. Willoughby's house in Chelsea; long enough, in fact, to look upon it in the light of "home."

It was only a small house, and beyond herself there were no other stranger inmates.

Mrs. Willoughby was the widow of a long deceased master mariner, with one son, between whom and herself there existed a truly ideal affection. The young fellow was not exactly of his father's profession, though of a very similar one, he being an electrical engineer on one of the cable ships of a certain big ocean telegraph company. Most of his time was passed upon the West Coast of Africa, his vessel being stationed for long spells off Freetown, Sierra Leone.

This was the only "crook in his mother's lot"—her son's many and long absences—so that had it not been for Ella's presence in the house her loneliness would have been almost unbearable.

When, on his first home-coming after Ella's advent into the little Chelsea establishment, he saw daily a young girl, barely nineteen, who realised in her dainty little person, his most cherished ideas of womanhood, Alfred Willoughby began to wish that his lines were cast in a place not quite so distant from Chelsea Reach as Sierra Leone.

Ella, too, was undoubtedly attracted by the sunburnt young marine scientist, who, though unduly spare and out of sorts from a two years' residence among the mangroves, was in every way a manly man, while his experiences in "foreign parts" were of a kind to find favour with a girl, whose intelligence was well above the average.

Alfred Willoughby was not the sort of young fellow to wilfully neglect his opportunities; so that during his three months' leave it was no unusual thing for Ella to find him waiting for her of an evening at Sloane Square Station in order that he might walk up the King's Road with her.

That the inevitable should result was not wonderful—on one such occasion his love getting the better of his discretion.

It was undeniable that she had learnt to care for him; her tone and manner told him that; but it was also apparent that she was struck with the unexpectedness of the declaration.

Sensibly self-possessed, without being excessively so, she told him why, for the present at anyrate, there must be merely friendship between them.

"I have not a relative in the world," she said, "not one! As a child, of three or four, perhaps, I can just recollect a man—a big, rough, loud-voiced man—who about that time disappeared out of my life altogether. I have a faint remembrance also of a gentle, sad-eyed woman, who must have been my mother. In the house where she died I remained till I secured my present position, and came to live with your mother. A small yearly sum has been paid for my education and support, by whom I do not know. This annual payment suddenly ceased, however, last year, and my reason now for not saying what you wish me to say, is because I have made a determination to discover the identity of my mysterious benefactor. It may be that I shall, if I am successful, find a kinsman, and then, who knows what may happen. In the meanwhile, Mr. Willoughby, you may see someone else better suited for you than I am."

"Never!" was the fervent reply. "You will always be the one woman in the world for me! And I will wait and hope, with what patience I may, till you tell me finally, and in so many words, that you cannot love me."

* * * * * * *

The sun was beating down, blazing hot, upon the deck of the cable steamer Hambria as she lay at anchor off Freetown, Sierra Leone.

The mail had arrived that afternoon, and Alfred Willoughby, assistant electrician, was in his cabin, reading, for the fifth or sixth time, his mother's letter. He had dared to hope that there might possibly be inclosed a few lines from Ella, and could not help experiencing keen disappointment at finding none.

Still, the outlook was not so completely dark, for did she not speak of "something" which might happen, and which would make for happiness for both of them?

Digitized by Google

"If this thing should be," he said to himself, "'she will not hesitate to act.' Yes, but will it!—will it? This man she once spoke of to me, and the mysterious benefactor, are they one and the same? And if so, who is he? What is he? Where is he?"

These thought-inquiries were to be answered sooner than the querist imagined, and in a way the most romantic and the most unexpected.

The next morning, soon after breakfast, a small steamer, evidently of the "tramp" species, was seen to be coming in towards the inner anchorage.

She was dirty, high out of the water, and pitched and rolled in a manner that must have been highly inconvenient to those on board her.

Having nothing particular to do Alfred Willoughby watched the newcomer till at last she "let go" within a few cables' length of the Hambria.

She was a stranger to everybody on board the latter vessel, though one man in the stokehold declared that he knew her, having come across her at Loanda a year or so previously. At that time, he said, she was trading for ivory; for anything indeed in the intrinsically valuable way. Her reputation was not by any means "sweet" on both the south-west and east coasts, rumours of "black business," in connection with Zanzibar and other neighbouring "slave centres" being unpleasantly rife.

To the surprise of the captain of the Hambria, a boat put off and made for them, its one passenger being evidently the tramp's skipper.

Willoughby happened to be near the gangway as the stranger stepped on to the Hambria's deck.

The latter was a short, thick-set man, of nearer sixty than fifty, slovenly dressed, and with a curt, sharp manner approaching closely to the uncivil:

"Mornin'!—are you the skipper?" he jerked out.

The young electrician assured him that he was not, and indicated the captain, who now came down from the bridge.

"Ah!—mornin', sir! Just got in from St. Jago, Cape de Verdes. Have you got anything in the shape of medicine you could let me have? My medicine-chest's run out; and I'm bad—been bad for a week now."

"What's the matter with you?" asked Captain Price.

"Don't quite know. It's this blamed climate! I don't often put in here; not once in twelve months, but I couldn't stick it out till we should get to Loanda."

"Of course not! My doctor's on shore for a day or two, shooting, but you're welcome to anything out of my medicine-chest, Captain—er——"

"Morris, sir!—Samuel Morris; skipper and owner of the steamship Golden Land, trading between the Cape de Verde's and anywhere between Loanda and Zanzibar."

"Been long on these coasts, Captain Morris?"

"Close on eighteen years now! Haven't seen or touched British soil, for all that while. I did think of paying the old place a visit this autumn; there's someone I'd like to see, and say something to, but it don't look much like as if I'm going to get there."

"Oh, you'll soon get all right. Either I or our assistant electrician, Mr. Willoughby, will pay you a visit later on, to see how you get on."

Before answering Captain Morris bent his thick eyebrows and gave a keen, scrutinising glance at both Captain Price and Willoughby.

Then, apparently satisfied, he said: "Glad to see you—if I'm alive!"

"Oh, you're not dead yet. Come and get what you want in the drug way."

In ten minutes he was on his way back to his own vessel, the Hambria's captain expressing his opinion that the "man was suffering from some mind trouble, which was acting upon his body; and that he was evidently in a bad state."

(Continued on next page.)

Christmas Eating—and After.

"What a blessing is a good digestion," exclaimed Anthony Trollope, and thousands since have repeated his words. About Xmas time, however, the other side of the subject which may be expressed in the exclamation, "What a curse is a bad digestion," is most commonly before one's mind. A very distinguished physician has said, "I think the cause of most of the maladies of the human race lies in their stuffing their digestive organs to excess."

This expresses in very blunt fashion the truth borne home at Xmastide. Indigestion, the result of Xmas eating and drinking, is at this period painfully rife. As a handy, safe and reliable cure not only for indigestion, but for heartburn, sour stomach, headache, and other symptoms of Xmas indiscretions in diet, Chas. Forde's bile beans are unequalled.

They are not sugar-coated, and may be carried loose in the waistcoat or dress pocket. One or two taken after a heavy meal will prevent any unpleasant consequences. A dose taken at night will be sufficient to prevent any "nasty taste in the mouth," dry tongue, or other unpleasant morning symptoms. Bile beans are obtainable from all chemists at one and three-halfpence or two and ninepence per box, or post free from the bile bean manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., upon receipt of prices. Purely vegetable in composition bile beans are now recognised as the world's greatest specific for all liver and stomach disorders, and are prescribed by many eminent medical men.

Everyone may not believe in

GHOSTS,

but everyone is interested in them, and everyone, therefore, should read the

DUKE OF ARGYLL'S

GREAT ARTICLE

"CAN WE SEE GHOSTS?"

in the

JANUARY NUMBER of the

ROYAL MAGAZINE.

JUST OUT. PRICE 4d.

Digitized by Google

"Look here, Willoughby!—you go across to that old iron kettle of his by-and-by, and have a look at him."

"Right you are, sir! I'll go after dinner."

When in three or four hours' time Willoughby boarded the Golden Land, a deck-hand answered his inquiry for the skipper by simply pointing in the direction of the after cabin.

No one was in the small saloon, out of which four berths opened. One, the captain's, had its door ajar.

Pushing the latter open, Willoughby saw its inmate lying, fully dressed, upon the swinging cot.

In even those few hours the man was changed for the worse; for his features were pale and drawn, while his breath came in laboured gasps.

He saw Willoughby, and motioned him nearer with a feeble lifting of his hand.

There was some brandy on the fixed bureau and Willoughby poured some out and gave it to him.

It did him good in a way, for in a minute or two he seemed to gather strength.

"Where do you live?" was his curious query, made in so low a voice that the other was obliged to stoop in order to hear.

"When I am at home, you mean? In London—Chelsea."

"I am dying—I know it—put your hand under my pillow—take out a letter you will find there. Yes, that's it."

It was in a foolscap envelope and very bulky.

"Do you see the name and the address upon it?" asked the sick man.

For the moment Willoughby could not make it out, in the dim light of the one oil lamp.

Holding the letter close to the light, what he saw there made him start as if he had been shot.

Written in large but shaky characters was Miss Ella Staunton, 18 Blythe Road, Hammersmith, London.

"You know her!" cried the other excitedly, but in a weak voice.

"I—I know a young lady of that name; but she does not live there."

"No!—where—where does she live—your friend, I mean?"

"She lives with my mother in Chelsea."

"It must be!—it must be!" muttered the dying man. "If it is—she will know that address. Listen!"

"Yes; I am listening."

"Open that drawer!" pointing to the top drawer of the bureau. "Now—that box in the left hand corner. That is it—open it."

It was full of sovereigns, to the amount, Willoughby thought of several hundred pounds.

"That money!—you see it!—take it!—leave your ship—take passage in next mail for England, and—and deliver that letter to Ella Staunton—my—my step-daughter."

"Then you were——"

"Her mother's husband."

By this time the man had become exhausted, and when Willoughby asked him if the letter would make its recipient fully acquainted with all that she ought to know, he just nodded his head ever so slightly and closed his eyes.

Thinking it strange that no one came to attend upon the dying skipper, Willoughby went out upon deck and spoke to the sailor-man whom he had first seen.

"Where is the steward?" he asked, "or one of the officers."

"There's no one aboard except me, the engine-room lot, and six more, as is asleep, dead beat, in the fo'c'sle. Everybody else left the ship at St. Jago. They said the skipper was mad. What's the matter with him now?"

"He's dying!"

"Dying!"

"Yes—and you had better go and see what you can do for him. I'll go back to my own ship first, and then will get the Consul to put an officer in charge of you. However you managed to get here from the Cape de Verde's I don't know."

"Nor I, sir—it's the cherub that sits aloft as must have done it!"

Without bandying any more words, Willoughby went back to the Hambria, handing over the box of money to Captain Price for safe keeping.

He then very much astonished that worthy seaman by announcing that, on the mail steamer's call in six days, he meant to throw up his post on board, and take passage for home.

Asked for an explanation, he gave it, by repeating all that he had seen and heard on board the Golden Land.

"Well, it's one of the most extraordinary things I have ever known," was Captain Price's comment. "And now you had better return to the poor chap yonder, while I send Hutton (the second officer) on shore to the Consul."

When Willoughby found himself again in the cabin on board the Golden Land, it was to see a dead man.

The deck-hand was there, and said that the end had come almost before Willoughby reached the Hambria.

Obviously there was nothing more for the latter to do, beyond impressing upon the sailor that everything in the late skipper's cabin must be scrupulously left untouched till the Consul or his representative arrived. Then, with a last look at the face of the man, who, though dead, was to be the means of giving to him the one thing on earth that he most desired, he turned and made for his boat.

Six days afterwards he stood by the hurricane-deck rail of the Union Mail steamer Matabele, as she moved swiftly seawards, and watched the rapidly receding hull of the dirty little "tramp," the Golden Land, that at length became but a mere small black patch, and then disappeared altogether.

* * * * * *

The little household in More Street, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, was more than usually quiet on a certain evening in September.

Mrs. Willoughby and her fair boarder were alike thinking the same thoughts.

The African mail was several days overdue, and the newspapers were chronicling daily storm, disaster and loss of life.

The mother could not conceal her anxiety, while Ella, putting aside all other considerations, betrayed herself by her tender comforting of the parent of the man, who, she told herself, might never more be kept out of her heart, if, indeed, he had ever been really out of it.

It was long past the widow's usual time for "locking-up," but neither felt inclined for sleep, and both sat on talking to each other and waiting for they knew not what.

At last two o'clock sounded from the tower of old Chelsea Church, and, as the second stroke died away, the rumble of a cab became more and more audible through the night—or morning stillness, till it stopped at the door of the house in which the two women sat looking into each other's eyes and reflecting on another's thoughts and fears.

"No! no!—not you!—let me go!" said Ella, as a vigorous knock and ring thundered and jangled through the house.

The man upon the doorstep will always carry in his mind's eye the picture of the girl, holding a lamp above her head, and looking at him in solemn wonder, which would not let her speak.

She was not quite conscious of his presence until, in the little parlour, she saw him, with his mother's

(Concluded on page 862.)

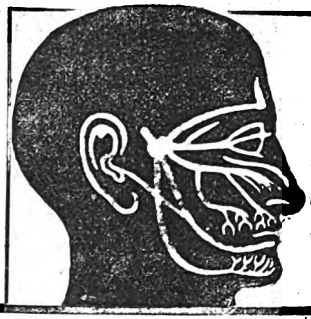
Digitized by Google

ZOX at once Cures Neuralgia

TOOTHACHE,
HEADACHE,
AND ALL
NERVE PAINS



Free Sample Powders sent to Readers of "Short Stories" to Prove the Efficacy of ZOX.

Neuralgia is a disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms.

The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of neuralgia.

Many a victim to the distressing disease will be able to recognise in these lines the tracks of the pain which so often afflicts them. All who suffer from this tantalising pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or Nerve Pains generally, will be glad to know of a Simple, Sure, and Easy Remedy, which is certified as free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. Further, the Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "SHORT STORIES," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX Powders can be obtained of Chemists, Stores, &c., at 1s. and 2s. 6d. a box, or post free from

THE ZOX CO., 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO.,
72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

LIFE-SIZE DOLL FREE!

"Baby's Clothes will now fit Dollie."

GIRLS can get this beautiful Life-size Doll absolutely free for selling only ten packages of the Electric Polishing Fabric, at 6d. a package Something new for cleaning and polishing Jewellery, Silver Ware, &c., without the use of powder, paste, or liquid. Sells at sight. Write to day, and we will send you the Fabric post paid. When sold send us the money (5s.) and we will send you post free this Life-size Doll, which is 2½ft. high, and can wear baby's clothes. When stuffed, this doll is an exact reproduction in fast colours of a hand-painted French creation, done on extra-heavy cloth that will not tear. The workmanship is perfect, the colour effects the very finest. The doll is intended to be stuffed. It is this century's model of the old-fashioned Rag Doll that Grandma used to make and would make Grandma open her eyes in wonder. Dollie is printed with Golden Hair, Rosy Cheeks, Brown Eyes, Kid-Coloured Body, Red Stockings, Black Shoes, and will stand alone. If Mamma can donate one of baby's out-grown dresses that her little daughter can put on and off, button and unbutton to her heart's desire, the Life-size Doll will live in that child's memory long after childhood's days have passed. If you do not care to sell our goods we will send the Doll post free, upon receipt of 2s. These dolls are sold all the year round. A single packet of SHY-NALL sent post paid on receipt of 6d. Address:

SHY-NALL,

2½ Feet High Doll when made up

SHY-NALL CHEMICAL CO. (Doll Dept. 38N), 75, Queen Victoria St., London, E.C.

Worth a Guinea a Box.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

No other medicine in the world can claim so many regular users. Thousands of families always keep a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS in the house, so that, on the first sign of any irregularity of the system, a timely dose may be administered, and further trouble and suffering averted. Nine-tenths of the BEECHAM'S PILLS sold are purchased by those who HAVE USED THEM BEFORE and have found them indispensable as

A FAMILY MEDICINE.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

Digitized by Google

arms round his neck; his mother's head buried in his breast.

She was not hurt or envious, for with the unselfishness of a great love, she was content that the mother should have pride of place.

And she had her reward.

"I have found him!" he said to her.

"Found him?" she echoed.

"Yes—and I bring you a message—from the dead!"

He placed the packet in her hands, but it was not till the next day that the strange tale was told, and the message read.

* * * * *

Samuel Morris, twenty years before, had married Mary Staunton, the young widow of a man, who had left her but ill-provided for, and with one child, a daughter.

For some strange reason, Morris took a strong dislike to the little Ella, a dislike, which, on his wife's death two years after marriage, developed into an uncontrollable jealous hatred.

His wife buried, he made arrangements for the child being looked after by the woman in whose house the mother died, and departed for Africa.

A man of abundant means, he invested a portion of his capital in the purchase of a small steamer of 800 tons burden, named her the Golden Land, and for the next eighteen years carried on a lucrative traffic in ivory, and like valuable matter, in the process, amassing a big fortune.

His almost ferocious eccentricity had won for him among his men the name of the "mad skipper," a title he fully deserved.

All this was confessed and related in the long communication brought to England by Alfred Willoughby.

Morris, in that document, went on to say that, being desirous of making some sort of reparation to his innocent step-daughter, he had long since had his will drawn up, by which he had bequeathed to her everything he possessed.

The will he had already forwarded to London, and it was in the hands of the agents, through whom Ella's maintenance-money had been paid.

There was only one condition annexed to the legacy, a strange one, seeing that the testator was himself a seaman.

The condition was expressed in the following clause in the will.

Whereas, if the said Ella Staunton shall at any time, either before or after receipt of the property herein bequeathed to her, marry a sailor, or anyone earning their living on the sea, or following the sea in any way as a vocation, she shall immediately forfeit such property, and it shall pass in its entirety to the Royal Society for Indigent Master Mariners, Belvedere, Kent.

"Then good-bye to happiness!" said Alfred, "unless you think, dear, that a poor electrical engineer's pay would induce you to break the condition."

"No," she said, with a peculiar smile. "I shall not break it; I shall keep it to the letter!"

He looked at her, trying to fathom her meaning.

But the smile did not die away. If anything it expanded, and became very tender and sweet.

"Can you not see," she said, "how I may keep this condition, and yet—yet——?"

"No," he replied. "I am blind, I suppose."

"That is just it," she said. "You are blind. What is to prevent you from giving up the sea, from this moment, and becoming a landsman?"

"But how am I to live?"

"Easily, for you are worth the best part of fifty thousand pounds."

"I?"

"Yes, you! For as you brought it to me it is yours, dear, and if you will but vouchsafe me enough to buy me my gowns, I shall be content, and you——"

"I," he interrupted her, taking her in his arms, "I, too, am content, though I would that money and condition were both at the bottom of the sea."

Ralph Enderby.

"You have no right to imprison me as a vagrant," said a lame beggar to a magistrate. "You have no visible means of support," replied the judge. "Yes, I have. What's the matter with this crutch?"

"See that man," said one of two people who were talking about success in life. "Yes." "He has left behind lots of people who struggled to overtake him." "Who is he?" "Conductor of a tramcar."

Teacher: "Why was Solomon the wisest man in the world?" Boy: "He had so many wives to advise him." Teacher (a strong-minded female): "Well, that is not the answer in the book, but you may go up top."

Mrs. Grumps: "I s'pose you'll word your will so that I won't get a penny if I marry again. You're mean enough." Mr. Grumps: "No, my dear. I have merely inserted a wish that if you marry again it shall be Mr. John Jimson. He and I were boys together. He licked me once."

Wife (returned from church to her husband, who had stayed at home): "You should have heard Dr. Doe's sermon this morning, my dear. I don't know when anything has made such a profound impression upon me. I think it will make a better woman of me as long as I live." Husband: "Did you walk home?" Wife: "No, I took a tramcar; and, do you know, John, the conductor never asked me for my fare, and so I saved twopence. Wasn't I lucky?"

HOW & WHAT TO DANCE by W. Lamb
PRESIDENT OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION OF TEACHERS OF DANCING.

HOW and WHAT to DANCE.

By W. LAMB.

containing complete instructions in the Art of Dancing, including all the latest and fashionable square dances and skirt dancing.

Price 1/-, post free 1/2.

SOME PRACTICE STROKES AT BILLIARDS
BY F. M. HOTINE
EDITOR OF MODERN BILLIARDS

PRACTICE STROKES AT BILLIARDS.

By F. M. HOTINE

(Late Editor of the Billiard Review).

This volume contains numerous diagrams and illustrations.

Crown 8vo, cloth.

Price 1/-, post free 1/2.

Order Form. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

Please forward me a copy of
"How and What to Dance" ... I inclose 1s. 2d.
"Practice Strokes at Billiards" ,, 1s. 2d.

Name.....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

Many will tell you that "Tatcho" is the only remedy they have found serviceable after years of trying.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back. Puts the hair right. Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

The Hon. Mrs. GORDON—

"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit from 'Tatcho.'—3 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, August 28th, 1902."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALÆLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account. — Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find 'Tatcho' excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Colonel PERRY—

"My dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

"A hair on the Head is worth two in the brush."

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the World, in Bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

A 4/6 full size Trial Bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

DAILY . . . EXPRESS.

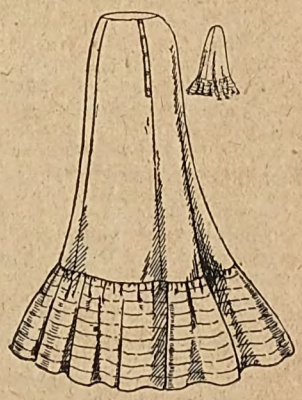
ONE HALFPENNY.

Order E. & T. PINK'S JAM

Undoubtedly the Best.

PURE.

No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.



GIVEN AWAY

With this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 467)

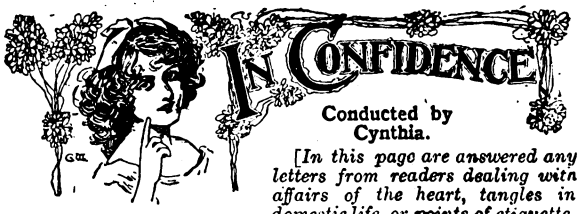
PAPER PATTERN of this

PETTICOAT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google



Conducted by Cynthia.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must in future be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

Two Girls and a Man.

For some time "Ella" tells me she has been attracted towards a young man whom she had known by sight. From his appearance he showed that he wished to meet her. By a fortunate train of circumstances, they got to know each other, had several meetings, and found that they had much in common. When their friendship was fairly established, "Ella" introduced him to her greatest girl friend. From that moment, he seemed to lose all interest in "Ella," and to be entirely in love with the friend. In a very short time "Ella" felt that she had completely lost him. Then, suddenly, the man and "Ella's" friend became estranged, and he disappeared. They saw nothing of him for months.

* * * *

"Ella" has now met the man again. What attitude should she take up towards him? Do I think she should drop him altogether, seeing that he is evidently not fond of her? To this my answer is "No." Cultivate each other's friendship. You do not know what may come of it. His affair with your friend was apparently simply an infatuation and had no lasting qualities. You say you and he have much in common. Well, there is more hope is that simple bond than there is in the majority of infatuations.

Calf Lovers.

Does a girl of seventeen know her own mind? "Anxious" is that age, and is deeply in love with a girl of the same age. Do I, he asks, think she will change before long?

* * * *

How can I say, "Anxious," not knowing the girl? I have known girls who have fallen in love at seventeen and never afterwards looked at another man but their early love. It all depends on the girl. If she changes her mind, then most likely you will change yours. Even boys of seventeen, you know, are not carved out of stone, and often enough are as changeable as girls. Don't worry about the future. If you are fond of each other now, enjoy it as long as you may. Neither you nor I can prophesy what may happen as you both grow older.

A One-Sided Love Affair.

"H. F." is a young man of nineteen, who goes out frequently with a girl of his own age. He does not care for her, he tells me, but thinks she is very fond indeed of him, which makes him reluctant to break the news of his own indifference to her.

* * * *

I think "H. F" had better say nothing at all. There is no need to make the girl unhappy. Besides, in time he may get to really love her, and will then have a very different story to pour into her ears. Let him wait until things reach some definite stage, and in the meantime be as nice to the girl as he can.

What to Do with our Parents.

Among the questions which a love adviser is regularly called on to answer is "What shall we do with our fathers?" It is constantly happening that, just as a young couple have discovered that they are all-in-all to each other, one of these monsters steps in and with callous brutality shatters their young dream. To-day I have a long story from "Chesterfield," too long to relate in full. But briefly it is this: For two and a half years he has been intimate with a girl, and last summer got her parents' consent to their engagement. Then he fell out of work, and remained so for five weeks, when her father told him that he must cease the engagement, and forbade him to see his daughter any more, or to write to her.

* * * *

Well, as "Chesterfield" and the girl are about as much in love with each other as it is possible to be, it is hardly likely either of them obeyed this harsh command. Of course they corresponded and saw each other secretly. Things came to a head when the father told "Chesterfield" he must either take back his engagement ring, or the girl must leave home. Of course, this put my correspondent in a quandary. He could ot take her from home, neither did he wish to take away the ring.

* * * *

In one respect, "Chesterfield," the father is quite right. While you were out of work, naturally he could scarcely look with favour on your continued engagement. Of course, I do not know the circumstances, but did you really do all in your power to get fresh employment? Did you persuade her father that you were really worthy of her and able to make your position? Until I know that I fear I can scarcely say the parent was in the wrong. You will, of course, see that the only thing to do is for you to really work as hard as you can and prove to the father that you are able to support his daughter. This may take a year or more, but it would be the best way to prove your love for her even if it meant your sacrificing for a time each other's society. Until you do this, her father may well say that your engagement must be held over. So all I can advise you to do is to work hard, and bring matters back to their original position.

The Dancing Question.

No, "Ada," I do not think you are right in trying to prevent your fiancé from dancing with other girls. It may make you jealous to see him whirling round a room with his arm round someone else's waist, but probably he is enjoying himself no more than you are. He is simply obeying the rules of etiquette, and acting like a gentleman. And I am sure you like your fiancé to do that, don't you? Only, I think, if I were you, I should try to impress upon him the advisability of selecting the older and less beautiful ladies as partners. You can easily convince him that they are much better for him in every way.

May He Send a Christmas Card?

"C. T. S."—There is no rule as to how long you must have known anyone before sending them a Christmas card. You say you met a certain lady three weeks ago, and want to send her a card. Well, if your acquaintance was simply a very slight one, and did not develop into any kind of cordial friendship—or, perhaps, a deeper sentiment—I think it would be going rather far to send a Christmas card. But if you and she struck up anything like an intimate acquaintance then you are at liberty to send her what you like.

"Mabel."—As the young man has told mutual friends he has lost his heart to you, why not convey to those same friends the fact that you are similiarly affected towards him. As the pleasant news has reached you through them, the equally pleasant news to him of your own feelings might filter through in the same way.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., etc.

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., etc., lecturing on Foods, says "The chief text in the Gospel of Nutrition is that Tea and Coffee are not Foods at all, while Cocoa is an admirable and sustaining diet. Than FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA, no better food product of this nature can be obtained or used."

Digitized by Google

IF

ALL BRITISH HOUSEWIVES purchased "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH in preference to Foreign Metal Polishes, it would enable us to give employment to a larger number of British workpeople. We manufacture

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

in England; also make all our own Tins, Cardboard Boxes, &c.

DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES.

Most of these set up Acid, and are of a very "sticky" nature, thus causing more labour in polishing. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH spreads evenly over the surface of the metal, can be easily removed, and produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

It is also guaranteed FREE FROM ACID, POISON, OR GRIT.

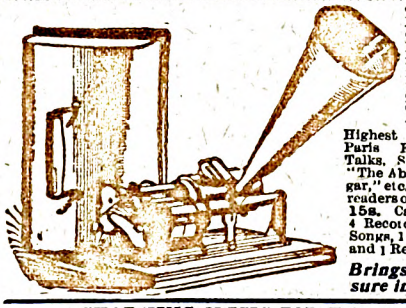
MANUFACTURERS:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

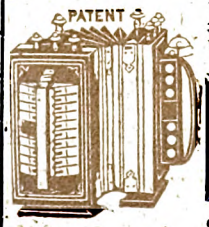
CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, " 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, " 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, " 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

Gray, Dunn & Co's Scotch Shortbread

A DELICIOUS CHRISTMAS DELICACY

"MENE"

Ladies say these Towels are superior to all other makes for cleanliness, comfort, and economy. May be obtained from all Outfitting Houses and Chemists, or 2 doz. No. 1, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 2, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 3, 1/6; post free. A Free Sample of No. 1 sent post free to any lady mentioning this paper.

MISS HAYNES, 55 Fann St., London, E.C.

SANITARY TOWEL FOR LADIES.

Sole Proprietors: ROBINSON & SONS Ltd., CHESTERFIELD.

EVERY WISE WOMAN

Will Insist on Having

CROSFIELD'S PURE CANE SUGAR

Sweeter and More Economical than Common Beet Sugars. It Produces NO Fermentation.

The Best Sugar for Household Purpose. Write for Name of Nearest Agent to CROSFIELD'S LTD., Sugar Refiners, LIVERPOOL.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google